

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at http://books.google.com/

HISTORY OF THE NORMAN CONQUEST.

London MACMILLAN AND CO.

PUBLISHERS TO THE UNIVERSITY OF Greet

THE HISTORY

OF THE

NORMAN CONQUEST OF ENGLAND,

ITS CAUSES AND ITS RESULTS.

BY

EDWARD A. FREEMAN, M.A.

LATE FELLOW OF TRINITY COLLEGE.

VOLUME II.

THE REIGN OF BADWARD THE CONFESSOR.

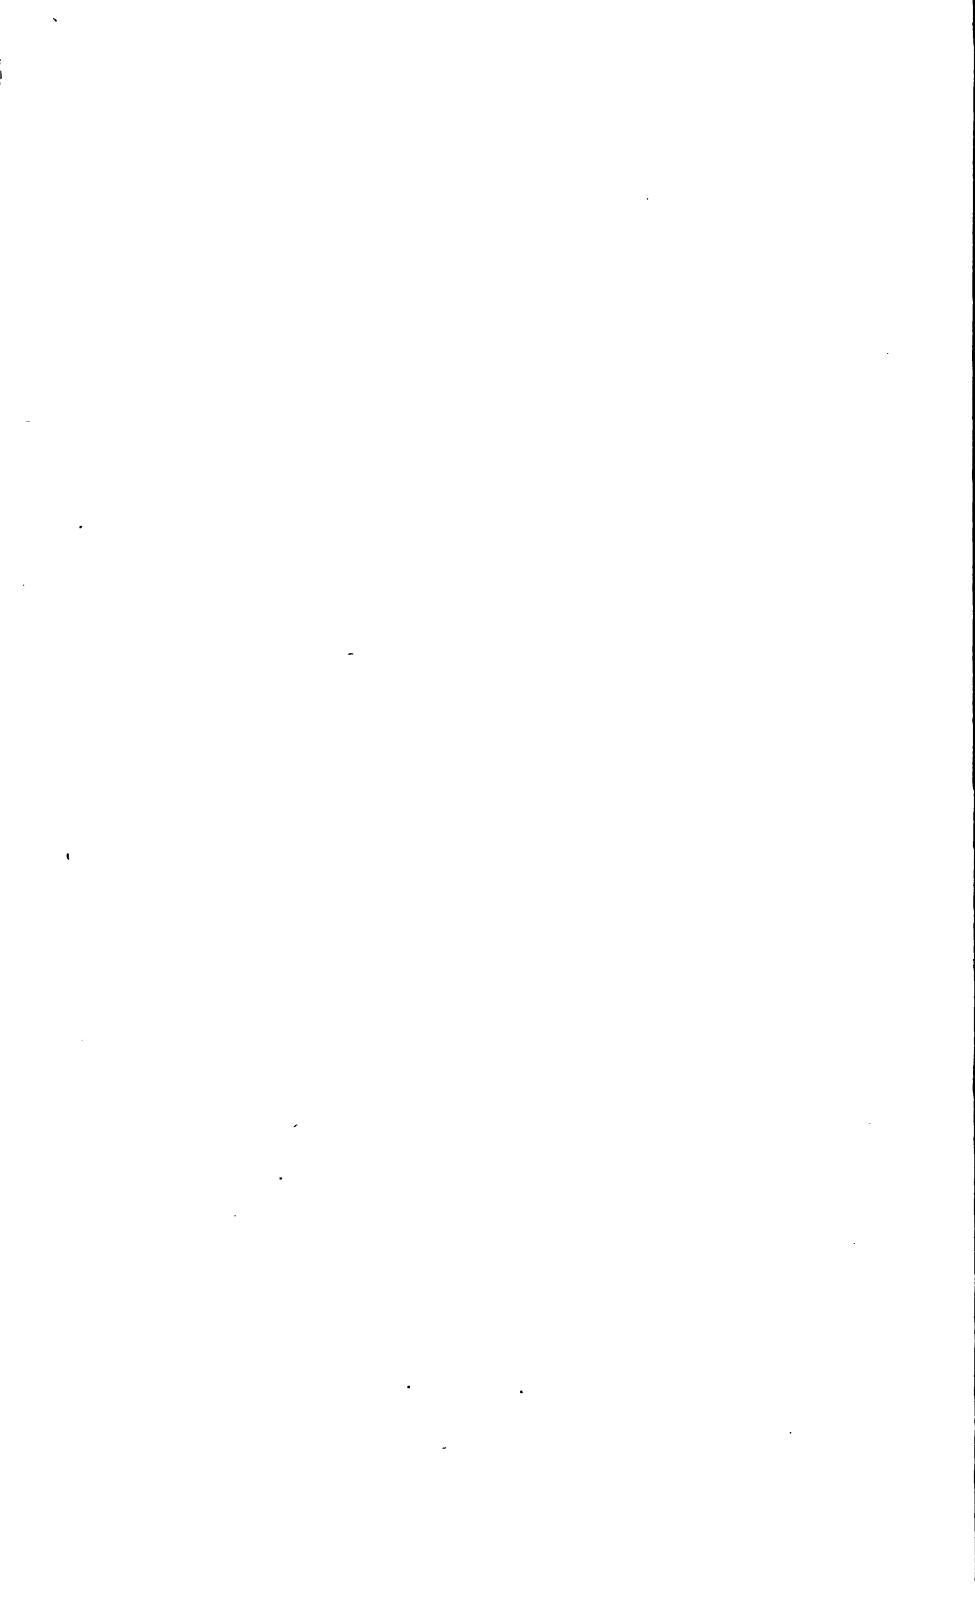

Φιλεί γὰρ ὁ Θεὸς τοῖς ὁὕτε ἀγχίνοις οὕτε τι οἰκόθεν μηχανᾶσθαι οἴοις τε οδσιν, ἡν μὴ πονηροὶ εἴεν, ἀπορουμένοις τὰ ἔσχατα ἐπικουρεῖν τε καὶ ξυλλαμβάνεσθαι. ὁποῖον δή τι καὶ τῷ βασιλεῖ τούτῳ τετύχηκεν.—Procopius, Bell. Vand. L 2.

Øxford:

AT THE CLARENDON PRESS.

M.DCCC.LXVIII.

[All Rights reserved.]

DA 195 F855 v. 2

PREFACE.

MY first volume was preliminary. I am now able to announce the exact extent and scheme of my My plan now extends to five volumes. present volume takes in the first stage of the actual struggle between Normans and Englishmen, that is, the Reign of Eadward the Confessor. I begin with Eadward's election, and I continue the narrative to his death. I take in also the early years of William in Normandy. In this period the struggle is not as yet a struggle of open warfare: it is a political struggle within the Kingdom of England. Harold and William gradually come to be the leaders and representatives of their several nations; but they are not, during the time embraced in the present volume, brought into any actually hostile relation to one another.

The third volume will, as far as England is concerned, be devoted to the single year 1066. But, along with the history of that great year, I shall have to trace the later years of William's Norman reign. The year itself is the time of actual warfare between England and Normandy under their respective sovereigns. It embraces the reign of Harold and the interregnum which followed his death. I shall, in this volume, describe the election of Harold, the campaigns of Stamfordbridge and Hastings, and the formal completion of the Conquest by the acceptance and coronation of William as King of the English. Of this volume a considerable part is already written.

The fourth volume I shall devote to the reign of William in England. The Conquest, formally completed by his coronation, has now to be practically carried out throughout the land. The authority of William, already formally acknowledged, is gradually established over England; local resistance is overcome; the highest offices and the greatest landed estates throughout England are gradually transferred from natives to foreigners. Before William's death the work was thoroughly done, and the great Domesday Survey may be looked on as its record. The Conquest, in its immediate results, is now fully accomplished.

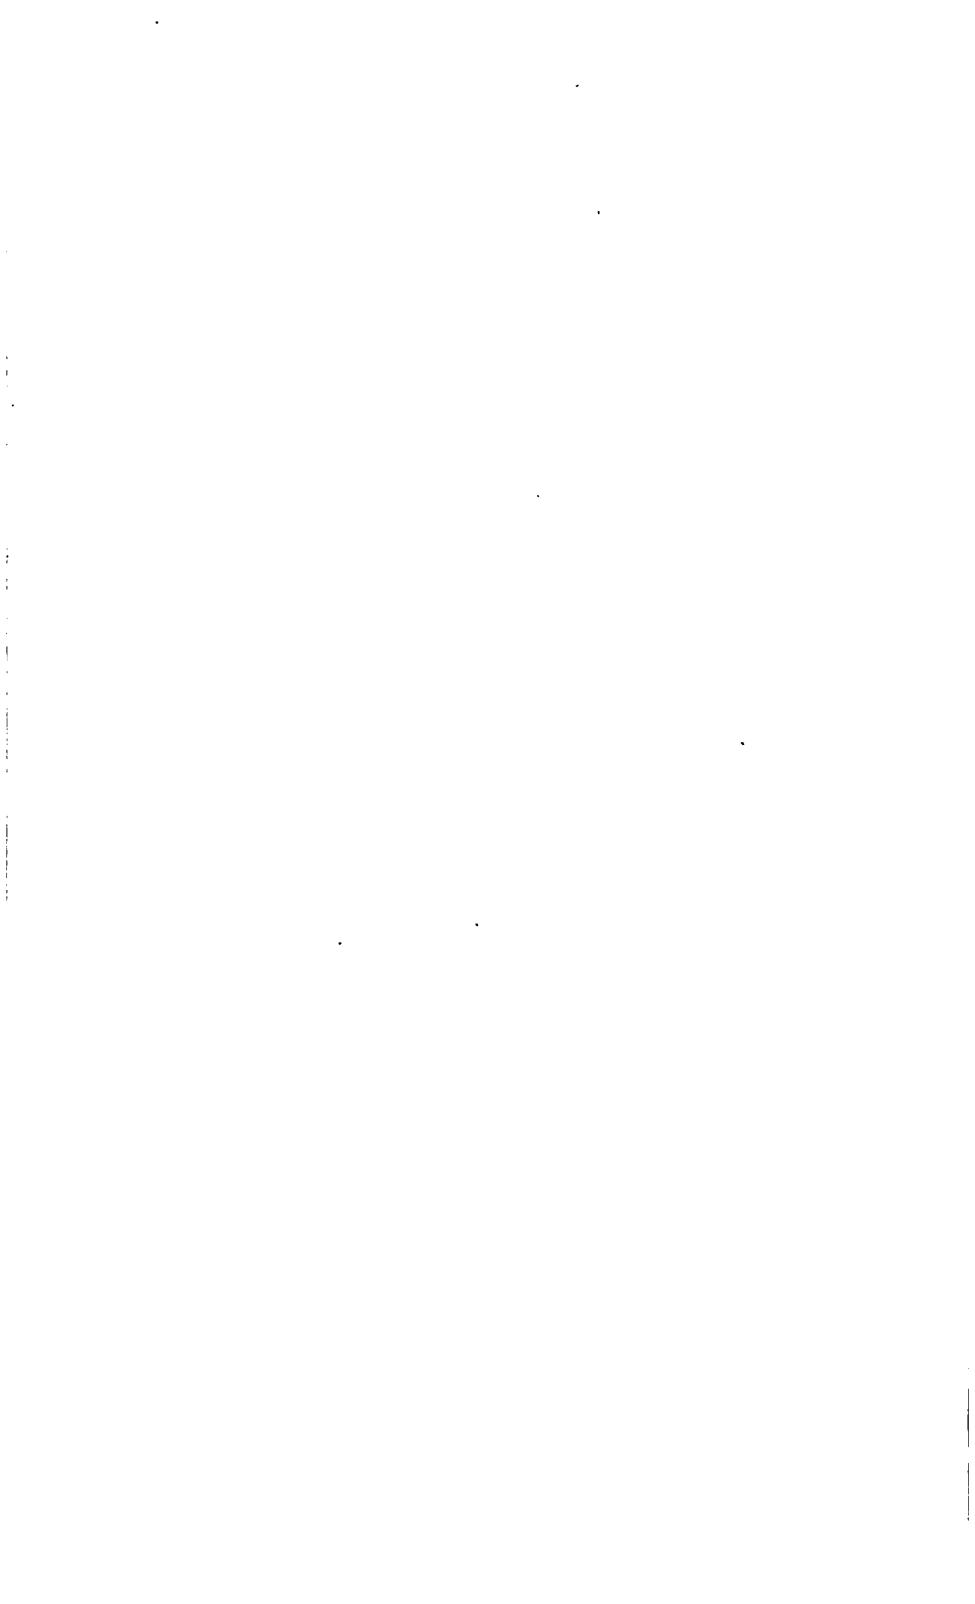

The second, third, and fourth volumes will therefore embrace the main narrative, the third being the centre of all. The fifth volume will answer to the first. It will be supplementary, as the first was preliminary. It will be devoted to the results of the Conquest, as the first was devoted to its causes. It will not be necessary to prolong the detailed history beyond the death of William the Conqueror, but it will be necessary to give a sketch of the history down to Edward the First, in order to point out the stages by which the Norman settlers were gradually fused into the mass of the English nation. I shall also have to examine the permanent results of the Conquest on government, language, and the general condition of England.

I have again to give my best thanks for help of various kinds to several of the friends whom I spoke of in my first volume. To them I must now add Mr. Duffus Hardy and Mr. Edward Edwards. But, above all, I must again express my deep thanks to Professor Stubbs, not only for the benefit derived from his writings, but for his personal readiness to correct and to suggest on all points. Without his help I may truly say that this volume could not be what I trust it is.

Somerleaze, Wells,

April 21st, 1868.

CHAPTER VII.

FROM THE ELECTION OF BADWARD TO THE BANISHMENT

	OF GODWINE. 1042—1051.
A. D.		PAGE
	The struggle between Normans and Englishmen begins with the accession of Eadward	4
	Import of Eadward's election; resolve of the English people to have none but an English King .	4
	Other possible candidates; Swend Estrithson; Eadward the son of Eadmund	5
	Eadward the one available representative of the old stock	5
§ 1.	The Election and Coronation of Eadward. 1042—1043.
June, 1043	Popular election of Eadward	5
•	Delay of the coronation; its probable causes .	6
	Eadward probably absent from England and unwilling to accept the Crown	67
	Embassy to Eadward; negotiations between him and Godwine	7—8
	Eadward accepts the Crown and returns to England	. 8
Christmas ? 1042—1043	Witenagemot of Gillingham	9
•	Opposition to Eadward's election in the interest of	,
	Swend Estrithson	9
	Eadward the only possible choice; nature of his claims	10-14
April 3, 1043	Eadward crowned at Winchester	14
[/ 0,40	Exhortation of Archbishop Eadsige; position of Ead-	• ward; his relations to Godwine and the other great Earls	14-16
	-

A. D.		PAG
	Presence of foreign Ambassadors at the coronation; Eadward's foreign connexions; his relations with Magnus of Denmark and with the French Princes	16—10
	Gifts of the English nobles; Godwine gives a ship	•
	to the King	19—20
§ 2.	. Condition of England during the early years of Eadward	L .
	Character of Eadward; his position as a Saint .	20-21
	Eadward's memory acceptable to Englishmen and Normans alike	22
	Eadward's personal character; purely monastic nature of his virtues; points of likeness to his father .	23-24
	His love of hunting; contrast with the humanity of	-5 -7
	Anselm	25-27
	Personal appearance and habits of Eadward .	27
	His love of favourites; his fondness for foreigners;	•
•	promotion of Normans to high office	28—30
	The Norman Conquest begins under Eadward .	30 Relations between Eadward and Godwine; Norman calumnies against Godwine and his sons	3031
	Character of Godwine; his relations to ecclesiastical bodies; his over care for his own household .	31-33
•	His good and strict government of his Earldom .	33-34
	Godwine never reached the same power as Harold did afterwards	35
	Godwine's eloquence; importance of speech at the time	35
1043	Godwine's family; Swegen raised to an Earldom .	36
1045 ?	Promotion of Beorn and Harold	36-37
	Character of Harold; his military genius	37—39
	His civil virtues; his singular forbearance; his championship of England against strangers .	39—40
	His foreign travels; his patronage of Germans as opposed to Frenchmen	40-41
	Harold's personal character; his alleged spoliation of monasteries; his friendship with Saint Wulf-stan; his foundation of Waltham	41-42
	Frankness and openness of his personal demeanour;
	alleged charges of rashness	42-43
	Story of Eadgyth Swanneshals	43
	Comparison between Harold and Constantine Palaio-logos	43—44
	Character of Swegen	44-45
	Character of the Lady Eadgyth; her doubtful loyalty to England; her relations to her husband .	45-47

A.D.		PAGI
•	Greatness of Godwine and his house	4748
	The other Earldoms; Mercia under Leofric; Northhumberland under Siward	48-50
	General condition of England; tendency not to separation but to union; comparison with Frankish
	history	5
	Nature of the Earldoms as affected by the Danish	•
	conquest; special position of Northumberland .	505
	The King's Writs; light thrown by them on the condition of Folkland	52-53
	General powers of the Witan not lessened
1040	Affairs of Scotland; reign and death of Duncan	53 5254
10401058	_	53-54
1050	Rome
1020 7062		5455
1039—1063	Affairs of Wales; reign of Gruffydd of North Wales	55—56
1039	His victory over Eadwine at Rhyd-y-gross	56
1042	His wars in South Wales and victory at Aberteifi.	56
	Eadward's relations with foreign powers; his connexion with Germany	56
	Claims of Magnus of Norway on the Crown of England	57
	The reign of Eadward comparatively peaceful .	57
$	3. From the Coronation of Eadward to the Remission of the War-tax. 1043—1051.
1043-1051	Character of the first nine years of Eadward .	58
	Relations between Eadward and his mother; probable	• offence given by Emma	5861
November	Witenagemót of Gloucester; Eadward and the Earls	•
16, 1043	despoil Emma of her treasure	6162
1043—1046
,	Swend; banishments of Osbeorn, Osgod Clapa,
	Gunhild, and others	62-64
April	Stigand appointed Bishop of the East Angles and	•
Nov. 1043	deposed	6465
	Importance of ecclesiastical appointments; mode of	• appointing Bishops; increased connexion with Rome; prevalence of simony	65—68
10441050	Siward Abbot of Abingdon appointed Coadjutor to 10441050	Archbishop Eadsige; he retires to Abingdon and
_	dies	6869
July 25,		_
1044	Death of Ælfweard, Bishop of London	69
August 10.	Restoration of Stigand; Robert of Jumièges Bishop
1044	of London	7071

A. D.		PAGE
	Baneful influence of Robert; his calumnies against Godwine; his connexion with the Norman Conquest	70-71
1044—1047	Condition of Northern Europe; war between Swend
	and Magnus; conduct of Godescalc	72-73
1044-1045	Magnus claims the English Crown; answer of Eadward; preparations against Magnus	73-74
1030—1044	Early life and exploits of Harold Hardrada; his escape from Stikkelstad; he enters the Byzantine service	74-76
1038—1040	He commands the Warangians in Sicily	76
	His crusade or pilgrimage; he escapes from Constan-	•
	tinople and joins Swend in Sweden	76—78
1045	Swend and Harold attack Magnus and save England	•
10	from invasion	78
Jan. 23,	Marriage of Eadward and Eadgyth; promotions of	•
1045	Harold and Beorn	79
	Death of Brihtwold, Bishop of the Wilsettas; Her-	• • mann of Lotharingia succeeds; policy of the promotion of German prelates	79—81
March 23,	•	••
1046	Death of Bishop Lyfing; his career and character .	81—83
1046—1072	Leofric succeeds him in Cornwall and Devonshire .	83
1050	He removes the see to Exeter, and subjects his
	Canons to the rule of Chrodegang	83—85
1046—1062	Ealdred succeeds Lyfing at Worcester; his character	8586 Gruffydd ap Llywelyn reconciled with the King; his joint expedition with Swegen against Gruffydd ap Rhydderch	87
	Swegen's abduction of Eadgifu; he throws up his
•	Earldom and retires to Denmark; suppression of
	Leominster Abbey	87—89
	Banishment of Osgod Clapa	89-90
1047	Affairs of Scandinavia; Harold joins Magnus and receives a share of the Kingdom of Norway .	90-91
	Swend asks help from England; his request is supported in the Witenagemót by Godwine, but rejected on the motion of Leofric	91-92
	Magnus defeats Swend; he occupies Denmark and dies suddenly	92-93
1901—8401	Harold succeeds in Norway, Swend in Denmark;
	their long warfare	.93
1048	Norwegian and Danish embassies to England; help again refused to Swend; peace concluded with Harold	93
1046—1047	Physical phænomena	93-94

	CONTENTS.	•••
4. D.	0 0 1 1 1 1 N.	xiii
Aug. 2		PAGE
1048	Ravages of Lothen and Yrling; the King and the Earls pursue the pirates, but they escape to Flanders	94
	Relations with Flanders: their analogy with the	94—96
	relations with Normandy in 991 and 1000 Alliance with the Emperor Henry; his nomination of German Popes	96
1048-10	Pontificate of Leo the Ninth	96
1047	Godfrey of Lotharingia and Baldwin of Flanders rebel against the Emperor	96—97
1049	Leo excommunicates Godfrey: Godfrey submite by	97
	Baldwin continues his ravages  Denmark and England join the Emperor against  Baldwin: the English float model.	97—98
	Baldwin; the English fleet watches the Channel; submission of Baldwin
	Baldwin's submission lets lease the T	98—99
	Baldwin's submission lets loose the English exiles;
	Osgod Clapa at sea; Swegen seeks reconciliation with Eadward
	Harold and Beorn oppose his restoration; his out-	99—100
	lawry is renewed .
	Beorn entrapped and slain by Swann	101-001
	Swegen declared Nithing by the army; nature of the military Gemót	102—104
	Swegen escapes to Flanders and is and	04-105 land land
Midlent, 1050	of Bishop Raldred	05—107
1049	Various military operations; movements of Osgod	07—109
July	Gruffydd of South Weles	09110
July 29	Campaign of Bishon Faldred, his dec	110
1049—1050	Increasing connexion of England with the continent; English attendance at synods; synods at Rheims and Mainz	111—0
1049	Deaths of Bishops and Abbots; Siward dies, and Eadsige resumes the primary. Follows:	1—113
Midlent,	chester dies and is succeeded by Ulf the Norman Witenagemot of London; reduction of the fleet; Swegen inlawed	113
	The King's vow of pilgrimage to Rome; Bishops Ealdred and Hermann sent to obtain a disconnection.	4-115
	_ · · · · · · · · · · · · · · · · · · ·	Ar 7.—27.

A. D.		PAGE
	Synode of Rome and Vercelli; Lanfranc and Berengar; Ulf confirmed in his Bishoprick; pilgrimage of Macbeth !	116-118
Oct. 29	Death of Archbishop Eadsige; the monks of Christ Church elect Ælfric, who is supported by Godwine
	but rejected by the King	118-120
Midlent, 1051	Witenagement of London; Robert of Jumièges ap- pointed to Canterbury, Spearhafoc to London, and Rudolf to the Abbey of Abingdon	120—121
July 27	Robert returns from Rome with the pallium; he re- fuses to consecrate Spearhafoc, who holds his see
Midlent!	without consecration	121-123
Writtent !	The remaining shape paid off; remission of the Here- geld; distinction between Danegeld and Heregeld	123—125
	§ 4. The Banishment of Barl Godwine. 1051.
	The foreign influence at its height; contract between Danish and Norman influences; revolt of England against the strangers	125—129
	Universal indignation at the appointment of Robert;
September	his cabals against Godwine	129—130
Debremier	cester; his outrages at Dover on his return .	130—133
	Eustace accuses the men of Dover to Endward;	-770
	Eadward commands Godwine to inflict military chastisement on them; Godwine refuses, and demands a legal trial	133-137
	Robert excites the King against Godwine; the Witan summoned to Gloucester to hear charges against the Earl	137—138
	Outrages of the Normans in Herefordshire; building	0
	of castles; Richard's Castle Godwine and his sons gather the force of their Earl-	138—140
	doms at Beverstone; Siward, Leofric, and Ralph gather theirs at Gloncester	141
Sept. 8	Negotiations between Godwine and the King; God-	• wine's offers refused through the influence of the Frenchmen; he demands the surrender of Eustace and the other criminals	142-143
	The full force of the Northern Earldoms assembles at Gloucester; Endward refuses to surrender Eustace	143-144
	Eagerness of the Northumbrians for battle; march of the West Saxons and East Angles on Gloucester	144—146
	Mediation of Leofric; adjournment to a Gemot in London	146-147
	Louden	140-147

A. D.		PAGE
Sept. 29	Gemot of London; Eadward at the head of an army; outlawry of Swegen renewed; Godwine and Harold summoned to appear as criminals	147-149
	Final summons to the Earls; their demand for a safe-conduct is refused	149150
	Godwine and his family outlawed; Godwine, Swegen,
•	&c., take refuge in Flanders	151
	Harold determines on resistance; he and Leofwine sail from Bristol to Dublin, where they are received by King Diarmid; vain pursuit of Bishop
	Ealdred	152-155
	Eadgyth sent to Wherwell	155—156
	General character of the story; explanation of Godwine's conduct: effect of his fall on the minds of his contemporaries	157—160
Oct. 1051—	Temporary triumph of the Norman party; advance-
Sept. 1052	ment of Ralph, Odda, and Ælfgar	160—161
	Spearhafoc deposed and William appointed Bishop
	of London	161
	Visit of Duke William	161-162
THE	EARLY YEARS OF WILLIAM THE CONQUEROR. 1028—10	051.
£ 1	Birth, Character, and Accession of William. 1028-10;	2 K.
3		to to Character and greatness of William; lasting results of his career	163—164
	-	165166
	His strength of will, military genius, statesmanship, and unscrupulousness as to means	166—167
	His personal virtues; general excellence of his eccle-	4
	siastical appointments	167—168
	Effects of his reign in Normandy, France, and Eng-	60 6
	land	168—169
	General excellence of his government in Normandy	169—170
	His reign in England; skill displayed in his claim on the English Crown, in his acquisition of it, and in his subsequent government	170-171
	Severity of his police	171-172
	The worst features of his character brought out in England; crimes and misfortunes of his later years William's surpers and the Great the Congressioned	172-174
	William's surnames; the Great, the Conqueror, and the Bastard	.
	the Bastard	174

A. D.		PAGE
	Laxity of the Norman Dukes as to marriage and legitimacy; special illegitimacy of William .	174-175
	Story of William's birth; description of Falaise;
	historical associations of the castle	175—177
	The all 1 and 1 and 1 at a figure	177—178
1026-1028
	A 11 9 1 45 A TOPPASTA	178—180
	Question of the succession; state of the Ducal family;	170-100
	various candidates, but none free from objection .	.90 .90
	Unpopularity of the prospect of William's succession
	The great Norman houses; their connexion with	182
		-0- 0
	•	182—183
	Greatness and wickedness of the house of Belesme; crimes of William Talvas; he curses young Wil-183—187
1034—1035	Robert announces his intention of pilgrimage	187
	He proposes William as his successor; his succession
	unwillingly accepted	188—189
1035	Robert dies on pilgrimage and William succeeds	189
	Childhood of William; necessary evils of a minority	189—191
	Anarchy of the time; building of castles; frequency of assassinations	191—193
	Effects of William's government in Normandy .	193
§ 2. I	From the Accession of William to the Battle of Val-ds-du	nes.
	1035—1047.
	Guardians of William; Alan of Britanny; Osbern;
	Gilbert	193-194
10301040	Murders of Alan and Gilbert	195
2009	House of Montgomery; history of Roger of Mont-	-30
	11. 10 15 1	195197
	Attempt of William of Montgomery on Duke Wil-	-9091
	liam at Vaudreuil; murder of Osbern; escape of	,
	the Duke; friendship of the Duke for William	(v
		197—198
	Rebellion and death of Roger of Toesny; houses of	-97190
	Grantmesnil and Beaumont	100
		199 200201
	Relations between Normandy and France; general	200201
	· ·
	good understanding since the Commendation to Hugh the Great; return of ill-feeling on the acces-
	, ,	201—203
	Castle of Tillières demanded by Henry; Gilbert Crispin refuses to surrender, and is besieged; the castle surrendered, burned, and restored by Henry contrary to his engagements	203-205

xvii

A D.		PAGE
	Treason of Thurstan Goz; capture of Falaise Castle
	by the Duke	205-207
	Developement of William's character	207-208
	Abuse of ecclesiastical appointments by the Norman	•
	Dukes	208
	Position of the Norman Prelates; their subjection to the Ducal authority	209
1037-1055	Death of Archbishop Robert; succession and primacy of Malger	209-210
10481098	Odo Bishop of Bayeux; his character in England
49-	and in Normandy	210-212
	Ecclesiastical movement in Normandy; foundation of monasteries	213
	Character of the monastic reformations in various ages	213-214
	Abbeys of Bec and Saint Evroul	214-216
994—1034		216-219
1034-1037		219
1037-1078	He removes the monastery to Bec; his administration
1005-1039		222-225
1039-1042	He teaches at Avranches	225
1043—1045	He becomes a monk and Prior of Bec; his favour	_ with William	225-227
1049—1050		227
575	Monastery of Saint Evroul; history of its founder	0
	Ebrulf or Evroul	228—229
943	The house escapes the Danish ravages, but is plun-
	-	229—230
	The monastery forsaken and restored by Restold .	230
c. 1015	Geroy and his family; their relations to the house of Belesme	230-232
	William the son of Geroy blinded by William Talvas	232
1050	Saint Evroul restored by William the son of Geroy and his nephews Hugh and Robert of Grantmesnil	233 1050—1063
	co-founder Robert	233234
	Connexion of the religious movement in Normandy with the Conquest of England	234
	Origin of the Truce of God; custom of private war;	• comparison between the Truce and the Crusades .
	A reform in those times necessarily ecclesiastical .	237
1034	The Truce first preached in Aquitaine	237-239
1041	The Truce preached in a relaxed form in Burgundy
	and Lotharingia	239—240
1042-1080	The Truce received in Normandy at the Councils of	_
	Caen and Lillebonne	240-241
VOL. II	h

xviii

A. D.		PAGE
1047	Wide spread conspiracy against William	24 I Intrigues of Guy of Burgundy with the Lords of the Bessin and the Côtentin; scheme for a division of the Duchy	242-243
	Geographical division of parties; Rouen and the French lands loyal; Bayeux and the Danish lands
	join in the rebellion	243-244
	The rebel leaders; Neal of Saint Saviour	245
	Randolf Viscount of Bayeux	246
	Hamon Dentatus of Thorigny	246
	Grimbald of Plessis	247
	Attempt to seize William at Valognes; his escape.	247-249
	Progress of the rebellion; William seeks help of King
	Henry; probable motives of Henry for granting it	250—252
	Battle of Val-ès-dunes; its importance in the life of
	William	252
	Val-ès-dunes a battle between Romanized and Teutonic Normandy	253-254
	Description of the field	254
	Junction of the Ducal and French forces; Ralph of Tesson joins the Duke	255-257
	The Battle a mere combat of cavalry	257-258
	Personal exertions and overthrow of King Henry;
	death of Hamon	258—260
	Exploits and good fortune of William	260  26 [
	Defeat of the rebels; flight of Randolf; bravery of Neal	261—263
	Escape of Guy; he defends himself at Brionne .	263—264
1047-1050 $	,
	· · · · · · · · · · · · · · · · · · ·	264—267
	Guy returns to Burgundy; fate of Grimbald .	267-268
	Establishment of William's power in Normandy;
	supremacy of the French element confirmed .	269-270
§ 3. P	rom the Battle of Val-és-dunes to William's Visit to Eng	iland.
	1047—1051.
	The Counts of Anjou; their connexion with Normandy and England; characteristics of Angevin
	history	270271
464	Saxon occupation of Anjou	271
870 1	Ingelgar first Count; legend of the origin of the	•
·	family	271-273
888	Succession of Counts; Fulk the Red	273
938	Fulk the Good; his proverb about unlearned Kings	273-274
958	Geoffrey Grisegonelle; his wars	274
_

	CONTENTS.	xix
A. D.		PAGE
978	His services to King Lothar in the war with Otto .	274
987	Fulk Nerra, warrior and pilgrim	274
992	His war with Odo of Chartres	274
1016	Battle of Pontlevois; defeat of Odo	274
10281035	Fulk's pilgrimages to Jerusalem	275
1040	Geoffrey Martel; origin of his surname	276
April 22,	Geoffrey imprisons William Duke of Aquitaine,	-70
1033		276-277
1033—1037	Last days of Odo of Chartres; his war with King	-1011
37	Henry and attempt on the Kingdom of Burgundy	277
1044	His sons Stephen and Theobald; their wars with	-11
	King Henry and with Geoffrey; Geoffrey receives
	MA 4	277—278
1048	Duke William helps King Henry against Geoffrey;	-///0
1040	his personal exploits	279—280
	Position of Maine under Geoffrey	280
1015—1036
1015 1050	Hugh	280
10481049
.040 .049	Alençon; it receives an Angevin garrison .	281—282
	William's march to Domfront; traitors in the Nor-
•	man camp	283—284
	Geoffrey comes to relieve Domfront and decamps .	0 04
	William's sudden march to Alençon; insults offered to	204 200
	him; his capture of the town and cruel vengeance	287-288
	Domfront surrenders; William fortifies Ambières.	289 Story of William the Warling; he is charged with 290291
	Duke William makes him leave Normandy, and gives	-33-his county of Mortain to his own half-brother
	Robert	292
1049-1054	TO 141 ANY 1	293
1049—1053	William's courtship and marriage with Matilda of	- 70
1049 1033	Flanders	293
1051—1052	Condition of England	294
1051	William's visit to England; estimate of him in English eyes	295
	Eadward's alleged promise of the Crown to William	205_207
	probably made at this time	296—301
	Constitutional value of such a promise; its revocation	101
	in favour of Harold	301
	Improbability of any other time for the promise  Nature of William's claims .	302—303
		304 305
Waret 4	William's visit an important stage in the history .	305
March 6,	Death of Ælfgifu-Emma	306

CHAPTER IX.

THE BEIGN OF EADWARD FROM THE RETURN OF GODWINE TO THE DEATH OF EADWARD THE ÆTHELING. 1052—1057.

A.D.		PAGE
	Character of the period; little direct connexion between English and Norman affairs	307—308
	§ 1. The Return and Death of Godwine. 1052—1053.
1052	General regret at the absence of Godwine; he receives invitations to return	308—310
	Eadward gathers a fleet at Sandwich to oppose Godwine	310
	Ravages of Gruffydd of North Wales; his victory	3.0
	near Leominster	311-312
	Godwine petitions for his restoration; embassies of foreign princes on his behalf; his restoration is 312-313
	Godwine determines on a return by force; estimate of his conduct
	Harold and Leofwine sail from Dublin and enter the	313—315
	Bristol Channel	315
	The people of Somersetshire and Devonshire ill dis-	J - J
	posed towards them; probable grounds for their hostility	316
	Harold's landing and victory at Porlock; estimate of	3.0
	his conduct	316-319
June 22	Godwine sets sail; his first appearance off the Eng-
		319-320
	Both fleets dispersed by a storm; Godwine returns
	to Bruges	320321
	Godwine sails the second time to Wight; meeting of Godwine and Harold; they sail eastward together	207 200
	Zeal in their cause shown by the men of Sussex,	321-322
		322-323
	They enter the Thames and sail towards London .	323
Sept. 14	Godwine reaches Southwark; London declares for	2 -
		323-324
	The King hastens to London with an army.  Godwine before London; zeal of his followers and	324-325
		326—327
	Godwine demands his restoration; Eadward hesitates	•
	The indignation of Godwine's men restrained by the	J-0
	Earl	328-329

A. D.		PAGE
	Embassy of Stigand; hostages exchanged; and matters referred to a Gemót on the morrow	329
	Godwine and Harold land	329
	Fears of the King's Norman favourites; general flight of the foreigners	329-331
Sept. 15	Robert and Ulf out their way out of London; the
-	Mycel Gemot assembles without the walls of
	London; its popular character	332-333
	Godwine at the Gemót; he supplicates the King and speaks to the people	333-334
	Votes of the Assembly; acquittal and restoration of Godwine; outlawry of Archbishop Robert and many other Normans; "Good law decreed for all folk "	335-337
	Personal reconciliation between Godwine and the King	337
	Restoration of Eadgyth	337-338
	Absence of Swegen; his pilgrimage to Jerusalem .	338
Sept. 29	He dies in Lykia	338
	Disposal of Earldoms; restoration of Harold; Earl-doms of Ralph and Odda	339
	The vacant Bishopricks; relations between Church and State	339-340
	Stigand appointed to Canterbury; his doubtful ecclesiastical position; handle given to the Normans
	by Robert's expulsion	340-344
1053—1067	Wulfwig succeeds Ulf at Dorchester	344
1053—1067	Leofwine Bishop of Lichfield; Leofwine and Wulf-
	wig seek consecration beyond sea	344
1051—1070	William of London retains his Bishoprick	345-346
	Normans allowed to remain or return; some of them probably restored after Godwine's death; Osbern of Richard's Castle	346-348
	Estimate of Godwine's conduct; his illness	348
1052—1053	Christmas Gemót at Gloucester	348
Jan. 5,	Rhys ap Rhydderch beheaded and his head brought
1053	to Eadward	349
1053—1066	Arnwig resigns the Abbey of Peterborough; succes-
		349—350
1053	Easter Gemôt at Winchester	350
April 12	Godwine taken ill at the King's table	350
April 15	His death and burial; gifts of his widow Gytha .	350-352
	General grief of the nation; true estimate of Godwine's character	352-354

§ 2.	From the	Accession	n of Harol	ld to the.	Earldom of	the 1	Vest-Saxons to his first	War with	Gruffydd	d. 1053—	1056.

A. D.		PAGE
	Nature of the succession to Earldoms; different positions of Mercia and Northumberland and of Wessex and East-Anglia	354-355
	Reasons for retaining the West-Saxon Earldom .	355-356
Easter,	Harold Earl of the West-Saxons; Ælfgar Earl of
1053	the East-Angles; character of Ælfgar and his	356—357
	Probable restoration of Bishop William and other Normans 358 Position of the Normans in Eadward's later days;
	political office forbidden, but court office allowed;	- 10
	Eadward's later policy thoroughly English	358—359
	Different positions of Godwine and Harold with 07	regard to the foreigners	359360
Christmas,	Ecclesiastical appointments; Leofwine of Lichfield	_
1053—1054	and Wulfwig of Dorchester	361
1053—1082	Athelnoth Abbot of Glastonbury	361
1053—July	Bishop Ealdred holds the Abbey of Winchcombe with	_
17, 1054	his See	361-362
	Welsh inroad at Westbury	362
1054	Macbeth in Scotland; Siward's expedition against him; Macbeth's alliance with Thorsinn	362-364
July 27	Siward defeats Macbeth; Malcolm declared King of
	Scots; legends about Siward	364—365
1054—1058	The war continued by Macbeth; his final defeat and
•	death	365366
1058	Ephemeral reign of Lulach; Malcolm King over all
	Scotland	366
	Erroneous popular conception of the war with Mac-	•
	beth ·	36 6
1054	State of the royal family; position of Ralph; of the	•
0,	•	367-370
	The Ætheling Eadward invited to England; import	5 -7 5 75
		370-372
July	Embassy of Ealdred and Ælfwine to the Emperor	37- 37-
•		372-374
	Death of Ongod Clapa	374
1055	Death of Earl Siward; his foundation at Galmanho;	317
	his son Waltheof	374-375
March	Tostig appointed Earl of the Northumbrians; novelty	917 - 3/D
		275270
		375—379

A. D.		PAG E
	Character and government of Tostiy; his personal favour with Eadward; legends about him and
	Harold	379-383
	Tostig's sworn brotherhood with Malcolm	384-385
March 20	Banishment of Ælfgar	385-386
	Ælfgar hires ships in Ireland; he ravages Herefordshire in alliance with Gruffydd	386388
October 24	Battle near Hereford; defeat of the English through the innovations of Earl Ralph	388390
	Gruffydd and Ælfgar sack and burn Hereford .	390-392
	Harold sent against the Welsh; comparison of his earlier and later Welsh campaigns	393-394
	Harold restores and fortifies Hereford	394-395
Christmas	Peace of Billingsley; general mildness of English
1055-1056	political warfare	395
	Ælfgar restored to his Earldom	396
Feb. 10,	Death of Æthelstan Bishop of Hereford; invasion of
1056	Magnus and Gruffydd	396—397
March 27—	Short and warlike episcopate of Leofgar of Hereford;
June 16	his death in battle; character of the war with
	Gruffydd	397—398
1056—1060	Raldred holds the See of Hereford with that of
_	Worcester	398
1056	Gruffydd reconciled to Eadward; his oath of homage;
	he is mulcted of his lands in Cheshire	398400
	Cooperation of Harold, Leofric, and Euldred .	400—401
6 2. Per	om Harold's first Campaign against Gruffydd to the Dea	the of
3 3 · 2 · ·	Leofric and Ralph. 1055—1057.
Christmas	Ecclesiastical affairs; Hermann of Ramsbury tries to 1055—1056	annex the Abbey of Malmesbury to his Bishoprick;
	11 1 11 1 1 1 1	401 — 40E
10561058		401—405
10501050		105-106
August 31,		405—406
1056	Death of Earl Odda	407
1056—1071	Æthelric of Durham resigns his See; succession of
•	his brother Æthelwine	407-408
1057	The Ætheling Eadward comes to England; his in-
		408-410
	Probable reasons why he never saw the King .	410-412
	Surmise of Sir F. Palgrave that Harold caused his	• death; its injustice	412-414
	Death of Heaca, Bishop of the South-Saxons;
	Æthelric succeeds	414

August 31	Death of Earl Leofric; fate of Godgifu	414-415
Dec. 21	Death of Earl Ralph; his possible pretensions to the
	Crown	415-416
Christmas	Redistribution of Earldoms; Ælfgar Earl of the 1057—1058	Mercians; marriage of his daughter Ealdgyth
	with Gruffydd	416
	Herefordshire added to Harold's Earldom; Harold
	the son of Ralph	417
	Gyrth Earl of the East-Angles and of Oxfordshire; policy of detached shires	418
	Leofwine Earl of Kent, Essex, &c. London not under any Earl	419
1058—1065	The House of Godwine at its highest point of greatness	419-420
	Harold's prospects of the Crown	420
	Position of Harold; effects of Eadward's promise to William; the candidates of the patriotic party,
	first the Ætheling, then Harold	420-422
	Quasi-royal position of Harold; probably no formal 424-427
	Harold chief ruler of England	427
	CHAPTER X.
	CHAPIER A.
THE REIGN O	of eadward, from the death of the ætheling to to the king. 1057—1066.	HE DEATH
§ 1. The	Ecclesiastical Administration of Earl Harold. 1058—	1062.
	Dominant position of Harold; predominance of ecclesiastical affairs; Harold in relation to the Church	428-430
1058 ?	Harold's pilgrimage to Rome; he studies the politics
-	of the French Princes on his way	430-431
1057—1061	Succession of Popes; Stephen the Ninth; Benedict
	the Tenth; Nicholas the Second	431-432
1058	Benedict probably in possession at the time of Harold's visit; he grants the pallium to Stigand, probably through Harold's influence	432 Temporary recognition of Stigand after his receipt of the pallium; the new Bishops Æthelric and Siward are consecrated by him	433
•		433-434
-	Second outlawry and return of Ælfgar	434-435
681—1058
	Eadric; Bishop Ealdred rebuilds and consecrates	_
	`the church and appoints Wulfstan Abbot	435-436

A.D.		PAGE
1058	Ealdred restores the See of Ramsbury to Hermann and makes the pilgrimage to Jerusalem	436-437
April 23,	Mannig resigns the abbacy of Evesham and is suc-
1059	ceeded by Æthelwig	437-438
	Deposition of Pope Benedict; its effect on the position of Stigand	439
May 3, 1060	Consecration of Harold's minster at Waltham .	439
	Nature and importance of the foundation; its character generally misunderstood	439-440
	Harold's acquisition of Waltham; he rebuilds the _	441-442
	Distinction between the foundation of secular colleges and of monasteries	442
	Harold's zeal for education; Adelard of Lüttich .	443-444 Continuance of the struggle between regulars and seculars; Harold a friend of the seculars; general	_
	witness to his character borne by the foundation .	444-446
	The church consecrated by Archbishop Cynesige;	_
_	the foundation charter dated two years later .	446447
Dec. 22	Death of Cynesige	447
Dec. 25	Ealdred appointed Archbishop of York in the Gemót
	at Gloucester	447-448
1060—1079	Ealdred resigns the See of Hereford and is succeeded	_ by Walter	448
1060—1088	•
	by Gisa	449450
	Later careers of Walter and Gisa; Gisa's changes at Wells; comparisons between the foundations of
4 • 9 · ·	Harold and Gisa	451—453
April 15, 1061	Gisa and Walter consecrated at Rome	453-454
April 18—	Death of Wulfric, Abbot of Saint Augustine's; his
May 26	successor Æthelsige receives the benediction from
•	Stigand	454-455
	Journey to Rome of Ealdred, Tostig, and Gyrth .	455—456
	Pope Nicolas confirms the privileges of Westminster,	יטד כטד but refuses the pallium to Ealdred, and deprives him of his See	456457
	Tostig and the Bishops robbed on their way home .	457
	They return to Rome, and the Pope yields the pal-	10,
	lium to the threats of Tostig	457-459
	Ill effects of the practice of pilgrimage; Malcolm	101 107 invades Northumberland during the absence of Tostig	459460
Lent, 1062	Vacancy of the See of Worcester; papal legates in
-	England	460461

A. D.		PAGI
	Ealdred hesitates between Abbot Æthelwig and Wulfstan Prior of Worcester	461-462
1012—1062	Life and character of Wulfstan	462-464
Easter 1062	Wulfstan elected Bishop; the election confirmed by the Witan	464-466
Sept. 8	Wulfstan consecrated by Ealdred, but makes profession to Stigand	466 -467
Easter	The King's charter to the College at Waltham .	467
1063	Ælfwig, uncle of Harold, appointed Abbot of New
	Minster	467-468
Ş	2. The Welsh War and its Consequences. 1062—1065.
1062	Renewed ravages of Gruffydd; probable death of Ælfgar, who is succeeded in his Earldom by his 468—469
Christmas	Gemót at Gloucester; Harold's sudden march to	4 4-9
1062-1063	Rhuddlan	468-470
	Harold's great Welsh campaign; its permanent effect	4 4/- on men's minds; testimony of John of Salisbury and of Giraldus Cambrensis	470-471
May 26,	Harold and Tostig invade Wales; Harold adopts	T/- T/-
1063	the Welsh tactics; all Wales reduced to submission	472-474
August 5	Gruffydd murdered by his own people
	The Welsh Kingdom granted to Bleddyn and Rhiwallon
	Alleged legislation about Wales	476-477
1064 ?	Harold marries Ealdgyth; the marriage probably a	110 411
•		477-478
August 1,	Harold builds a hunting-seat for Eadward at Port-	***
1065	skewet	479
August 24	Caradoc son of Gruffydd of South Wales kills the	****
••	workmen	480
		•
	§ 3. The Revolt of Northumberland. 1065.
	Oppressive government of Tostig in Northumberland	481
1064	Charges against him; murder of Gamel and Ulf .	482
Dec. 28	Murder of Gospatric in the King's Court; attributed	4
	to Tostig and Eadgyth	482
Oct. 3, 1065	Revolt of Northumberland; rebel Gemót at York	483
	Constitutional position of Northumberland; frequent	. •
		483-485
	Acts of the rebel Gemot; vote of deposition and outlawry against Tostig; Morkere elected Earl .	485
	Objects of Eadwine and Morkere; they aim at the	. 3 division of the Kingdom; constant treasons of Eadwine	486-487

	• CONTENTS.	xxvii
A. D.		PAGE
	Oswulf Earl in Bernicia or Northumberland .	487
	The Northumbrians put to death Amund and Reaven-	7-1
	swart .	488
October 4	General massacre of Tostig's followers and plunder	400
	of his treasury	489
	Morkere and the Northumbrians march to North-	409
•	hampton; Eadwine joins them; presence of Welsh-men in his army	480400
	Ravages of the Northumbrians in Northamptonshire	489490
	and the neighbouring shires	400 -407
	Negotiations between the King and the rebels;	490491
	Harold carries a summons to lay down their arms and submit their grievances to legal discussion .	491
	Answer of the Northumbrians	491—492
	Eadward holds a Gemót at Bretford; debates in the Council	492-493
	Tostig charges Harold with stirring up the revolt;
	Harold denies the charge on oath .	493—494
	Eadward's eagerness for war; he is kept back by
-	Harold and others	494-495
	Position of Harold; his public duty and private interest in the controversy; complete agreement 495—498
October 28	,
	firmed; Waltheof made Earl of Northamptonshire
	and Huntingdonshire; renewal of Cnut's Law .	498500
Nov. 1	Banishment of Tostig; he takes refuge in Flanders.	500501
	§ 4. The Last Days of Eadward. 1065—1066.
	Eadward's last sickness; his devotion to Saint Peter	501—503
1051—1065	The state of the s
	Apostle; reverse order of proceeding at West-
k =	minster and at Waltham	503—504
653—1051	Early history of Westminster	504—505
	Permanence of Eadward's minster and palace; existing remains of his buildings	506508
1065	Completion of the church; the first great example of Norman architecture in England	508—510
_	Legends	510-513
Sept. 1065	Consecration of Eadgyth's church at Wilton .	513
Dec. 25—28	Midwinter Gemót at Westminster; consecration of	U – U
	the church	513514
Jan. 5, 1066	Dooth of Fadmand	515
Jan. 6	Burial of Eadward and coronation of Harold	515
	Q	515516
		n-n 910

•

APPENDIX.

				PAGE
Note A.	The Election and Coronation of Eadward	•	•	517
В.	The Legendary History of Eadward.	•	•	525
C.	Eadward's Fondness for Foreign Churchm	en	•	535
D.	English and Norman Estimates of God	lwine	and
	Harold	•	•	536
E.	The Alleged Spoliations of the Church by	Godv	vine
	and Harold	•	•	543
F.	The Children of Godwine	•	•	552
G.	The Great Earldoms during the Reign of l	Eadwa	rd.	555
H.	The Legend of Emma	•	•	568
I.	The Welsh Campaign of 1049 .	•	•	571
K.	Danegeld and Heregeld	•	•	574
L.	The Banishment of Godwine	•	•	575
M.	The Surnames of William	•	•	581
N.	The Birth of William	•	•	583
0.	The Battle of Val-ès-dunes	•	•	590
P.	The Counts of Anjou and of Chartres	•	•	591
Q.	The Imprisonment of William of Aquitain	е.	•	594
R.	The Ravages attributed to Harold and God	lwine	•	596
8.	The Narratives of the Return of Godwine	•	•	598
T.	The Pilgrimage of Swegen	•	•	603
U.	The Ecclesiastical Position of Stigand	•	•	605
W.	The Death of Earl Godwine	•	•	608
X.	The War with Macbeth	•	•	613
Y.	The Mission of Ealdred and the Return of	he Æt	bel-
	ing Eadward	•	•	619
Z .	The Supposed Enmity between Harold and	l Tosti	g .	623
AA.	Æthelstan, Bishop of Hereford .	•	•	628
BB.	The Family of Leofric	•	•	629
CC.	Harold the Son of Ralph	•	•	632
DD.	The Quasi-Royal Position of Earl Harold	•	•	634
EE.	Harold's Foreign Travels and Pilgrimage	•	•	635
FF.	The Quarrel between Earl Harold and Bisl	hop Gi	3 a .	637
GG.	Ælfwig Abbot of New Minster .	•	•	644
HH.	The Revolt of Northumberland .			646

ADDITIONS AND CORRECTIONS.

- p. 14, note 4, for "manude" read "monude."
- p. 46, note I, for "men" read "man."
- p. 50, side-note, for "Earldom" read "Earldoms."
- p. 52, 1. 7. There is another writ which, though neither Northumberland nor any Northumbrian Earl is distinctly mentioned, is clearly meant to run in Northumberland more than anywhere else. This is the writ in Cod. Dipl. iv. 230, addressed, according to a form found elsewhere, to the Bishops, Earls, and Thegns of all those shires in which Archbishop Ealdred had any lands ("Eadward cyngc grét mine biscopas and mine eorlas and ealle myne begenas on Tam scyran Ter Ealdred ærcebisceop hæfet land inne freóndlice"). Among these shires Gloucestershire is doubtless included, but Yorkshire must have stood foremost.
  - p. 70, note 1. See p. 438.
- p. 82, 1. 5. There is an odd notice of Lyfing's plurality of Bishopricks in a deed in Cod. Dipl. vi. 195. It is a conveyance of lands to Sherborne made in a Scirgemót of Devonshire held at Exeter under the presidency of Earl Godwine. Lyfing is one of the witnesses, and he is described as "Lyfing bisceop be norðan," as if a Devonshire man's notions of Worcester were not very clear. Worcester was clearly the see which Lyfing loved best.
- p. 89, note 3. I ought here to have added another entry in the same folio of Domesday, which I knew perfectly well, but which did not catch my eye when I wrote this note. In the second column of fol. 180 are the words "Abbatissa tenet Fencote, et ipsa tenuit T. R. E." This, and the entry about "victus monialium," are the whole account of the monastery. This entry however may well agree with my view of the case. Fencote is but a small dependency of Leominster, and it was probably a portion set aside for Eadgifu's personal maintenance. If so, she survived her error forty years.
- p. 108, l. 14. Perhaps more accurately, in the Earldom of Ralph, under the superior authority of Leofric. See p. 563.
- p. 115, note 5. On seeming anachronisms of this kind see p. 634. Cf. p. 111, note 1.
- p. 134, note 2. On the bare possibility that Tostig may have held some subordinate government as early as this time, see p. 567,
- p. 165, l. 3. To prevent misconception, it may be needful to explain to some readers that there was a Napoleon Buonaparte, who was crowned at Paris (see vol. i. p. 268) and who died at Saint Helena, and who slew more men in unjust wars than probably any one man in Europe since Caius Julius Casar.

- p. 180, l. 11, for "so perilous an enterprise" read "the same perilous enterprise."
  - p. 209, l. 2, for "Princes" read "Prince."
  - p. 248, l. 15, after "half dressed" read "himself."
  - p. 249, note 3, for "of the Monasticon" read "in the Monasticon."
  - p. 278, note 1, for "contigerat" read "contigerat."
- p. 284, note 2. I have to thank my friend Mr. Dimock for the explanation that "accipiter" is the goshawk, while the sparrow-hawk is "nisus." From the point of view of the small birds the difference is perhaps not very important.
  - p. 287, note 2, for "than that at Alençon" read "than he was at Alençon."
  - p. 322, l. 24, after "from Kent" read "from Surrey."
  - p. 337, l. 17. See p. 602.
  - p. 342, note 2, for "filli" read "filii."
- p. 347, note 3. Of Ralph the Staller I shall have to speak more at large in my next volume. I suspect him to be the Ralph mentioned in the Chronicles under the year 1075.
- p. 349, note 2. On Leofric's plurality of abbeys see also the Peterborough Chronicle, 1066.
- p. 359, note 1. "Bundinus," that is Bondig, was an Englishman. I shall have to speak of him again.
  - p. 368, l. 8, for "around" read "beneath."
  - p. 373, l. 3, for "West-Frankish" read "East-Frankish."
  - p. 418, l. 4 from bottom, for "whenever" read "wherever."
  - p. 423, l. 8 from bottom, dele "indeed."
- p. 433, l. 15, for "fell vacant in the course of the year" read "were now vacant." It seems uncertain whether Heaca died in 1057 or in 1058 (see p. 414): if the former year is right, the see of Selsey must have remained vacant a year. As this is not likely, the expression in the text is probably true, but it is better to leave the matter uncertain.
  - Ib. note I, for "disposition" read "disposal."
- p. 436, l. 10. The three Wulfstans—Wulfstan, Bishop of Worcester, Archbishop of York, and founder of Gloucester Abbey—Wulfstan, monk of Worcester and Abbot of Gloucester—and Saint Wulfstan, Prior and Bishop of Worcester,—must be carefully distinguished from each other. All were alive at once, and the last two were strictly contemporary, and all had more or less to do with Worcester and Gloucester.
- p. 441, l. 8. I shall discuss in my third volume the possibility of this Esegar being the "Ansgardus" of Guy of Amiens. The idea had not occurred to me when I wrote this part of the text.
  - p. 448, l. 18, for "two" read "four" = 1056-1060.
  - p. 451, note 6. On this Azor and others of the name, see p. 642.
  - p. 461, note 5, for "436" read "438."
  - p. 465, note 5, for "1262" read "1062."
- p. 467, note 3. This charge against Ealdred is confirmed by the entries in Domesday, 164 b. "Eldred archiepiscopus tenuit Stanedis. De dominio Sancti Petri de Glouvecestre fuit." "Sanctus Petrus de Glouvecestre tenuit Lecce, et Eldred archiepiscopus tenuit cum abbatia." Both these are lord-ships in Gloucestershire, which were still held by the see of York at the time of the Survey. It is not so clear when we read of a third lordship in the same list; "Eldredus archiepiscopus tenuit Otintune. . . . Thomas archiepiscopus tenet. Sanctus Petrus de Glouvecestre habuit in dominio donec Rex Willelmus in Angliam venit." Does this mean that Ealdred, who was, for some time at least, in William's favour, continued his spoliations of the monks of Gloucester after his accession?

, .w.e.

- p. 479, l. 12, for "seem well" read "well seem." See p. 651.
- p. 487, l. 9, and 497, l. 19. See p. 651.
- p. 511, l. 16. The Bishop meant would doubtless be Stigand as Bishop of the diocese; by the same showing the Abbot would most likely be Harold's uncle Ælfwig, the Abbot of the neighbouring house of New Minster.
  - p. 531, l. 24. Cf. Ovid, Metamorph. x. 467;
    - "Forsitan ætatis quoque nomine, Filia, dicat."
  - p. 541, l. 10, for "this" read "his."
  - p. 545, l. 7, for againt" read "against."
- p. 553, l. 14. The list in the Knytlirga Saga, c. 11, is no less strange; Harold, Tostig, "Maurakaare," Waltheof, and Swend.
- p. 598, l. 9 from bottom, for "late" read "later," and in last line but one dele "than."
  - p. 607, l. 11 from bottom, for "presente" read "presentem."
  - p. 611, l. 13 from bottom, for "minded" read "reminded."

THE HISTORY

OF THE

NORMAN CONQUEST OF ENGLAND.

vol. 11.

CHAPTER VII.

FROM THE ELECTION OF RADWARD TO THE BANISHMENT OF GODWINE.1 1042-1051.

WE have thus far gone through the course of those events which acted as the more distant causes of the Norman Conquest; with the accession of Eadward we <sup>1</sup> Among our authorities for this period the English Chronicles of course still retain their preeminent place, and the differences, especially the marked differences in political feeling, between the various versions become of constantly increasing importance. Florence also, always valuable, now increases in value. ' His narrative is still grounded on that of the Chronicles, but he gradually ceases to be a mere copyist. It is always of moment to see which of the several versions he follows; and, as he draws nearer his own time, he gradually acquires the character of a distinct authority. He can however hardly be looked on as such during the period embraced in this Chapter. The contemporary Biographer of Eadward now becomes of the greatest value in his own special department. For all matters which are strictly personal to the King, the Lady, and the whole family of Godwine, his authority is primary. He is however very distinctly not an historian, but a biographer, sometimes a laureate. In his narrative there are many omissions and some inaccuracies; his value lies mainly in his vivid personal portraits of the great men of the time, with all of whom he seems to have been personally acquainted. It must be borne in mind that his book, dedicated to the Lady Eadgyth, is to a great extent a panegyric on her family. Still it is highly important to have this description of them from the English side to set against the dominant Norman calumnies. It is to the Chronicles as harmonized by Florence that we must go for our main facts; the Biographer gives us their personal aspect, their personal colouring, and many personal details. Just as the Encomiast of Eadgyth becomes of so much value, we lose the Encomiast of Emma, who ends his narrative with the accession of Harthacnut. The purely Norman writers now gain in importance. But, as regards purely English affairs, their importance is of this peculiar kind, that, after reading the English account of any fact, it is needful to turn gle between Normans and Englishmen begins with the accession of Eadward.

CHAP. VII. stand on the threshold of the Conquest itself. The actual The strug- subjugation of England by force of arms is still twentyfour years distant; but the struggle between Norman and Englishman for dominion in England has already That such would be the result of Eadward's begun. accession was certainly not looked for by those who raised him to the throne. Never was any prince called to assume a crown by a more distinct expression of the national will. "All folk chose Eadward to King." The choice expressed the full purpose of the English nation to endure no King but one who was their bone and their No attachment to the memory of the great Cnut flesh. could survive the utter misgovernment of his sons. The thought of another Danish King was now hateful. the royal house of Denmark contained at least one prince who was in every way worthy to reign. Could the Import of Eadward's election : resolve of the English people to have none but an English King.

> and see what is the Norman perversion of it. At the head of the class stands William of Poitiers, Archdeacon of Lisieux, the chaplain and biographer of William the Conqueror. His work, unluckily imperfect, is our primary authority for all that concerns his hero; but allowance must be made throughout for his constant flattery of his own master and his frantic hatred towards Godwine and Harold. The later Norman writers, William of Jumièges and his continuator, and the poetical chroniclers, Robert Wace and Benoft de Sainte More, are of use as witnessing to Norman tradition, but they do not yet assume that special value which belongs to William of Jumièges and Wace at a somewhat later time. The subsidiary English writers, and the occasional notices to be found in the works of foreign historians, retain the same secondary value as before. Indeed, as Scandinavian affairs are of great importance during several years of this period, the Sagas of Magnus and Harold Hardrada may be looked upon as of something more than secondary value. Among the secondary English writers, Henry of Huntingdon diminishes in importance, as he gets more out of the reach of those ancient ballads and traditions which it is his great merit to have preserved. On the other hand, the value of William of Malmesbury increases, as he draws nearer to his own time. He often sets before us two versions of a story, and makes an attempt at a critical comparison of them. But his prejudices are distinctly Norman, and his utter lack of arrangement, his habit of dragging in the most irrelevant tales at the most important points of his narrative, makes him one of the most perplexing of writers to consult.

national feeling have endured another Danish ruler, Swend OHAP. VII. Estrithson might have governed England as prudently Other possible and as prosperously as he afterwards governed Denmark. candidates; But the great qualities of Swend had as yet hardly shown Estrithson; themselves. He could have been known at this time only as a young adventurer, who had signally failed in the only great exploit which he had attempted. And, above all things, the feeling of the moment called for an Englishman, for an Ætheling of the blood of Cerdic. One such Ætheling only was at hand. One son of Eadmund Eadward Ironside was now grown up to manhood, but he had been Eadmund. from his infancy an exile in a distant land. Most likely no one thought of him as a possible candidate for the Crown; it may well be that his very existence was generally forgotten. In the eyes of Englishmen there Position of was now only one representative of the ancient royal Eadward. Eadward, the son of Æthelred and Emma, the brother of the murdered and half-canonized Ælfred, had long been familiar to English imaginations, and, since the accession of his half-brother Harthacnut, the English Court had been his usual dwelling-place. Eadward, and Eadward alone, stood forth as the heir of English royalty, the representative of English nationality. In his behalf the popular voice spoke out at once and unmistakeably. "Before the King buried were, all folk chose Eadward to King at London."

§ 1. The Election and Coronation of Eadward. 1042-1043.

The general course of events at this time is perfectly Popular plain, but there is a good deal of difficulty as to some Eadward. of the details.<sup>2</sup> The popular election of Eadward took June, 1042. place in June, immediately on the death of Harthacnut,

&lt;sup>1</sup> See vol. i. p. 589.
<sup>2</sup> On the different statements, see Appendix A.

OHAP. VII. and even before his burial; but it is very remarkable that His coronation delayed till the next year. Importance of the coronationrite.

the coronation of the new King did not take place till Easter in the next year. This delay is singular, and needs explanation. The consecration of a King was then not a mere pageant, but a rite of the utmost moment, partaking almost of a sacramental character. Without it the King was not King at all, or King only in a very imperfect We have seen how impossible it was for the uncrowned Harthacnut to retain his hold upon Wessex.2 The election of the Witan gave to the person chosen the sole right to the Crown, but he was put into actual possession of the royal office only by the ecclesiastical consecra-Eadward then, for nearly ten months after his first election, could not be looked on as "full King," 3 but as at most King-elect. What could be the cause of such a delay? The notion of a general war with the Danes in England, which might otherwise account for it, I have elsewhere shown to be without foundation.4 The circumstances of the time would seem to have been singularly unsuited for any delay. We should have expected that the same burst of popular feeling which carried Eadward's immediate and unanimous election would also have demanded the exclusion of any possible competitor by an immediate coronation. But the fact was otherwise. The explanation of so singular a state of things is most likely to be found in certain hints which imply that it was caused, partly by Eadward's absence from England, partly by an unwillingness on his part to accept the Crown. There is strong reason to believe that Eadward was not in England at the the Crown. moment of his half-brother's death. Harthacnut had indeed recalled him to England, and his court had become the English Ætheling's ordinary dwelling-place. But this fact in no way shuts out the possibility that Eadward

Probable causes of the delay; Eadward most likely absent from England, and unwilling so accept

&lt;sup>1</sup> Chronn. and Flor. Wig. 1043.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Vol. i. p. 560.

&lt;sup>3</sup> See vol. i. p. 396.

<sup>4</sup> Vol. i. p. 592.

may have been absent on the Continent at any particular CHAP. VII. moment, on a visit to some of his French or Norman friends, or on a pilgrimage to some French or Norman sanctuary. Meanwhile the sudden death of Harthacnut left the throne vacant. As in other cases before and after, the citizens of London, whose importance grows at every step, together with such of the other Witan as were at hand, met at once and chose Eadward King. As he was absent, and his consent was doubtful, an embassy Embassy had to be sent to him, as embassies had been sent to his to Eadfather Æthelred 2 and to his brother Harthacnut,3 inviting him to return and receive the Crown. That embassy, we are told, consisted of Bishops and Earls; we can hardly doubt that at the head of their several orders stood two men whom all accounts set before us as the leaders in the promotion of Eadward. These were Lyfing, Bishop of Worcester, and Godwine, Earl of the West-Saxons.4 A re-Negotiamarkable negotiation now took place between the Earl and tween the King-elect. Details of private conversations are always Eadward suspicious, but the dialogue attributed to the Earl and the wine. Ætheling contains nothing but what is thoroughly suited to the circumstances of the case. We can fully understand that Eadward, either from timidity or from his monastic turn, might shrink from the labour and responsibility of reigning at all, and that, with his Norman tastes, he might look forward with very little satisfaction to the prospect of reigning over Englishmen. Such scruples

&lt;sup>1</sup> As at the election of Eadmund Ironside, vol. i. p. 419. So, after the fall of Harold the son of Godwine, the citizens of London were foremost in choosing the young Eadgar King. Fl. Wig. 1066. The expression of "all folk," and the extreme haste at a time when the Witan seem not to have been sitting, point to an election of this kind, forestalling the next ordinary Gemót.

&lt;sup>3</sup> Vol. i. p. 568. <sup>2</sup> Vol. i. p. 404.

Lyfing's share in the business comes from Florence; "Eadwardus, annitentibus maxime Comite Godwino et Wigornensi Præsule Livingo, Lundoniæ levatur in Regem."

CHAP. VII. were driven away by the arguments and eloquence of the Speech of Godwine.

great Earl. The actual speech put into his mouth may be the composition of the historian, but it contains the arguments which cannot fail to have been used in such a case. It was better to live gloriously as a King than to die ingloriously in exile. Eadward was the son of Æthelred, the grandson of Eadgar; the Crown was therefore his natural inheritance. His personal position and character would form a favourable contrast to those of the two worthless youths who had misgoverned England since the death of Cnut. His years and experience fitted him to rule; he was of an age to act vigorously when severity was needed; he had known the ups and downs of life; he had been purified by poverty and exile, and would therefore know how to show mercy when mercy was called for.<sup>3</sup> If he had any doubts, he, Godwine, was ready to maintain his cause; his power was great enough both to procure the election of a candidate, and to secure his throne when elected.3 Eadward was persuaded; he consented to accept the Crown; he plighted his friendship to the Earl, and it may be that he promised to confer honours on his sons and to take his daughter in marriage. But stories of private stipulations of this kind are always doubtful. It is enough that Godwine had, as all accounts agree, the chief hand in raising Eadward to the throne.

Eadward accepts the Crown.

Eadward now seems to have returned to England, He returns to Engprobably in company with Godwine and the other amland.

<sup>1</sup> This contrast is not directly stated, but it seems implied in the reference to the age and experience of Eadward.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Will. Malms. ii. 196. "Jure ei competere regnum, ævi maturo, laboribus defecato, scienti administrare principatum per estatem severè, miserias provincialium [Harthacnut's Danegeld?] pro pristina egestate temperare."

* Ib. "Quo se pronior inclinaverit, eo fortunam vergere; si auxilietur, neminem ausurum obstrepere, et è converso."

bassadors. The Witan presently met at Gillingham OHAP. VII. in Wiltshire; and it would seem that the acceptance of Witena-Eadward's claims was now somewhat less unanimous than Gillingit had been during the first burst of enthusiasm which 1042-3. followed the death of Harthacnut. Godwine brought forward Eadward as a candidate, he urged his claims with all his powers of speech, and himself set the example of becoming his man on the spot. Still an opposition arose Opposition in the Assembly, which it needed all the eloquence of ward's Godwine and Lyfing to overcome. They had even, as election; it would seem, to stoop to a judicious employment of the less noble arts of statesmanship. The majority indeed were won over by the authority of the man whom all England looked on as a father. But the votes of some had to be gained by presents, or, in plain words, by bribes.2 Others, it would seem, stood out against Eadward's election to the last. This opposition, we cannot apparently doubt, came from a Danish party which supported the interest of claims of Swend Estrithson. That prince, on return Swend. from his first unsuccessful war with Magnus, had found his cousin Harthacnut dead, and Eadward already King as far as his first election could make him so.3 But the delay of the coronation, the uncertainty of Eadward's acceptance of the Crown, might well make the hopes of Swend and his partisans revive. We can hardly believe Alleged nethe tale, though it rests apparently on the assertion of gotiations Swend himself, that he demanded the Crown, and that Eadward and Eadward made peace with him, making the usual com-Swend. promise that Swend should succeed him on his death, even though he should leave sons.4 Such an agreement would of course be of no force without the consent of

&lt;sup>1</sup> Vita Eadw. 394. "Quoniam pro patre ab omnibus habebatur, in paterno consultu libenter audiebatur." Will. Malms. ii. 197. "Quidam auctoritatem ejus secuti."

&lt;sup>2</sup> Will. Malms. u. s. "Quidam muneribus flexi."

CHAP. VII. the Witan. That consent may have been given in the Assembly at Gillingham; but such an arrangement seems hardly credible. The English nation no doubt fully intended that the Crown should remain in the House of Cerdic, and Godwine probably already hoped that in the next generation the blood of Cerdic would be united with the blood of Wulfnoth. But it is certain that Swend was in some way or other reconciled to Eadward and Godwine, for we shall presently find Swend acting as the friend of England, and Godwine acting as the special champion of the interests of Swend.1 The son of Ulf was, it will be remembered, the nephew of Gytha, and this family connexion no doubt pleaded for him as far as was consistent with Godwine's higher and nearer objects. One of Swend's brothers, Beorn, remained in England, where he was soon raised to a great Earldom, and seems to have been counted in all respects as a member of the house of Godwine. But the friends of Swend in general were set down for future punishment.2 In the end confiscation or banishment fell on the most eminent of them. them was Osbeorn, another brother of the Danish King, whom we shall hear of in later times as betraying the claims of his brother, and therewith the hopes of England, into the hand of the Norman Conqueror.

Eadward the only possible choice.

Eadward was thus raised to the throne mainly through the exertions of the two patriotic leaders, Godwine and Lyfing. It is vain to argue whether Godwine did wisely in pressing his election. There was in truth no other choice. The only other possible candidates were Swend, and Magnus of Norway, of whose claims we shall hear again presently. But English feeling called for an English King, and there was no English King but Eadward

<sup>1</sup> See below under the years 1045 and 1047.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Will. Malms. ii. 197. "Et hinc censoriè notati et postmodum ab Anglia expulsi."

to be had. That Godwine could have procured his own CHAP. VII. election to the Crown, that the thought of such an election could have occurred to himself or to any one else, is an utterly wild surmise.1 If Godwine met with some opposition when pressing the claims of Eadward, that opposition would have increased tenfold had he ventured to dream of the Crown for himself. The nomination of the West-Saxon Earl would have been withstood to the death, not only by a handful of Danes, but by Leofric and Siward, probably, in Siward's case at least, at the head of the whole force of their Earldoms. The time was not yet come for the election of a King not of the royal house. There was no manifest objection to the election of Eadward, and, though Godwine was undoubtedly the most powerful man in England, he had not reached that marked and undisputed preeminence which was enjoyed by his son twenty-four years later. No English candidate but Eadward was possible. And men had not yet learned, Godwine himself probably had not fully learned, how little worthy Eadward was to be called an English candidate.2 And when in after years they learned the unhappy truth, still there does not seem to have been at any time the least thought of displacing Eadward in favour of either of his Scandinavian competitors, or even of calling in Swend to succeed him. In raising Eadward to the throne, Godwine acted simply as the mouth-piece of the English people. The opposition, as far as we can see, came wholly from the Danes of what we may call the second importation, those who had come

&lt;sup>1</sup> Thierry, i. 180. St. John, ii. 132.

Henry of Huntingdon indeed (M. H. B. 759 A) hints at a suspicion of Eadward's Normannizing tendencies, when he makes the English embassy stipulate that he shall bring the smallest possible number of Normans with him ("quod paucissimos Normannorum secum adduceret"). But Henry's narrative just here is so very wild that it is not safe to rely on his authority.

CHAP. VII. into England with Cnut and Harthacnut. There is nothing to show that the old-settled Danish population of Northumberland acted apart from the rest of the country.

Claims of Eadward to the Crown; different of his right according to the political views of the writers.

Eadward then was King. He reigned, as every English King before him had reigned, by that union of popular election and royal descent which formed the essence of statements all ancient Teutonic kingship.1 But it would seem that, even in those days, the two elements in his title, the two principles to whose union he and all other Kings owed their kingly rank, spoke with different degrees of force to different minds. Already, in the eleventh century, we may say that there were Whigs and Tories in England. At any rate there were men in whose eyes the choice of _ the people was the primary and legitimate source of kingship. There were also men who were inclined to rest the King's claim to his Crown mainly on his descent from those who had been Kings before him. The difference is plainly shown in the different versions of the Chronicles. One contemporary writer, a devoted partisan of Godwine, grounds the King's right solely on the popular choice—"All folk chose Eadward to King." That the entry was made at the time is plain from the prayer which follows, "May he hold it while God grants it to him." 2 Another version, the only one in any degree hostile to the great Earl, seems purposely to avoid the use of any word recognizing a distinct right of choice in the people. "All folk received Eadward to King, as was his right by birth."3 μή σέ γ' ἐν ἀμφιάλφ 'Ιθάκη βασιλῆα Κρονίων ποιήσειεν, 8 τοι γενεή πατρώτον έστι.

See Gladstone, Homer, iii. 51.

&lt;sup>1</sup> See vol. i. p. 117.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Chron. Petrib. 1041. "Eall folc geceas Eadward to cynge on Lundene; healde þa hwile þe him God unne." (Cf. Hen. Hunt. M. H. B. 759 A. "Electus est in Regem ab omni populo.") This prayer is the opposite to that of Antinoos, Od. i. 386:—

&lt;sup>3</sup> Chron. Ab. 1042. "Eall folc underfeng & Eadward to cinge, swa him gecynde wæs." "Right of birth" does not very well express

A third writer, distinctly, though less strongly, Godwinist, CHAP. VII. seems pointedly to combine both statements; "All folk chose Eadward, and received him to King, as was his right by birth." There can be no doubt that this last is the truest setting forth both of the law and of the facts of the case. The people chose Eadward, and without the choice of Union of the people he would have had no right to reign. But they and here. chose him because he was the one available descendant of ditary right. the old kingly stock, because he was the one man at hand who enjoyed that preference by right of birth, which required that, in all ordinary cases, the choice of the electors should be confined to the descendants of former Kings. It might therefore be said with perfect truth that Eadward was chosen because the Kingdom was his by right of birth. But it must not be forgotten, what is abso- Eadward lutely necessary for the true understanding of the case, not next in that this right by birth does not imply that Eadward according to modern would have been, according to modern ideas, the next in notions. succession to the Crown. Eadward's right by birth would have been no right by birth at all in the eyes of a modern lawyer. The younger son of Æthelred could, according to our present ideas, have no right to succeed while any representative of his elder brother survived. The heir, in our sense of the word, was not the Eadward who was close at hand in England or Normandy, but the Eadward

"gecynde," but I do not see how better to translate it. The word occurs again in Chron. Wig. 1066, as applied to young Eadgar. It will be remembered that the Abingdon Chronicle is the only one which charges Godwine with a share in the death of Ælfred. See vol. i. pp. 545, 546. The Biographer (p. 396) speaks of Eadward as reigning "ex Dei gratia et hæreditario jure." This is of course a courtier's view. "Hæreditario jure" must here mean a right derived from ancestors, not a right to be handed on to descendants, as must be the meaning of the words in the Waltham Charter, Cod. Dipl. iv. 154.

1 Chron. Wig. 1042. "Eall folc geceas be Eadward, and underfengon hine to kyninge, callswa him wel gecynde wæs." This expression is the exact counterpart of that of Rudolf Glaber describing the election of Lewis in 946. See vol. i. p. 224.

CHAP. VII. who was far away in exile in Hungary or Russia. Modern writers constantly speak of this last Eadward and of his son Eadgar as the lawful heirs of the Confessor. On the contrary, according to modern notions, the Confessor was their lawful heir, and, according to modern notions, the Confessor must be pronounced to have usurped a throne which of right belonged to his nephew. In his own time The right of the elder branch not such subtleties were unknown. Any son of Æthelred, any thought of descendant of the old stock, satisfied the sentiment of royal birth, which was all that was needed.1 To search over the world for the son of an elder brother, while the younger brother was close at hand, was an idea which would never have entered the mind of any Englishman of the eleventh century.

Eadward crowned at Winchester, April 3, 1043.

Exhortation of Eadsige; condition of the Kingdom.

The coronation ceremony probably followed soon after the meeting at Gillingham. It was performed on Easter Day at Winchester,2 the usual place for an Easter Gemót, by Archbishop Eadsige, assisted by Ælfric of York and most of the other Prelates of England.3 We are expressly told that the Metropolitan gave much good exhortation both to the newly-made King and to his people.4 The peculiar circumstances of the time might well suggest such a special admonition. There was a King, wellnigh the last of his race, a King chosen by the distinct expression of the will of the people, as the representative of

<sup>2</sup> Chron. Flor. Wig. See Appendix A. <sup>8</sup> Flor. Wig.

With the expressions used about the succession of Eadward compare the still stronger expressions used by Florence about the succession of Eadred in 946; "Proximus hæres Edredus, fratri succedens, regnum naturale [gecynde] suscepit." Yet Eadmund left two sons, both of whom afterwards reigned.

<sup>4</sup> Chron. Ab. and Petrib. "Eadsige arcebisceop hine halgade, and toforan eallum bam folce wel lærde, and to his agenre neode and ealles folces wel manude." So Will. Malms. ii. 197; "Ab Edsio archiepiscopo sacra regnandi precepta edoctus, que ille tunc memoria libenter recondidit, et postea sanctè factis propalavit."

English nationality in opposition to foreign rule. But CHAP. VII. the King so chosen as the embodiment of English feeling was himself an Englishman in little more than in the accident of being born on English ground 1 as the son of a father who was a disgrace to the English name. There was a Kingdom to be guarded against foreign claimants, and there were the wounds inflicted by two unfortunate, though happily short, reigns to be healed at home. The duties which were laid upon the shoulders of the new King were neither few nor easy. He had Relations indeed at hand the mightiest and wisest of guardians between Eadward to help him in his task. But we can well understand and God-wine. that the feelings of Eadward towards the man to whom he owed his Crown were feelings of awe rather than of There could be little real sympathy between the stout Englishman and the nursling of the Norman court, between the chieftain great alike in battle and in council and the timid devotee who shrank from the toils and responsibilities of an earthly Kingdom. And we can well believe that, notwithstanding Godwine's solemn acquittal, there still lingered in the mind of Eadward some prejudice against the man who had once been charged with his brother's death. And again, though it was to Godwine Relations. and his West-Saxons that Eadward mainly owed his three great Crown, yet Godwine and his West-Saxons did not make Earls. up the whole of England. Their counsels and interests had to be reconciled with the possibly opposing counsels and interests of the other Earldoms and of their rulers. Eadward could not afford to despise the strong arm of the mighty Dane who ruled his countrymen north of the Humber. He could not afford to despise the possible prejudices of the great Earl of central England, who, descendant of ancient Ealdormen, perhaps of ancient Kings,

&lt;sup>1</sup> At Githslep, now Islip, in Oxfordshire. Cod. Dipl. iv. 215.

CHAP. VII. may well have looked with some degree of ill-will on the upstarts North and South of him. Eadward, called to the throne by the unanimous voice of the whole nation, was bound to be King of the English and not merely King of the West-Saxons. He was bound yet more strongly to be King of the English in a still higher sense, to cast off the trammels of his Norman education, and to reign as became the heir of Ælfred and Æthelstan. We have now to see how far the good exhortations of Eadsige were effectual; how far the King chosen to the Crown which was his right by birth discharged the duties which were laid upon him alike by his birth and by his election.

Foreign Ambassadors at Eadward's coronation.

It was perhaps ominous of the character of Eadward's future reign that his coronation was attended by an apparently unusual assemblage of the Ambassadors of foreign princes.1 It was natural that Eadward should be better known, and that his election should awaken a greater interest, in other lands than could usually be the case with an English King. He was connected by birth or marriage with several continental sovereigns, and his long residence in Normandy must have brought him more nearly within Eadward's the circle of ordinary continental princeship than could connexions. commonly be the case with the Lord of the island Empire, the Cæsar as it were of another world. The revolutions of England also, and the great career of Cnut, had evidently fixed the attention of Europe on English affairs to an unusual degree. Add to this that, when a King was chosen and crowned immediately on the death of his predecessor, the presence of congratulatory embassies from other princes was hardly possible. But the delay in Eadward's consecration allowed that great Easter-feast at Winchester to be adorned with the presence of the representatives of all the chief sovereigns of Western foreign

Christendom. Some there were whom England was, then OHAP. VII. as ever, bound to welcome as friends and brethren, and some whose presence, however friendly was the guise of the moment, might to an eye which could scan the future have seemed a foreboding of the evil to come. First came Ambassathe ambassadors of the prince who at once held the highest King place on earth and adorned it with the noblest display of Henry. every kingly virtue. King Henry of Germany, soon to appear before the world as the illustrious Emperor, the great reformer of a corrupted Church, sent an embassy to congratulate his brother-in-law 2 on the happy change in his fortunes, to exchange promises of peace and friendship, and to present gifts such as Imperial splendour and liberality might deem worthy of the one prince whom a future Emperor could look on as his peer.3 The King from the of the French too, a prince bearing the same name as the the French; mighty Frank,4 but far indeed from being a partaker in his glory, sent his representatives to congratulate one whom he too claimed as a kinsman,5 and to exchange pledges of mutual good-will between the two realms. And, along with the representatives of Imperial and royal from other majesty, came the humbler envoys of the chief Dukes and French and princes of their two kingdoms, charged with the like princes;

&lt;sup>1</sup> Vita Eadw. 395. "Primus ipse Romanorum Imperator Heinricus,"&c. But Henry was not crowned Emperor till 1047. Hermannus Contractus in anno.

&lt;sup>2</sup> On the marriage of Henry and Gunhild, see vol. i. pp. 505, 559.

Vita Eadw. 395. "Munera imperiali liberalitate exhibenda mittit, et que tantos decebat terrarum dominos." Æthelred of Rievaux (X Scriptt. 375), who seems here to copy the Biographer, says the same.

&lt;sup>4</sup> Vita Eadw. 395. "Rex quoque Francorum item Heinricus nomine."

Ib. "Ejusdem Anglorum Regis vicina carnis propinquitate consanguineus." The Biographer throughout makes the most of his hero, but there is a marked difference in his tone towards the German King and towards any other prince. The expression "terrarum domini," reserved for the lords of the continental and the insular Empires, is most remarkable. I am at a loss to see what kindred there was between Eadward and Henry of Paris.

CHAP. VII. professions of friendship—our flattering historian would fain have us believe, of homage.1 Among these we can hardly doubt that a mission from the Court of Rouen held a distinguished place. It may be that, even then, the keen eye of the youthful Norman was beginning to look with more than a neighbour's interest upon the land to which he had in some sort given her newly-chosen King. We from Mag- are even told that an embassy of a still humbler kind was nus of received from a potentate who soon after appeared on the Denmark. stage in a widely different character. Magnus of Norway had received the submission of Denmark on the death of Harthacnut, by virtue of the treaty by which each of those princes was to succeed to the other's dominions.2 He now, > we are told, sent an embassy to Eadward, chose him as his father,3 promised to him the obedience of a son, and in the language used with regard both to Magnus and to the German and French princes, there is doubtless much of the exaggeration of a panegyrist, anxious to raise his strengthened the promise with oaths and hostages.

> <sup>1</sup> Vita Eadw. 395. "Ceteri quoque corumdem Regum tyranni [a very singular expression] et quique potentissimi duces et principes, legatis suis eum adeunt, amicum et dominum sibi suisque constituunt, eique fidelitatem et servitium suum in manus ponunt." Is this merely the flourish of an English Dudo (cf. the talk about Cnut, vol. i. p. 504), or did any foreign princes really plight a formal homage to Eadward in exchange for his gifts and favours? In the later feudalism such a relation would not be impossible.

<sup>2</sup> See vol. i. p. 566. For the submission of Denmark to Magnus, see Adam of Bremen, ii. 74, 75. Snorro, Saga of Magnus, c. 19 (Laing, ii. 377). Adam however represents Magnus' first occupation of Denmark as the result of several battles with Swend, while Snorro makes Magnus be peacefully elected in a Thing at Viborg, after which he makes Swend an Earl and leaves him as his representative in Denmark.

<sup>3</sup> Vita Eadw. 395. "Patrem eum sibi eligit, seque ut filium illi in omnibus subjicit." Compare the famous form of the Commendation of Wales and Scotland to a greater Eadward, vol. i. pp. 60, 129. The monastic biographer of Eadward gives quite another picture, by way of preparation for his legendary account of the death of Magnus; "Sola tamen Dacia, adhuc spirans et anhelans cædes, Anglorum interitum minabatur, verum quis fuerit tanti conatus finis sequentia declarabunt." Æthel. Riev. X Scriptt. 375.

hero's reputation to the highest point. But it is possible CHAP. VII. that Magnus might just now take some pains to conciliate Eadward, in order to hinder English help from being continued to his competitor Swend. In the reception of the Imperial and the Danish envoys there is nothing which has any special meaning; but it is specially characteristic of this reign that the congratulations of the French princes Eadward's gifts to the were acknowledged by gifts from the King personally, French and that some of them were continued in the form of princes. annual pensions. These were undoubtedly, even if the Norman Duke himself was among the pensioners, the gifts of a superior to inferiors; the point is that the connexion between England and the different French states, Normandy above them all, was constantly increasing in amount, and receiving new shapes at every turn.

Besides the gifts of foreign princes, the new King also Gifts of the received many splendid presents from his own nobles. First among them all shone forth the magnificent offering of the Earl of the West-Saxons.<sup>2</sup> Godwine had given Godwine presents a ship to Harthacnut as the price of his acquittal on his ship to the memorable trial; he now made the like offering to King. Eadward as a token of the friendship which was to reign between the newly-chosen King and his greatest subject. Two hundred rowers impelled the floating castle. A golden lion adorned the stern; at the prow the national ensign,

&lt;sup>1</sup> Vita Eadw. 395. "Mittuntur singulis pro celsitudine sua ab ipso Rege regalia munera, que ut nullius quamlibet multiplex Regis vel principis umquam sequaret munificentia, Regum pulcherrimus et nobilissimus Anglorum Rex Ædwardus facit eisdem Francorum principibus vel annua vel continua." The money seems all to go to France, none to Germany or Denmark.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Vita Eadw. 397.

&quot;Multa dedere quidem, verum supereminet omnes Larga Ducis probitas Godwini munere talis [tali !]." The Biographer here, as often, breaks forth into hexameters.

&lt;sup>3</sup> Mr. Luard seems to think this ship a mere repetition of the ship given to Harthacnut. Why?

onar. vii. the West-Saxon Dragon, shone also in gold, spreading his wings, the poet tells us, over the awe-struck waves. A rich piece of tapestry, wrought on a purple ground with the naval exploits of former English Kings, the sea-fights, no doubt, of Ælfred, the peaceful triumphs of Eadgar, perhaps that noblest fight of all when the fleets of Denmark gave way before the sea-faring men of the merchant-city, formed an appropriate adornment of the offering of the English Earl to the first—men did not then deem that he was to be the last—prince of the newly-restored English dynasty.

§ 2. Condition of England during the early years of Eadward.

Character of Ead-ward.

Before we go on to the events of the reign of Eadward, it will be well to endeavour to gain a distinct idea of the King himself and of the men who were to be the chief actors in English affairs during his reign. In estimating the character of Eadward, we must never forget that we are dealing with a canonized saint. In such cases it is more needful than ever to look closely to a man's recorded acts, and to his character as described by those who wrote before his formal canonization. Otherwise we shall be in danger of mistaking hagiology for history.

His position as a Saint.

1 Vita Eadw. 307.

<sup>2</sup> Ib.

"Aureus è puppi leo prominet; sequora prorse Celsse pennato perterret corpore draco
Aureus, et linguis flammam vomit ore trisulcis."
Were the dragon and the lion thus coupled to express Eadward's mixed origin, English and Norman;

"Nobilis appensum pretiatur purpura velum, Quo patrum series depicta docet varias res, Bellaque nobilium turbata per sequora Regum."

For instances of historical tapestry see vol. i. p. 303.

<sup>3</sup> See vol. i. p. 307.

When a man is once canonized, his acts and character OHAP. VII. immediately pass out of the reach of ordinary criticism. Religious edification, and not historical truth, becomes the aim of all who speak or write of one who has been formally enrolled as an object of religious reverence.1 We must also be on our guard even in dealing with authors who wrote before his formal canonization, but after that popular canonization which was so often the first step towards it. It was of course the general reverence in which a man was held, the general belief in his holiness and miraculous powers, which formed the grounds of the demand for his formal canonization. But, while we must be specially on our guard in weighing the character of particular acts and the value of particular panegyrics, we must remember that the popular esteem which thus led to canonization proves a great deal as to a man's general character. It proves still more when, Nature of as in the case of Eadward, there was no one special act, his claims to sanctity. no one marked deed of Christian heroism or Christian endurance, which formed the holy man's claim to popular reverence. Eadward was not like one of those who died for their faith or for their country, and who, on the strength of such death, were at once revered as martyrs, without much inquiry into their actions and characters in other respects. He was not even like one of those, his sainted uncle and namesake for instance,2 who gained the honours of martyrdom on still easier terms, by simply dying an unjust death, even though no religious or political principle was at stake. The popular reverence in which Eadward was held could rest on no ground except the genuine popular estimate of his general character. There were indeed strong political reasons which attached men to his memory. He was the one prominent man of

&lt;sup>1</sup> On the legendary history of Eadward see Appendix B.

&lt;sup>2</sup> See vol. i. pp. 288, 365.

CHAP. VII. the days immediately before the Conquest whom Normans Eadward's memory both to Englishmen and to Normans on political grounds.

and Englishmen could agree to reverence. The English acceptable naturally cherished the memory of the last prince of the ancient stock. They dwelt on his real or supposed virtues as a bright contrast to the crimes and vices of his Norman successors. Under the yoke of foreign masters they looked back to the peace and happiness of the days of their native King. The King who reigned on the English throne without a spark of English feeling became the popular embodiment of English nationality, and men called for the Laws of King Eadward as in earlier times they had called for the Laws of Cnut or of Eadgar. On the other hand, it suited the policy of the Normans to show all respect to the kinsman of their own Duke, the King by whose pretended bequest their Duke claimed the English Crown, and whose lawful successor he professed himself to be. In English eyes Eadward stood out in contrast to the invader William; in Norman eyes he stood out in contrast to the usurper Harold. A King whom two hostile races thus agreed in respecting could not fail to obtain both popular and formal canonization on somewhat easy Still he could hardly have obtained either the one or the other only on grounds like these. He must have displayed some personal qualities which really won him popular affection during life and maintained him in popular reverence after death. It is worth while to study a little more at length the character of a man who obtained in his own age a degree of respect which in our eyes seems justified neither by several of his particular actions nor by the general tenour of his government.

Popular reverence for him grounded also on personal qualities.

> That Eadward was in any sense a great man, that he displayed any of the higher qualities of a ruler of those days, no one probably will assert. He was doubtless in some respects a better man than Cnut, than Harold, or CHAP. VII. than William; as a King of the eleventh century no one will venture to compare him with those three mighty ones. His wars were waged by deputy, and his civil government was carried on largely by deputy also. Of his many per- Eadward's sonal virtues, his earnest piety, his good intentions in character. every way, his sincere desire for the welfare of his people, there can be no doubt. Vice of every kind, injustice, wanton cruelty, were hateful to him. But in all kingly qualities he was utterly lacking. In fact, so far as a really good man can reproduce the character of a thoroughly bad one, Eadward reproduced the character of his father Æthelred. Writers who lived before his canonization, or who did not come within the magic halo of his sanctity, do not scruple to charge him, as his father is charged, with utter sloth and incapacity.1 Like his Points of father, he was quite incapable of any steady attention likeness to his father. to the duties of royalty; 2 but, like his father, he had occasional fits of energy, which, like those of his father, often came at the wrong time. His contemporary panegyrist allows that he gave way to occasional fits of wrath, but he pleads that his anger never hurried him into unbecoming language.4 It hurried him however, more than once, into very unbecoming intentions. We shall find

&lt;sup>1</sup> See vol. i. pp. 244, 462.

&lt;sup>1</sup> See Appendix B.

&lt;sup>2</sup> His monastic biographer (Æth. Riev. X. Scriptt. 388) says by way of praise, "Cuncta regni negotia Ducibus proceribusque [to Earl Harold and the Witan] committens, totum se divinis mancipat obsequiis. Quantò autem se corporalibus subtrahebat, tantò luminosius se spiritalibus indidit theoriis."

&lt;sup>8</sup> See vol. i. p. 327.

Vita Eadw. 396. "Si ratio aliquem suscitaret animi motum, leonini videbatur terroris, iram tamen non prodebat jurgiis." We shall presently come across a ludicrous example of his "nobilis ira," venting itself in an oath. Possibly the reference may partly be to his abstinence, like that of Saint Lewis, from the French, and generally southern, vice of reviling God and the Saints. See Joinville, p. 120 ed. Du Cange, 1668; p. 217 ed. Michel, 1858.

CHAP. VII. that, on two memorable occasions, it needed the intervention of his better genius, in the form first of Godwine and then of Harold, to keep back the saintly King from massacre and civil war. Here we see the exact parallels to Æthelred's mad expeditions against Normandy, Cumberland, and Saint David's.2 But Eadward was not only free from the personal vices and cruelties of his father; there can be no doubt that, except when carried away by ebullitions of this kind, he sincerely endeavoured, according to the measure of his ability, to establish a good administration of justice throughout his dominions. the duties of secular government, although doubtless discharged conscientiously and to the best of his ability, were with Eadward always something which went against the His virtues grain. His natural place was, not on the throne of Engwholly land, but at the head of a Norman Abbey. Nothing, one monastic. would think, could have hindered him from entering on the religious life in the days of his exile, unless it were a vague kind of feeling that other duties were thrown upon him by his birth. For all his virtues were those of a monk; all the real man came out in his zeal for collecting relics, in his visions, in his religious exercises, in his gifts to churches and monasteries, in his desire to mark his reign, as its chief result, by the foundation of his great Abbey of Saint Peter at Westminster. In a prince of the manly piety of Ælfred things of this sort form only a part, a pleasing and harmonious part, of the general

His time was oddly divided between his prayers and the pastime which seems least suited to the character of

In Eadward they formed the whole man.

character.

&lt;sup>1</sup> I allude to his wish, frustrated by Godwine, to subject Dover to military chastisement (Chron. Petrib. 1048. Cf. the dealings of the Emperor Theodosius with Thessalonica and Antioch), and his wish, frustrated by Harold, to wage war with the Northumbrians on behalf of Tostig in 1065, Vita Eadw. 423.

&lt;sup>2</sup> See vol. i. pp. 328, 330, 383, 635.

a saint. The devotion to the pleasures of the chase was CHAP. VII. so universal among the princes and nobles of that age His love of hunting. that it is needless to speak of it as a feature in any man's character, unless when some special circumstance forces it into special notice. We remark it in the two Williams, because it was their love of hunting which led them into their worst acts of oppression; we remark it in Eadward, because it seems so utterly incongruous with the other features of his character.1 There were men even in those times who could feel pity for animal suffering and who found no pleasure in the wanton infliction of pain. Ten-Contrast derness for animals is no unusual feature in either the humanity real or the legendary portraits of holy men. the true saint, like Ceadda in earlier times, saved the life of the hunted beast which sought his protection, and made the incident the text of a religious exhortation to his companions. He saw a worthy object for prayer in the sufferings of a bird tortured by a thoughtless child, and his gentle heart found matter for pious rejoicing in the escape of the feathered captive.2 Humanity like this met with very little response in the breast of the saintly monarch. The piercing cry, the look of mute agony, of the frightened,

Anselm, of Anselm.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Vita Eadw. 414. "Benignissimus Rex Ædwardus . . . plurimum temporis exigebat circa saltus et silvas in venationum jocunditate. Divinis enim expeditus officiis, quibus libenter quotidiana intendebat devotione, jocundabatur plurimum coram se allatis accipitribus vel hujus generis avibus, vel certè delectabatur applausibus multorum motuum canibus. His et talibus interdum deducebat diem, et in his tantummodo ex natura videbatur aliquam mundi captare delectationem." So William of Malmesbury (ii. 220), in a passage which, like several others, makes one think that he had this Life of Eadward before him. "Unum erat quo in seculo animum oblectaret suum, cursus canum velocium, quorum circa saltus latratibus solebat lætus applaudere; volatus volucrum quorum natura est de cognatis avibus prædas agere. Ad hæc exercitia continuis diebus, post audita mane divina officia, intendebat." He retained these tastes to the last. In 1065 Harold built a house at Portskewet as a hunting-seat for the King. Chronn. Ab. and Wig., and Flor. Wig. in anno.

&lt;sup>12</sup> For these two beautiful stories of Saint Anselm, see his Life by John of Salisbury, Anglia Sacra, ii. 165.

CHAP. VII. wearied, tortured beast awakened no more pity in the heart of the saintly King than in that of the rudest Danish Thegn who shared his savage pastime. The sufferings of the hart panting for the water-brooks, the pangs of the timid hare falling helpless into the jaws of her pursuers, the struggles of the helpless bird grasped in the talons of the resistless hawk, afforded as keen a delight to the prince who had never seen steel flash in earnest, as ever they did to men whom a life of constant warfare in a rude age had taught to look lightly on the sufferings and death even of their own kind. Once, we are told, a churl, resisting, it well may be, some trespass of the King and his foreign courtiers on an Englishman's freehold, put some hindrance in the way of the royal sport. An unsaintly oath and an unkingly threat at once rose to the lips of Eadward; "By God and his Mother, I will hurt you some day if I can." Had Anselm, in the might of his true holiness, thus crossed the path of his brother saint, he too, as the defender of the oppressed, might have become the object of a like outburst of impotent wrath. A delight in amusements of this kind is hardly a fair subject of blame in men of any age to whom the rights of the lower animals have perhaps never been presented as matter for serious thought. But in a man laying claim to special holiness, to special meekness and gentle-

It is not clear whether Eadward did not take the same delight as Queen Elizabeth in another form of animal torture. There is something suspicious in part of the royal dues paid by the city of Norwich, "ursum et sex canes ad ursum [a very business-like phrase]." Domesday, ii. 117. Cf. Will. Fitz-Stephen, Giles, i. 180.

Will. Malms. ii. 196. "Dum quadam vice venatum isset, et agrestis quidam stabulata illa quibus in casses cervi urgentur confudisset, ille sua nobili percitus ira, 'Per Deum' inquit 'et Matrem ejus, tantumdem tibi nocebo si potero.'" William's whole comment is very curious. This story has been made good use of by Lord Lytton, in his romance of "Harold," which, if the sentimental and supernatural parts be struck out, forms a narrative more accurate than most so-called histories of the time. For a somewhat similar tale see Motley, United Netherlands, iii. 172.

ness of character, we naturally look for a higher standard, CHAP. VII. a standard which a contemporary example shows not to have been unattainable even in that age.

In person Eadward is described as being handsome, of Personal moderate height, his face full and rosy, his hair and beard appearance and habits white as snow.1 His beard he wore long, according to what of Ead-ward. seems to have been the older fashion both of England and of Normandy.<sup>2</sup> Among his younger contemporaries this fashion went out of use in both countries, and the Normans shaved the whole face, while the English left the hair on the upper lip only. He was remarkable for the length and whiteness of his hands. When not excited by passion, he was gentle and affable to all men; he was liberal both to the poor and to his friends; but he had also the special art of giving a graceful refusal, so that the rejection of a suit by him was almost as pleasing as its acceptance by another.3 In public he preserved his kingly dignity intact; but he took little pleasure in the pomp of royalty or in wearing the gorgeous robes which were wrought for him by the industry and affection of his Lady.4 In private company, though he never forgot his rank, he could unbend, and treat his familiar friends as an equal.<sup>5</sup> He avoided however one bad habit of his

&lt;sup>1</sup> Vita Eadw. 396. "Hominis persona erat decentissima, discretæ proceritatis, capillis et barba canitie insignis lactea, facie plena et cute rosea, manibus macris et niveis, longis quoque interlucentibus digitis, reliquo corpore toto integer et regius homo." William of Malmesbury (ii. 220) seems again to copy the Biographer; "Erat discretæ proceritatis, barba et capillis cygneus, facie roseus, toto corpore lacteus, membrorum habitudine commoda peridoneus." Eadward was seemingly an albino.

&lt;sup>2</sup> In the Bayeux Tapestry Eadward and one or two others are represented with long beards. William and Harold, and the mass of their respective countrymen, are represented according to the later fashions described in the text.

&lt;sup>3</sup> Vita Eadw. 396. "Cunctis poscentibus aut benignè daret aut benignè negaret, ita et ut benigna negatio plurima videretur largitio."

&lt;sup>4</sup> Ib. 415. So Will. Malms. ii. 220.

<sup>1</sup>b. 396. "In frequentia verè se Regem et dominum, in privato, salva quidem regia majestate, agebat se suis ut consocium."

rites at different periods of his reign.

CHAP. VII. age, that of choosing the time of divine service as the time for private conversation. It is mentioned as a special mark of his devotion that he scarcely ever spoke during mass, except when he was interrupted by others. His favou- mention of his friends and familiar companions leads us directly to his best and worst aspects as an English King. Like his father, he was constantly under the dominion of favourites. It was to the evil choice of his favourites during the early part of his reign that most of the misfortunes of his time were owing, and that a still more direct path was opened for the ambition of his Norman kinsman. In the latter part of his reign either happy accident, or returning good sense, or perhaps the sheer necessity of the case, led him to a better choice. Without a guide he could not reign, but the good fortune of his later years gave him the wisest and noblest of all guides. The most honourable feature in the whole life of Eadward is that the last thirteen years of his reign were virtually the reign of Harold.

Eadward's fondness for foreigners.

But in the days before that great national reaction, in the period embraced in the present Chapter, it is the peculiar character of the favourites to whose influence Eadward was given up which sets its special mark on the time. The reign of Eadward in many respects fore-

<sup>1</sup> Vita Eadw. 415. "Inter ipsa divinorum mysteriorum et missarum sacrosancta officia agnina mansuetudine stabat, et mente tranquilla cunctis fidelibus spectabilis Christicola, inter quæ, nisi interpellaretur, rarissimè cui loquebatur." Compare the opposite description given of Henry the Second, who always talked of public affairs during mass (Gir. Camb. Exp. Hib. i. 46. p. 305 Dimock), and the curious story of his holding a discourse at such a moment with Saint Thomas of Canterbury himself, as told by Roger of Pontigny (Giles, i. 132). It is however somewhat differently told by William Fitz-Stephen (ib. i. 218). See Gentleman's Magazine, April, 1860, p. 386.

The Ayenbite of Inwyt (p. 20 ed. Morris) reproves this practice as a common fault. "And huanne be ssoldest yhere his messe ober his sermon at cherche, bou iangledest and bourdedest to-vor God."

stalls the reign of Henry the Third. The part played by OHAP. VII. Earl Godwine in many respects forestalls the part played by Earl Simon of Montfort. Eadward was by birth an His con-Englishman; but he was the son of a Norman mother; with Norhe had been carried to Normandy in his childhood; he mandy. had there spent the days of his youth and early manhood; England might be the land of his duty, but Normandy was ever the land of his affection. With the habits, the feelings, the language, of the people over whom he was called to rule he had absolutely no sympathy. His heart was French. His delight was to surround himself with companions who came from the beloved land and who spoke the beloved tongue, to enrich them with English estates, to invest them with the highest offices of the English Kingdom. Policy might make him the political ally of his Imperial brother-in-law, but a personal sentiment made him the personal friend of his Norman cousin. The needs of his royal position made him accept Godwine as his counsellor and the daughter of Godwine as his wife. But his real affections were lavished on the Norman Promotion priests 1 and gentlemen who flocked to his Court as to the of Normans to land of promise. These strangers were placed in im-high office. portant offices about the royal person,2 and before long they were set to rule as Earls and Bishops over the already half-conquered soil of England. Even when he came over as a private man in the days of Harthacnut, Eadward

&lt;sup>1</sup> Vita Eadw. 414. "Abbates religiosos et monachos, potissimum autem transmarinos.. quam benignè susceperit." So Will. Malms. 220; "Pauperibus hospitibusque, maximè transmarinis et religiosis, benignus appellando, munificus dando." See Appendix C.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Vit. Eadw. 399. "Quum prædictus sanctæ memoriæ Ædwardus Rex repatriaret à Francia, ex eadem gente comitati sunt quamplures non ignobiles viri, quos plurimis honoribus ditatos secum retinuit idem Rex, utpote compos totius regni, ordinariosque constituit secretorum consilii sui, et rectores rerum regalis palatii." It is remarkable how seldom, especially in the early part of Eadward's reign, the foreigners appear to sign charters. They were doubtless jealously watched.

CHAP. VII. had brought with him his French nephew, and Ralph

The Norman Conquest begins under

Eadward.

the Timid Earl was but the precursor of the gang of foreigners who were soon to be quartered upon the country, as these were again only the first instalment of the larger gang who were to win for themselves a more lasting settlement four and twenty years later. In all this the seeds of the Conquest were sowing, or rather, as I once before put it,2 it is now that the Conquest actually begins. The reign of Eadward is a period of struggle between natives and foreigners for dominion in England. foreigners gradually win the upper hand, and for a time they are actually dominant. Then a national reaction overthrows their influence, and the noblest of living Englishmen becomes the virtual ruler. But this happy change did not take place till the strangers had become accustomed to look on English estates and honours as their right, a right which they soon learned to think they might one day assert by force of arms. favourites of Eadward were in truth the advanced guard of William. The conquests of England by Swend and Cnut, the wonderful exploits of his own countrymen in the South of Europe, no doubt helped to suggest to the Norman Duke that it was not impossible to win England for himself with his sword. But it must have been the feeling, on the part both of himself and of his subjects, that England was a land already half won over to Norman rule, which made the succession to the English Crown the cherished aim of the life of the mighty ruler who was now growing up to manhood and to greatness on the other side of the sea.

Relations between Eadward and Godwine.

The elevation of Eadward to the throne of course involved the establishment in still greater honour and authority of the man to whom his elevation was mainly CHAP. VII. owing, the great Earl of the West-Saxons. I have already thrown out some hints as to what the real relations between Eadward and Godwine probably were.1 There is not Norman a shadow of evidence for the calumnies of the Norman against writers which represent Godwine and his sons as holding Godwine and his the King in a sort of bondage, as abusing his simplicity sons. and confidence, sometimes as behaving to him with great personal insolence, sometimes, they even venture to add, practising all kinds of injustice and oppression throughout the Kingdom. The English writers tell a widely different tale. The contrast between the two accounts is well set forth by a writer whose sympathies lie wholly on the Norman side, but who makes at least an effort to deal fairly between the two. In the English version Godwine and his sons appear as high-minded and faithful counsellors of the King, who stood forward as the leaders of the national feeling against his foreign favourites, but who were never guilty of any undutiful word or deed towards the prince whom they had themselves raised to power.2 Eadward probably both feared and suspected Godwine. But there is nothing to show that, up to the final outbreak between Godwine and the foreigners, the great Earl had ever deviated from even formal loyalty to his sovereign. There is distinct evidence that more than one of his sons had gained Eadward's warmest personal affection. From all that we can see, Godwine was not a man likely to win Character the same sort of personal affection from Eadward, perhaps of Godnot even from the nation at large, which was afterwards won by Harold. That Godwine was the representative of all English feeling, that he was the leader of every national movement, that he was the object of the deepest admiration on the part of the men at least of his own Earldom,

&lt;sup>1</sup> Vol. i. p. 584.

&lt;sup>1</sup> See above, p. 15. <sup>2</sup> Will. Malms. ii. 197. See Appendix D.

CHAP. VII. is proved by the clearest of evidence. But it is equally clear that Godwine was essentially a wary statesman, and in no sense a chivalrous hero. We have seen that, mighty as was the power of his eloquence, he did not trust to his eloquence only. He knew how to practise the baser as well as the nobler arts of statesmanship. He knew how to win over political adversaries by bribes, threats, and promises, and how to find means of chastisement for those who remained to the last immoveable by the voice of the charmer. When we think of the vast extent of his possessions,2 most or all of which must have been acquired by royal grant, it is almost impossible to acquit him of a grasping disposition. It is also laid to his charge that, His relation to in the acquisition of wealth, he did not always regard the ecclesiastical bodies. rights of ecclesiastical bodies.3 This last charge, it must be remembered, is one which he shares with almost every powerful man of his time, even with those who, if they took with one hand, gave lavishly with the other. And accusations of this sort must always be taken with certain deductions. Monastic and other ecclesiastical writers were apt to make little or no distinction between acts of real sacrilege, committed by fraud or violence, and the most legal transactions by which the Church happened to be Godwine's a loser. Still it should be noticed that Godwine stands lack of perhaps alone among the great men of his own age in bounty to the Church. having no ecclesiastical foundation connected with his

<sup>1</sup> See above, p. 9.

See vol. i. p. 471. The French biographer of Eadward says (p. 57):—

"Godwin k'out mis entente

Cunquere tresor e rente,

Mut fu garniz e estorez

D'or e de argent dunt out asez,

Ke par plaize par achatz

De grant aver out fait purchaz;

Mut out cunquis par boesdie

Plus ke par chivalerie."

&lt;sup>3</sup> See Appendix E.

As far as I am aware, he is nowhere enrolled CHAP. VII. among the founders or benefactors of any church, religious or secular. Such a peculiarity is most remarkable. How far it may have arisen from enlightenment beyond his age, how far it was the result of mere illiberality or want of religious feeling, it is utterly impossible to say. But it is clear that Godwine is, in this respect, distinguished in a marked way from his son, whose liberality, guided as it was by a wise discretion, was conspicuous among his other great qualities. Again, it is hardly impossible to acquit Godwine of being, like most fathers who have the opportunity, too anxious for the advancement of his own Godwine's family. He promoted his sons, both worthy and unworthy, for his own to the greatest offices in the Kingdom, at an age when household. they could have had but little personal claim to such high distinctions. In so doing, he seems to have overstepped the bounds of policy as well as those of fairness and good feeling. Such an accumulation of power in one family could not but raise envy, and higher feelings than envy, in the breasts of rivals, some of whom may have had as good or better claims to promotion. Godwine sacrificed his daughter to a political object is a charge common to him with princes and statesmen in all ages. Few men in any time or place would have thrown away the opportunity of having a King for a sonin-law, and, as Godwine doubtless hoped, of becoming, at least in the female line, the ancestor of a line of princes.

The faults of the great Earl then are manifest. But Godwine's his virtues are equally manifest. In the eyes of con-ment of temporary Englishmen such faults as I have mentioned his Earlmust have seemed little more than a few specks on a burnished mirror. His good government of his Earldom

VOL. II.

&lt;sup>1</sup> A Godwine appears (W. Thorn. X Scriptt. 2224) as a benefactor of Christ Church, Canterbury. This may be the great Earl, or it may be the Godwine whose marriage settlement we have in Cod. Dipl. iv. 10.

His strict administration of justice.

CHAP. VII. is witnessed, not only by the rhetoric of his panegyrist, which however may at least be set against the rhetoric of his accusers, but by the plain facts of the welcome which greeted him on his return from banishment, and the zeal in his behalf displayed by all classes.1 As a ruler, Godwine is especially praised for what in those days was looked on as the first virtue of a ruler, merciless severity towards all disturbers of the public peace. In our settled times we hardly understand how rigour, often barbarous rigour, against thieves and murderers, should have been looked on as the first merit of a governor, one which was always enough to cover a multitude of sins. Public feeling went along with the prince or magistrate who thus preserved the peace of his dominions, however great might be his own offences in other ways, and however cruel in our eyes might be the means by which he compassed this first end of government. To have discharged this great duty stands foremost in the panegyrics of Godwine and of Harold.2 It was accepted at the hands of the Norman Conqueror as almost an equivalent for the horrors of the Conquest.3 It won for his son Henry a splendid burst of admiration at the hands of a native writer who certainly was not blind to the oppression of which that prince himself was guilty.4 A certain amount of tyranny was willingly endured at the hands of a man who so effectually rid the world of smaller tyrants. And, in opposition to the praise thus bestowed on Godwine, Harold, William, and Henry, we find the neglect of this paramount duty standing foremost in the dark indictments against the ruffian Rufus 5 and the heed-Godwine is set forth to us, in set phrases, less Robert.<sup>6</sup>

This comes out nowhere more emphatically than in the comparatively hostile Abingdon Chronicle, 1052.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Vita Eadw. 408. cf. Fl. Wig. 1066.

<sup>3</sup> See the Peterborough Chronicler's character of William, under the year 1087.

<sup>6</sup> Ord. Vit. 672 B. <sup>4</sup> Ib. 1135. <sup>5</sup> Will. Malms. iv. 314.

it may be, but in phrases which do not the less ex- CHAP. VII. press the conviction of the country, as a ruler mild and affable to the good, but stern and merciless to the evil and unruly.1 But with all his vigour, all his eloquence, Godwine it is clear that Godwine never reached to the same com-reached plete dominion over King and Kingdom which, in later the same power as years, fell to the lot of his nobler son. He always remained Harold an object of jealousy, not only to the French favourites of Eadward, but to the Earls of the other parts of England. We shall find that his eloquent tongue could not always command a majority in the Meeting of the Wise.2 But the importance attributed to his oratory, the fluctua-Importtions of success and defeat which he underwent in the eloquence. great deliberative Assembly, show clearly how advanced our constitution already was in an age when free debate was so well understood, and when free speech was so In this respect the Norman Conquest unpowerful.3 doubtedly threw things back. We shall have to pass over several centuries before we come to another chief whose influence clearly rested to so great a degree on his power of swaying great assemblies of men, on the personal affection or personal awe with which he had learned to inspire the Legislature of his country.

The marriage of Godwine with his Danish wife Gytha Godwine's had given him a numerous and flourishing offspring. Six sons and three daughters surrounded the table of the Earl of the West-Saxons. In the names which several of them bore we may discern the influence of their Danish mother.4

&quot;When the chronicler praises the gift of speech, he unconsciously proves the existence of constitutional freedom." Lytton, Harold, i. 165.

&lt;sup>4</sup> I attribute the Danish names in Godwine's family to the influence of Gytha rather than to any Danish tastes prevalent at the Court of Cnut, because the Danes settled in England seem to have so often adopted English names for their children. See vol. i. pp. 580, 591.

CHAP. VII. The sons of Godwin were Swegen, Harold, Tostig, Gyrth, Leofwine, and Wulfnoth. His daughters were Eadgyth, Gunhild, and perhaps a third, Ælfgifu.<sup>2</sup> As twenty-three years had now passed since Godwine's marriage, we may assume that all of them were already born, though some of the younger ones may still have been children. The elder sons had reached manhood, and we shall find two at least of them filling the rank of Earl during the period with which we are now dealing. Swegen, the eldest son, Swegen Earl, 1043. seems to have been invested with an Earldom from the very beginning of Eadward's reign, as he signs a charter with that rank in the King's second year.3 Gytha's Beorn Earl, nephew, Beorn, also remained in England, while his 1045 ? brother Osbeorn was banished, and while his other brother Swend was putting forth his claims to the Crown of He had doubtless attached himself firmly Denmark. to the interests of his uncle. He was also, probably at a somewhat later time, raised to an Earldom, apparently the Earldom of the Middle-Angles, lately held by Thored.4 The Earldom held by Swegen was geographically most anomalous. It took in the Mercian shires of Hereford, Gloucester, and Oxford, and the West-Saxon shires of Berkshire and Somerset.<sup>5</sup>

&lt;sup>1</sup> I should perhaps have done better had I used the English form of this name throughout, as Swegen is clearly more correct etymologically than Svein, Sven, or Swend. It may however be convenient to distinguish the English and Danish bearers of the name.

&lt;sup>2</sup> On the sons and daughters of Godwine, see Appendix F.

&lt;sup>3</sup> Cod. Dipl. iv. 74. This charter must be early in the year 1043, earlier at least than the Gemót which we shall presently see was held in November. Swegen was therefore probably appointed in the Gemót at which Eadward was finally established as King. Another charter, of 1044 (Cod. Dipl. iv. 80), signed by Harold, Leofwine, Swegen, Tostig, and Gyrth, all with the rank of "Dux," is deservedly marked as doubtful by Mr. Kemble.

&lt;sup>4</sup> See vol. i. p. 580, and Appendix G, on the Great Earldoms. His first signature is in 1045. Cod. Dipl. iv. 97.

&lt;sup>5</sup> Fl. Wig. 1051.

But, along with the comparatively obscure names of CHAP. VII. Swegen and Beorn, a greater actor now steps upon the First apfield. We have now reached the first appearance of the HAROLD illustrious man round whom the main interest of this Godwing. history will henceforth centre. The second son of God- Eastwine lived to be the last of our native Kings, the hero Angles, and the martyr of our native freedom. We have indeed 1045 1] as yet to deal with him only in a subordinate capacity, and in some sort in a less honourable character. few recorded actions of Harold, Earl of the East-Angles, could hardly have enabled men to look forward to the glorious career of Harold, Earl of the West-Saxons, and of Harold, King of the English. To his first great government, a trying elevation indeed for one in the full vigour of youth and passion, he was apparently raised about three years after the election of Eadward, when he himself could not have passed his twenty-fourth year. While still young, he experienced somewhat of the fluctuations of human affairs, and he seems to have learned wisdom by experience. Still there must have been in him from the beginning the germs of those great qualities which shone forth so conspicuously in his later career. His cha-It is not hard to paint his portraiture, alike from his racter. recorded actions, and from the elaborate descriptions of Contem-The timonies. him which we possess from contemporary hands. praises of the great Earl sound forth in the latest specimen of the native minstrelsy of Teutonic England. And they sound forth with a truer ring than the half conventional praises of the saintly monarch, whose greatest glory, after all, was that he had called Harold to the Evidence government of his realm. The biographer of Eadward, grapher. the panegyrist of Godwine, is indeed the common laureate of Godwine's whole family; but it is not in the special interest of Harold that he writes. He sets forth the

<sup>1</sup> Chronn. Ab. and Wig. 1065. See Appendix D.

CHAP. VII. merits of Harold with no sparing hand; he approves of him as a ruler and he admires him as a man; but his own personal affection plainly clings more closely to the rival brother Tostig. His description of Harold is therefore the more trustworthy, and it fully agrees with the evidence of his recorded actions. Harold then, the second son of Godwine, is set before us as a man uniting every gift of mind and body which could attract to him the admiration and affection of the age in which he lived.1 Tall in stature, beautiful in countenance, of a bodily strength whose memory still lives in the rude pictorial art of his time,2 he was foremost alike in the active courage and in the passive endurance of the warrior. In hunger and watchfulness, in the wearing labours of a campaign no less than in the passing excitement of the day of battle, he stood forth as the leader and the model of the English people.3 Alike ready and vigorous in action, he knew when to strike and how to strike; he knew how to measure himself against enemies of every kind, and to adapt his tactics to every position in which the accidents of warfare might place him. He knew how to chase the light-armed Briton from fastness to fastness, how to charge, axe in hand, on the bristling lines of his Norwegian namesake, and how to bear up, hour after hour, against the repeated onslaughts of the Norman horsemen and the more terrible thundershower of the Norman arrows. It is plain that in him, no less than in his more successful, and therefore more famous, rival, we have to admire, not only the mere chap. vn. animal courage of the soldier, but that true skill of the leader of armies which would have placed both Harold and William high among the captains of any age.

His military genius.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Vita Eadw. 408. "Virtute corporis et animi in populo præstabat ut 'alter Judas Machabæus."

&lt;sup>2</sup> In the Bayeux Tapestry Harold is represented as lifting the Norman soldiers from the quicksands with the greatest ease.

* Vita Eadw. 409. "Uterque [the writer is comparing Harold and Tostig] satis pulcro et venusto corpore et, ut conjicimus, non inæquali robore, non disparis audacise. Sed major natu Haroldus procerior statura, patris satis [these words are clearly corrupt] infinitis laboribus, vigiliis et inedia, multa animi lenitate et promptiori sapientia."

But the son of Godwine, the heir of his greatness, was Harold's not merely a soldier, not merely a general. If he inherited virtues. from his father those military qualities which first drew on Godwine the notice alike of the English Ætheling 1 and of the Danish King, he inherited also that eloquence of speech, that wisdom in council, that knowledge of the laws of the land, which made him the true leader and father of the English people. Great as Harold was in war, his character as a civil ruler is still more remarkable, still more worthy of admiration. One or two actions of his earlier life show indeed that the spirit of those days of violence had laid its hand even on him. But, from the His singular forbeartime when he appears in his full maturity as the acknow- ance. ledged chief of the English nation, the most prominent feature in his character is his singular gentleness and mercy. Never, either in warfare or in civil strife, do we find Harold bearing hardly upon an enemy. From the time of his advancement to the practical government of the Kingdom, there is not a single harsh or cruel action with which he can be charged. His policy was ever a policy of conciliation. His panegyrist indeed confines his readiness to forgive, his unwillingness to avenge, to his dealings with his own countrymen only.3 But the same

&lt;sup>1</sup> See vol. i. p. 640.

&lt;sup>2</sup> De Inv. c. 14. "Tum... astutiå et legum terræ peritiå, tum quia se talem gerebat quod non solum Angli, verum etiam Normanni et Gallici imprimis invidebant pulcritudini et prudentiæ, militiæ et sagacitati."

Wita Eadw. 409. "Multum obloquia perferre, nam non facile prodere, non facile quoque, et in civem sive compatriotum, ut reor, nusquam, ulcisci." Compare the character of Edward the First,

&quot;Totus Christo traditur Rex noster Edwardus;
Velox est ad veniam, ad vindictam tardus."
Political Songs (Camd. Soc.), p. 163.

CHAP. VII. magnanimous spirit is shown in cases where his conduct was less capable of being guided by mere policy than in his dealings with Mercian rivals and with Northumbrian revolters. We see the same generous temper in his treatment of the conquered Princes of Wales and of the defeated invaders of Stamfordbridge. As a ruler, he is described as walking in the steps of his father, as the terror of evilpionship of England against strangers.

travels.

His cham- doers and the rewarder of those who did well. heart and soul, to the service of his country, he was no less loyal in personal attention and service to her wayward and half-foreign King.1 Throughout his career he was the champion of the independence of England against the dominion of strangers. To keep the court of England free from the shoals of foreigners who came to fatten on Engrelish estates and honours, and to meet the same enemies in open arms upon the heights of Senlac, were only two different ways of discharging the great duty to which his whole energies were devoted. And yet no man was ever more free from narrow insular prejudices, from any un-His foreign worthy jealousy of foreigners as such. His own mind was enlarged and enriched by foreign travel, by the study of the politics and institutions of other nations on their own He not only made the pilgrimage to Rome, a practice which the example of Cnut seems to have made fashionable among English nobles and prelates, but he went on a journey through various parts of Gaul, carefully examining into the condition of the country and the policy of its rulers, among whom we may be sure that the renowned Duke of Rouen was not forgotten.2 And Harold was ever ready to welcome and to reward real merit in CHAP. VII. men of foreign birth. He did not scruple to confer high Harold's offices on strangers, and to call men of worth from foreign of Germans lands to help him in his most cherished undertakings. as opposed to French-But, while the bounty of Eadward was squandered on men. Normans and Frenchmen, men utterly alien in language and feeling, it was the policy of Harold to strengthen the connexion of England with the continental nations nearest to us in blood and speech. All the foreigners promoted by Harold, or in the days of his influence, were natives of those kindred Teutonic lands whose sons might still almost be looked upon as fellow-countrymen.

&lt;sup>1</sup> See the poem in the Chronicles. So Snorro (Ant. Celt. Scand. 189. Laing, iii. 75), while strangely making Harold the youngest of the family and hardly realizing his position in the Kingdom, bears ample testimony to the kindly relations existing between him and the King. He is there called Eadward's "foster son." The Biographer (p. 433) calls him "nutricius suus frater."

&lt;sup>2</sup> Vita Eadw. 410; a passage which I shall have to refer to again.

Such was Harold as a leader of Englishmen in war and His persoin peace. As for his personal character, we can discern ter. that in the received piety of the age he surpassed his father. The charge of invasion of the rights of ecclesias- His alleged tical bodies is brought against him no less than against of monas-Godwine; but the instance which has brought most dis-teries. credit upon his name can be easily shown to be a mere tissue of misconceptions and exaggerations.2 But it is far His friendmore certain that Harold was the intimate friend of the Saint Wulfbest and holiest man of his time. Wulfstan, the sainted stan. Bishop of Worcester, was the object of his deepest affection and reverence; he would at any time go far out of his way for the benefit of his exhortations and prayers; and the Saint repaid his devotion by loyal and vigorous service in the day of need.* Of his liberality his great His foundafoundation at Waltham is an everlasting monument, and College at it is a monument not more of his liberality than of his Waltham. To the monastic orders Harold seems not to wisdom.

&lt;sup>1</sup> I refer both to Harold's own proceedings at Waltham and to the general promotion of Germans under this reign. See Stubbs, De Inv. ix.

&lt;sup>3</sup> See Appendix E.

&lt;sup>3</sup> See William of Malmesbury's Life of Wulfstan, Angl. Sacr. ii. 248, <sup>2</sup>53.

CHAP. VII. have been specially liberal; his bounty took another and a better chosen direction. The foundation of a great secular College, in days when all the world seemed mad after monks, when King Eadward and Earl Leofric vied with each other in lavish gifts to religious houses at home and abroad, was in itself an act displaying no small vigour and independence of mind. The details too of the foundation were such as showed that the creation of Waltham was not the act of a moment of superstitious dread or of reckless bounty, but the deliberate deed of a man who felt the responsibilities of lofty rank and boundless wealth, and who earnestly sought the welfare of his Church and nation in all things. As to his personal demeanour, he was frank and open in his general bearing, to a degree which was sometimes thought to be prejudicial to his interests.2 Yet he could on occasion dissemble and conceal his purpose, a gift which seems sometimes to have been misconstrued,3 and which apparently led him to the one great error of his life. He appears not to have been wholly free from

His personal demeanour frank and open.

- <sup>1</sup> He was however a benefactor to the Abbey of Peterborough. The local historian Hugo Candidus says (p. 44. ap. Sparke), "Comes Haroldus dedit Cliftune et terram in Londone juxta monasterium Sancti Pauli, juxta portum qui vocatur Etheredishythe." Harold's connexion with London should be noticed. It was also at his advice that King Eadward made a grant to Abingdon (Hist. Mon. Ab. i. 469), and that a Thegn named Thurkill, of whom we shall hear again, commended himself to the same church (Ib. i. 484).
- <sup>3</sup> Vita Eadw. 409. "Cum quovis, quem fidelem putaret, interdum communicare consilium operis sui, et hoc interdum adeò differre, si debet duci, ut minus conducibile à quibusdam videretur fore sus commoditati."
- <sup>3</sup> Ib. 410. "Uterque [Harold and Tostig] interdum quædam simulare adeò egregiè, ut qui eos non noverit incertius nil æstimare poterit." In connexion with this curious passage I may quote a singular exaggeration from an unknown author; it is found in a marginal note on one of the manuscripts of the Winchester Annals (Luard, 27); "Haroldus Rex, si sapienter ageret quidquid agebat furore, nullus hominum illum [sic] resisteret. Sed adeò erat animi inconstantis, quod nullus suorum se credidit illi." Yet "sapienter" is the adverb which the Biographer specially applies to Harold, in distinction to the "fortiter" of Tostig.

the common fault of noble and generous dispositions. The CHAP. VII. charge of occasional rashness was brought against him by Charges of rashness. others, and it is denied by his panegyrist in terms which seem to imply that the charge was not wholly groundless.1 And we must add that, in his private life, he did not, at least in his early days, imitate either the monastic asceticism of the King or the stern domestic purity of his rival the Conqueror. The most pathetic incident connected His conwith his name, tells us of a love of his early days, the with Eaddays apparently of his East-Anglian government, un-gyth Swanrecognized by the laws of the Church, but perhaps not wholly condemned by the standard of his own age, which shows, perhaps above every other tale in English history or legend, how much the love of woman can do and suffer.3

Such was the man who, seemingly in the fourth year Harold of Eadward, in the twenty-third or twenty-fourth of his East-Anown age, was invested with the rule of one of the great glos, 1045; divisions of England; who, seven years later, became the Westvirtual ruler of the Kingdom; who, at last, twenty-one 1053; years from his first elevation, received, alone among Eng- King, 1066. lish Kings, the Crown of England as the free gift of her people, and, alone among English Kings, died, axe in hand, on her own soil, in the defence of England against foreign invaders. One prince alone in the later history of Europe rivals the peculiar glory which attaches to the name of Harold. For him we must seek in a distant

&lt;sup>1</sup> The charge of rashness as brought against Harold during the last scene of his life I shall discuss elsewhere. I here add the Biographer's disclaimer (Vita Eadw. 409); "Porro de vitio prescipitationis sive levitatis, quis hunc vel illum sive quemvis de Godwino patre genitum, sive ejus disciplina et studio educatum arguerit?" There is a very remarkable passage further on (p. 422), in which the Biographer says that Harold was "ad sacramenta nimis (proh dolor) prodigus." The allusion clearly is to Harold's oath to William, which the Biographer never distinctly mentions.

&lt;sup>2</sup> I refer of course to the tale of Eadgyth Swanneshals, of which I shall have to speak again more than once.

Comparison of Harold with Constantine

Palaiologos.

CHAP. VII. age and in a distant land, but in a land connected with our own by a strangely abiding tie. English warriors, soldiers of Harold, chafing under the yoke of the Norman Conqueror, sought service at the court of the Eastern Cæsar, and there retained for ages their national tongue, their national weapon, and the proud inheritance of their stainless loyalty. The memory of England and of Harold becomes thus strangely interwoven with the memory of the one prince of later times who died in a still nobler cause than that of the freedom of England. The King who died upon the hill of Senlac finds his only worthy peer in the Emperor who died before the Gate of Saint Rômanos. The champion of England against the Southern invader must own a nobler martyr still in the champion of the faith and liberty of Christendom against the misbelieving horde who have ever since defiled the fairest and most historic regions of the world. The blood of Harold and his faithful followers has indeed proved the most fertile seed of English freedom, and the warning signs of the times seem to tell us that the day is fast coming when the blood of Constantine shall no longer send up its cry for vengeance unheeded from the earth.

Character of Swegen.

The second son of Godwine was no doubt raised to greatness in the first instance mainly because he was a son of Godwine; but his great qualities gradually showed that the rank to which he was raised by his father's favour was one which he was fully entitled to retain by his own merits. The earlier elevation of the great Earl's eldest-born was less fortunate. Swegen lived to show that he had a soul of real nobleness within him; but his crimes were great, he was cut off just as he was beginning to amend his ways, and he has left a dark and sad memory behind him. A youth, evidently of no common powers, but wayward, violent, and incapable of care. vii. self-control, he was hurried first into a flagrant violation of the sentiment of the age, and next into a still fouler breach of the eternal laws of right. His end may well arouse our pity, but his life, as a whole, is a dark blot on the otherwise chequered escutcheon of the house of Godwine. It was clearly felt to be so; the panegyrist of the family never once brings himself to utter the name of Swegen. Only one other child of Godwine Of the calls for personal notice at this stage of our history. Eady Ead-Eadgyth, his eldest daughter, became, nearly two years 1045. after Eadward's coronation,1 the willing or unwilling bride of the saintly monarch. She is described as being no less highly gifted among women than her brothers were among men; as lovely in person and adorned with every female accomplishment, as endowed with a learning and refinement unusual in her age, as in point of piety and liberality a fitting help-meet for Eadward himself.2 But there are some strange inconsistencies in the facts which are recorded of her. Her zeal and piety did not hinder her from receiving rewards, perhaps, in plain words, from taking bribes. Undoubtedly this is a subject on which the feelings of past times differed widely from those

&lt;sup>1</sup> See vol. i. p. 577.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Chron. Ab. Cant. 1044. Petrib. 1043. I shall discuss the exact date afterwards.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Vita Eadw. 415. She sat at his feet, unless he lifted her up to sit at his side. This must be compared with the account of the legislation about West-Saxon Kings' wives after the crime of Eadburh (Asser, M. H. B. 471 B). She had shown personal kindness to the Biographer (427);

&quot;Scribes Reginam primo tibi subvenientem,

Et quicquid scribes, laus et honor sit ei."

This perhaps gave occasion for the more elaborate and better known description in the false Ingulf.

William of Malmesbury's account of her (ii. 197) is singular; "Femina in cujus pectore omnium liberalium artium esset gymnasium, sed parvum in mundanis rebus ingenium; quam quum videres, si literas stuperes, modestiam certè animi et speciem corporis desiderares."

CHAP. VII. of our own; but we are a little staggered when we find Suspicions of her loyalty to England.

Her alleged share patric.

Her relation to her husband.

Eadward's alleged chastity.

the saintly King and his pious Lady receiving money from religious houses to support claims which, if just, should have been supported for nothing, and, if unjust, should not have been supported at all. But Eadgyth has been charged with far heavier offences than this. She seems to have become in some degree infected with her husband's love of foreigners, perhaps even in some sort to have withdrawn her sympathies from the national cause. She has won the doubtful honour of having her name extolled by Norman flatterers as one whose heart was rather Norman than English.2 And all her reputation for in the mur. gentleness and piety has not kept her from being branded der of Gos- in the pages of one of our best chroniclers as an accomplice in a base and treacherous murder.3 Her character thus becomes in some sort an ænigma, and her relation to her husband is not the least enigmatical part of her position. One of Eadward's claims to be looked on as a saint was the general belief, at least of the next generation, that the husband of the beautiful Eadgyth lived with her only as a brother with a sister.4 If this story be true, a more enlightened standard of morality can see no virtue, but rather a crime, in his conduct. We can see nothing to

&lt;sup>1</sup> Hist. Rams. exiv. (p. 457). Abbot Ælfwine, wishing to obtain certain lands bequeathed to the monastery by one Æthelwine the Black, but which were withheld from it by one Ælfric the son of Wihtgar, "apposuit quoque de divitis crumense dispendio viginti marcas auri, quibus gratiam Regis mercaretur, Ædthithæ [sic] quippe Reginæ sedulitatem quinque marcarum auri pretio exegit interponi, ut pias ejus preces regiis auribus fideliter importaret." So again, in a charter of 1060 in Cod. Dipl. iv. 142, Eadgyth lays claim to certain lands claimed by the Abbey of Peterborough, but on the intercession of her husband and her brothers Harold and Tostig (none of whom seem to have taken anything), and on the gift of twenty marks and certain church ornaments, she is induced to confirm the grant. That she looked carefully after her rents in money, kine, and honey, and after the men who stole her horse, is no blame to her (Cod. Dipl. iv. 257).

&lt;sup>2</sup> Will. Pict. 199 A, B (Duchesne).

&lt;sup>3</sup> Flor. Wig. 1065.

&lt;sup>4</sup> See Appendix B.

admire in a King who, in such a crisis of his country, him- OHAP. VII. self well-nigh the last of his race, and without any available member of the royal family to succeed him, shrank, from whatever motive, from the obvious duty of raising up direct heirs to his Crown. But it seems probable that Evidence of this report is merely part of the legend of the saint and writers. not part of the history of the King. His contemporary panegyrists undoubtedly praise Eadward's chastity. it is not necessary to construe their words as meaning more than might be asserted of Ælfred, of William, of Saint Lewis, or of Edward the First. The conjugal faith of all those great monarchs remained, as far as we know, unbroken; but not one of them thought it any part of his duty to observe continence towards his own wife. Still, from whatever cause, the marriage of Eadward and Eadgyth was undoubtedly childless; and the relations of the royal pair to each other in other respects are hardly more intelligible. Eadgyth is described as the partaker of all her husband's good works, and as nursing him with the most affectionate care during his last illness.1 Yet, at the moment of his reign when he could most freely exercise a will of his own, if he did not absolutely of his own accord banish her from his court, he consented, seemingly without any reluctance, to her removal from him by the enemies of her family and her country.2 The anxiety of Eadward's Norman favourites to separate Eadgyth from her husband is, after all, the most honourable record of her to be found among the singularly contradictory descriptions of her character and actions.

We thus find, within a few years after the accession of Greatness Eadward, the whole of the ancient Kingdoms of Wessex, of Godwine and his Sussex, Kent, Essex, East-Anglia, and part of Mercia, under house. the government of Godwine, his two elder sons, and his

&lt;sup>1</sup> Vita Eadw. 431, (cf. 433).

&lt;sup>2</sup> Ibid. 403. See below.

OHAP. VII. nephew. His daughter meanwhile shared the throne, of

Earldoms; Mercia under Leofric;

England with a King whom he had himself placed upon it. Such greatness could hardly be lasting. It rested wholly on Godwine's own personal character and influence, for the fame of Harold was yet to be won. The other part of Mercia which was not otherwise occupied remained, as before, in the hands of Leofric the son of Leofwine. This Earl and his famous wife Godgifu, the Lady Godiva of legend,1 were chiefly celebrated for their boundless liberality to ecclesiastical foundations.<sup>2</sup> Worcester, Leominster, Evesham, Chester, Wenlock, Stow in Lindesey, and, above all, Coventry, were special objects of their bounty. They seem not to have been satisfied with mere grants of lands and privileges, but to have taken a special interest in the buildings and ornaments of the houses which they favoured. The minster of Coventry, rebuilt and raised to cathedral rank after their time, has utterly vanished from the earth, and recent changes have abolished even the titular position of the city as a see of a Bishop. But at Stow, the ancient Sidnacester, a place even then of infinitely less consideration than Coventry, portions of the church enriched by Leofric still remain. Leofric,

A document, professing to be a petition from Godgifu to Pope Victor, praying for the confirmation of her gifts to Stow, is marked doubtful by his son Elfgar, his grandsons and his granddaughter, OHAP. VII. play an important part in the history of this period down to the complete establishment of the Norman power in England. It is clear that Leofric must have been more Relations personally annoyed by the rise of Godwine and his house Leofric and than any other of the great men of England. A race Godwine. whom he could not fail to look down upon as upstarts hemmed him in on every side except towards the North. Later in the reign of Eadward, we shall find the rivalries and the reconciliations of the two houses of Godwine and Leofric forming a considerable portion of the history. But, while Leofric himself lived, he continued to play the part which we have already seen him playing,1 that part of a mediator between two extreme parties, which was dictated to him by the geographical position of his Earldom.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Godgifu was the sister of Thorold the Sheriff, founder of the Priory of Spalding. See John of Peterborough, a. 1052. p. 49. Giles. The legend of her riding naked through Coventry is found in Bromton (949), and Knighton (2334). They do not mention peeping Tom, who, it is some comfort to think, must at any rate have been one of King Eadward's Frenchmen.

&lt;sup>2</sup> See Will. Malms. ii. 196. Cf. Æthel. Riev. 389. Chron. Evesham. 84. This last writer extends Leofric's authority to the borders of Scotland. Did Cumberland reach to the Ribble in those days?

<sup>3 &</sup>quot;Stow sub promontorio Lincolnise." Bromton, 949. See the charters of Bishop Wulfwig, Cod. Dipl. iv. 290. The church was not built by Leofric, but by Eadnoth the Second, Bishop of Dorchester (1034-1050); Leofric's benefaction took the form of ornaments. See Flor. Wig. 1057, where he calls Stow "locus famosus qui Sanctæ Mariæ Stou Anglice, Latine verò Sanctæ Mariæ Locus appellatur." The antiquity of part of the church is indisputable, but a more wretched village cannot be found.

North of the Humber, the great Dane, Siward the Northum-Strong, still ruled over the Earldom which he had won berland under by the murder of his wife's uncle. The manners of the Siward. Northumbrians were so savage, murders and hereditary deadly feuds were so rife among them, that it is quite possible that the slaughter of Eadwulf may, by a party at least, have been looked on as a praiseworthy act of vigour. Perhaps however, as we go on, we may discern signs that Siward and his house were not specially popular in Northhumberland, and that men looked back with regret to the more regular line of their native Earls. At any rate, Siward remained for the rest of his days in undisturbed possession of both the Northumbrian governments, and along with these he seems to have held the Earldoms of Northampton

Mr. Kemble (Cod. Dipl. iv. 168), doubtless on good grounds. But I do not understand his date, 1060-1066, as the Popedom of Victor the Second was from 1055 to 1057. Siward, who died early in 1055, could hardly have signed an address to Pope Victor.

&lt;sup>1</sup> See vol. i. p. 539.

&lt;sup>9</sup> See vol. i. p. 588.

CHAP. VII. and Huntingdon within the proper limits of Mercia.1 He ruled, we are told, with great firmness and severity, labouring hard to bring his troublesome province into something like order.2 Nor was he lacking in that bounty to the Church, which might seem specially needful as an atonement for the crime by which he rose to power.3

England not tending to separation but to union.

Comparison with Frankish history.

the Earldom as affected by the Danish Conquest.

The mention of these great Earls suggests several considerations as to the constitutional and administrative systems of the time. It is quite a mistake to think, as often has been thought, that the position of these powerful viceroys at all proves that England was at this time tending to separation. It was in truth tending to closer union, and the position of the great Earls is really one of the signs of that tendency. A mistaken parallel has sometimes been drawn between the condition of England under Eadward and the condition of France under the later Karlings. The transfer of the English sceptre to the house of Godwine is of course likened to the transfer of the French sceptre to the house of Hugh of Paris. we are to look for a parallel in the history of Gaul, we shall find one, by no means exact but certainly the closer of the two, in the state of things under the later Merwings, and in the transfer of the Frankish sceptre to the Carolingian dynasty. The position of Godwine and Harold is, of the two, more akin to the position of Charles Martel and Pippin than it is to that of Hugh the Great and Hugh Capet. Nature of The Earls of Eadward's reign were, as I have already explained,4 not territorial princes, gradually withdrawing themselves from the authority of their nominal overlord, but great magistrates, wielding indeed a power well nigh royal within their several governments, but wielding it only by delegation from the common sovereign. The Danish

&lt;sup>1</sup> See Appendix G.

* See Chronn. 1055

&lt;sup>2</sup> Vita Eadw. 421, 422.

<sup>4</sup> See vol. i. p. 274.

Conquest, and the fearful slaughter of the ancient nobility CHAP. VII. in the wars of Swend and Crut, had done much to break up the force of ancient local associations and the influence of the ancient local families. Many of these families, the Rest Anglian Earls for instance, doubtless became extinct. From the accession of Cnut we find a new state of things. The rule of the old half-kingly families, holding an almost hereditary sway over whole kingdoms, and apparently with subordinate Ealdormen in each shire, gradually dies out. Cnut divided the Kingdom as he pleased, appointing Danes or Englishmen, and Englishmen of old or of new families, as he thought good. England was now divided among a few Earls, who were distinctly representatives of the King. In Northumberland and Mercia the claims of ancient princely families were to some extent regarded; in Wessex and East-Anglia not at all. The rank of Earl is now held by a very few persons, connected either with the royal family or with the men whose personal influence was great at the time.1 The Earls of Eadward's reign are always either his own kinsmen or else kinsmen of Godwine or Leofric. Siward alone keeps his Position of Earldom for life; but, while he lives, his influence hardly berland. extends beyond his own province, and, after his death, Northumberland falls under the same law as the rest of the Kingdom. No doubt Northumberland still retained more of the character of a distinct state than any other part of England; still the forces of Northumberland march at the command of the King, and the Northumbrian Earldom is at the disposal of the King and his Witan.3 We do not however find the same signs of the constant immediate exercise of the royal power in Northhumberland which we find in Wessex, Mercia, and East-Anglia. We have throughout this reign a series of writs

•

&lt;sup>1</sup> See Appendix G. <sup>2</sup> Chron. 1051. <sup>3</sup> Chron. 1055.

Evidence of the King's writs.

CHAP. VII. addressed to the Bishops and Earls of those districts, which show that an Earl of one of those great Earldoms commonly acted as the local Earl of each shire in his province, with no subordinate Earl or Ealdorman under him. While such writs are exceedingly common in Wessex and East-Anglia, one such writ only exists addressed to a Northumbrian Earl, and that is in the days of Tostig.1 In Siward's days possibly the King's writ hardly ran in Northumberland. Those addressed to the Earls of the house of Leofric are also rare. It is clear that the King's power was more fully established under the Earls of Godwine's family than elsewhere. No doubt the royal authority was formally the same in every part of the Kingdom, but the memories and traces of ancient independence in Northumberland and Northern Mercia made its practical exercise more difficult in those districts.

Further evidence of the write as to a change in the condition of the Folkland.

The class of writs of which I have just spoken throw some light on constitutional questions in another way. They come in under Cnut,2 and they become very common under Eadward, being found alongside of documents of the more ancient form. They are announcements which the King makes to the Bishop, Earl, Sheriff, Thegns, and others of some one shire, or sometimes to the Bishops, Earls, and Thegas of the whole Kingdom, which do not, like documents of the ancient form, bear the signatures of any Witan. They are the manifest prototypes of the royal writs of later times. They are, like the other documents, mostly grants of one kind or another; only they seem to proceed from the King's personal authority, without any confirmation from a national Gemót. Now it is hardly possible that the mass of grants of this sort which are preserved can all of them have been grants out of the King's private estate. And, if they are grants of folkland to be turned into bookland on CHAP. VII. whatever tenure, allodial or feudal, a very important question arises. If the King could make such grants by his own authority, a change must have taken place in the ideas entertained as to folkland. In short, the change which was completed after the Conquest 1 must have already been in progress. The Folkland must have been beginning to be looked on as Terra Regis. In short, strictly feudal ideas were gradually coming in on this as on other matters. And doubtless, in this respect, as in others, the Danish Conquest did much to prepare the way for the Norman. But, if the Witenagemot insensibly lost its General authority in a matter in which we may well believe that the Witan its voice had long been nearly formal, it retained its general not lessened. powers undiminished. It still, as of old, elected Kings, outlawed Earls, discussed and determined the foreign relations of the Kingdom. The fame of Eadward as a lawgiver is mythical; but the fame of government carried on in strict conformity to the laws and constitution of the country, is one which fairly belongs to him, or rather to the illustrious men by whom his power was practically wielded.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Cod. Dipl. vi. 203.

&lt;sup>2</sup> For the earliest example, one of 1020, see Kemble, Archeologica Journal, xiv. 61, 62.

I have now to end this sketch by a brief view of the Scotland condition of the subordinate Kingdoms and of the relations under Macbeth. of England to foreign countries. Scotland was now ruled by the famous Macbeth. He had, as Maarmor or under-King of Moray, done homage to Cnut<sup>2</sup> along with his superior Malcolm. Duncan, the youthful grandson of Reign and Malcolm, unsuccessful, as we have seen, in his invasion Duncan. of England,<sup>3</sup> was equally so in his warfare with the Northmen of Orkney.<sup>4</sup> Soon after this last failure, he was murdered by his own subjects, Macbeth being at least the

&lt;sup>1</sup> See vol. i. p. 102. <sup>2</sup> See vol. i. p. 499. , See vol. i. p. 564.

Orkneyinga Saga, Ant. Celt. Scand. 172 et seqq. Robertson, i. 114. Burton, i. 369.

CHAP. VII. prime mover in the deed. The murdered prince had married a kinswoman of the Earl of the Northumbrians,2 by whom he left two infant sons, Malcolm, afterwards famous as Malcolm Canmore, and Donald Bane. But the 1040-1058. Crown was assumed by Macbeth, on some claim, it would seem, of hereditary right, either in himself or in his wife Gruach.3 Macbeth, and still more Gruach, have been so immortalized in legend that it is not easy to recall them to their true historical personality. But, from what little can be recovered about them, they certainly seem not to have been so black as they are painted. The crime of Macbeth against Duncan is undoubted; but it was, to say the least, no baser than the crime of Siward against-Eadwulf; and Macbeth, like Siward, ruled well and vigorously the dominion which he had won by crime. genuine Scottish tradition points to the reign of Macbeth as a period of unusual peace and prosperity in that disturbed land.4 Macbeth and Gruach were also bountiful to churches in their own land, and Macbeth's munificence to certain unknown persons at Rome was thought worthy of record by chroniclers beyond the bounds of Scotland.<sup>5</sup> One hardly knows whether this was merely by way of alms, like the gifts of Cnut, and it seems uncertain whether Macbeth, like Cnut and Harold, personally made the

Reign of Macbeth.

Macbeth distributes money at Rome. 1050.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Fordun, iv. 44. Robertson, i. 116. Marianus Scotus (Pertz, v. 557) says expressly, "Donnchad Rex Scotiæ in autumno occiditur a duce suo Macbethad mac Finnloech, cui successit in regnum annis xvii."

&lt;sup>2</sup> Fordun, u. s. "Consanguinea Siwardi Comitis."

<sup>8</sup> Robertson, i. 120 et seqq. Burton, i. 371-2.

&lt;sup>4</sup> Innes, Scotland in the Middle Ages, p. 118.

Marianus (Pertz, v. 558). "Rex Scottiæ Macbethad Romæ argentum pauperibus seminando distribuit." Florence (1050) leaves out the word "pauperibus," and changes "seminando" into "spargendo." The change can hardly be undesigned, and of the influence of money at Rome we shall hear presently in the case of Bishop Ulf. Chron. Petrib. 1047. John of Peterborough (48) combines the two readings, saying, "Machetus Rex Scotorum Romæ argentum spargendo pauperibus distribuit."

Roman pilgrimage. The words however in which the CHAP. VII. gifts of Macbeth are spoken of might almost imply that his bounty had a political object. It is possible that, even at this early time, the Scottish King may have thought it desirable to get the Roman Court on his side, and he may have found, like later Princes and prelates, that a liberal distribution of money was the best way of winning the favour of the Apostolic See. The high character of the reigning Pontiff, Leo the Ninth, puts him personally above all suspicion of unlawful gain; but then, as afterwards, subordinates were probably less scrupulous. The few notices which we find of Scottish affairs during the early years of Eadward might suggest that Macbeth felt his position precarious with regard to his English overlord. He had done homage to Cnut, but there is no record of his having renewed it to Eadward. There is however no sign of open enmity for many years.

In Wales a remarkable power was growing up, which Gruffydd will often call for notice throughout the whole of the Wales. reign of Eadward. The year before the death of Harold, 1039-1063. Gruffydd the son of Llywelyn became King of Gwynedd or North Wales, a description which now begins to be used in its modern sense. He ruled with great vigour and ability. He gradually extended his dominion over the whole of Wales, not scrupling to avail himself of Saxon help against enemies of his own race. On the other hand, he more than once, sometimes alone, sometimes in concert with English traitors, proved himself a really formidable enemy to England. He was the last prince under whom any portion of the Welsh nation played a really important part in the history of Britain. He was, for Wales in the narrower sense, pretty well what Cadwalla had been, ages before, for Strathclyde.2 In the 633.

&lt;sup>1</sup> See Robertson, i. 122. Burton, i. 373.

&lt;sup>2</sup> See vol. i. p. 36.

CHAP. VII. very first year of his reign, he made an inroad into Mercia, His victory which has been already spoken of.1 He penetrated as far at Rhyddy-Gross. 1039.

as Rhyd-y-Groes, near Upton-on-Severn, a spot still retaining its British name,2 and there he fought the battle in which Eadwine, the brother of Earl Leofric, was killed. At the time of Eadward's accession he was busily engaged in various conflicts with the princes of South Wales, who did not scruple to call in the help of the heathen Danes of Ireland against him.3 In the year of Eadward's election, he had just won a great victory over

His wars in South Wales.

1042. a combined host of this kind at Aberteifi or Cardigan.4

Eadward's foreign powers.

The relations of King Eadward to foreign powers were, friendly re-lations with for the most part, friendly. With Normandy and other French states they were, as we have seen and shall see, only too friendly. But this was a time of growing intercourse, not with France only, but with Continental nations generally. Pilgrimages to Rome, and other foreign journeys and embassies, were becoming far more usual than before among eminent Englishmen, both clergy and laity. Earl Harold's travels, undertaken in order to study the condition and resources of foreign countries on Connexion the spot, form a memorable example.<sup>5</sup> The connexion between England and Germany was now very close; the great Emperor Henry the Third sedulously sought the friendship of his English brother-in-law; and there is, as we have seen, little doubt that the German connexion was cultivated by the patriotic party as a counterpoise to the French tendencies of the King.6 The promotion of German churchmen began early in Eadward's reign, when it could hardly have taken place except with the sanction of Godwine. The only danger that seemed to threaten with Germany.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Ann. Camb. 1039. Brut y Tywysogion, 1037. <sup>1</sup> See vol. i. p. 564.

&lt;sup>3</sup> Brut. 1040, 1042. Ann. Camb. 1039-1047. In one battle in 1040 Gruffydd seems to have been taken prisoner by the Danes of Dublin. But the whole narrative is very confused. See the entries under 1041 and 1042.

<sup>4</sup> Brut, 1042. Ann. Camb. 1045?

&lt;sup>5</sup> See above, p. 40.

&lt;sup>6</sup> See above, p. 41.

hin the North. Magnus of Norway conceived himself CHAP. VII. to have sequired, by virtue of his agreement with Hartha-Relations with the to have seed on the Crown of England; but his wars North; with Swend hindered him from Putting it forward for Magnus. some years to come.

The reign of Eadward was, on the whole, a reign of peace. The reign His admirers use somewhat exaggerated language on the ward comsubject, 2 as his reign was certainly more disturbed than paratively those of either Eadgar or Cnut. Still, compared with most periods of the same length in those troubled times, the twenty-four years of Eadward form a period of unusual tranquillity. Foreign war, strictly so called, there was none. England was threatened by Norway, and she herself interfered in the affairs of Flanders; but no actual fighting seems to have taken place on either occasion. Within the island matters were somewhat less quiet. Scotland was successfully invaded, and the old royal line restored. A few meursions of Scandinavian pirates are recorded, and Gruffydd of Wales remained for many years a thorn in the side of his English neighbours. But the main interest of this reign gathers round domestic affairs, round the revolts, the banishments, and the reconciliations of the great Earls, and, still more, round that great national movement against French influence in Church and State, of which Godwine and his family were the representatives and leaders.

<sup>1</sup> See above, p. 18.

* Tono elevatus est sol et luna stetit in ordine suo. quando, Edwardo gloris et honore coronato, sacerdotes sapientià et sanctitate fulgebant, monasteria omni relligione pollebant, clerus in officio suo, populus stabat in gradu suo ; videbatur etiam terra fecun liur, aer salubrior, sol serenior, maris unda pacatior. Quoniam diu Rege pacifico regnante in uno vinculo pacis omnia convenirent, ut nihil pestilenticeum esset in aere, mihil in mari tempestuosum, in terra nihu infecundum, mbul inordinatum in clero, nihil in place tumultuceum." It would be endless to contrast all these details with those found in the Chronicles and the Biographer. Even William of Malmesbury, comparatively sober as he is, goes too far when he enys (ii. 196), "Denique so regnante, nullus tumultus domesticus qui non cità comprimeratur, nullum bellum forinsecus, omnia domi forasque quieta, omnia tranquilla."

CHAP. VII.

§ 3. From the Coronation of Eadward to the Remission of the War-Tax. 1043-1051.

Character of the years

This first period of the reign of Eadward is not marked 1043-1051. by any very striking events till we draw near to its close. At home we have to mark the gradual expulsion, already spoken of, of those who had been conspicuous in opposing Eadward's election, and, what is of far more importance, the gradually increasing influence of the foreign favourites. This is most easily traced in the disposition of ecclesiastical preferments. The foreign relations of England at this time lay mainly with the kingdoms of the North, where the contending princes had not yet wholly bidden farewell to the hope of uniting all the crowns of the Great Cnut on a single brow. But the relations between England and the Empire were also of importance, and the affairs of Flanders under its celebrated Count Baldwin the Fifth form a connecting link between those of England, Germany, and Scandinavia. The usual border warfare with Wales continues; with the renowned usurper of Scotland there was most likely a sort of armed truce. These various streams of events seem for some years to flow, as it were, side by side, without commingling in any marked way. But towards the end of our period they all in a manner unite in the tale of crime and misfortune which led to the disgrace and downfall of the eldest son of Godwine, but which thereby paved the way for the elevation of the second.

Relations between Eadward and his mother.

The first act of the new King was one which was perhaps neither unjust nor impolitic, but which, at first sight, seems strangely incongruous with his character for sanctity and gentleness. With all his fondness for Nomens, there was one person of Morman birth for whom CHAP, VII. he seems to have and but little gratitude. This was no other than his own mother. It is not very easy to understand the exact relations between Emma and her son. We are told that she had been very hard upon him, and that she had done less for him than he would — contributed too little, it would seem, from her accumulated hoards—both before he became King and since. Now it is not clear what opportunities Emma had had of being hard upon her son since the days of his childhood. During the greater part of their joint lives, Eadward had been an exile in Normandy, while Emma had shared the throne of England as the wife of Cnut. Her fault must rather have been neglect to do anything for his interests, refusal, it may be, to give anything of her wealth for the relief of his comparative poverty, rather than any actual hardships which she could have inflicted on him. She had, as we have seen, altogether thrown in her lot with her second husband, and had seemingly wished her first marriage to be wholly forgotten.2 But there seems not to be the slightest ground for the scandal which represented her as having acted in any way a hostile part to her sons after the death of Cnut.3 All the more probable versions of the death of Ælfred represent her as distinctly favourable to his enterprise.4

Peterborough, and Canterbury Chronicles. Worcester is more explicit;
"Forban be been was more barn cyngs hire suna swide heard, bat hee him lasse dyde bonne he wolde, ar barn be he cyng ware, and eac syddan."
It is translated by Florence; "Vel quia prinaquam Rex esset effectue, wel post, missus quans volebat illi dederat, et ai valde dura exstiterat." and by Roger of Wendover, "ee quod prinaquam Rex fuerat, nihil illi contulerat gued petebat" (i. 482). William of Malmesbury says (ii. 196), "Mater quod petebat" (i. 482). William of Malmesbury says (ii. 196), "Mater
The then gives the reason, namely her preference for Cout over Æthelred.

See vol. i. pp. 544, 555, 559.

See vol. i. p. 454 See vol. i. p. 545 et seqq.

CHAP. VII. She had herself suffered spoliation and exile in the days of Harold; she had returned with Harthacnut, and, in his Probable offence of Emma.

days, she seems almost to have been looked on as a sharer in the royal authority. That authority she had at least not used to keep back her favourite son from the recall of his banished half-brother. It is not wonderful if, under these circumstances, there was little love between mother and son. Still there does not, up to the death of Harthacnut, seem to have been any unpardonable offence committed on the part of Emma. But the charge that she had done less for Eadward than he would, since he came to the Crown, seems to have a more definite meaning. It doubtless means that she had refused to contribute of her treasures to the lawful needs of the State. It may also mean that she had been, to say the least, not specially zealous in supporting Eadward's claims to the Crown. She is described as dwelling at Winchester in the possession, not only of great landed possessions, the morninggifts of her two marriages, but of immense hoarded wealth of every kind.3 Harthacnut had doubtless restored, and probably increased, all that had been taken from her by Of her mode of employing her wealth we find different accounts; putting the two statements together, we may perhaps infer that she was bountiful to churches and monasteries, but niggardly to the poor.4

&lt;sup>1</sup> See vol. i. pp. 535, 561.

&lt;sup>2</sup> See the writ quoted at vol. i. p. 580, which cannot belong to the first reign of Harthacnut in Wessex only.

&lt;sup>8</sup> Besides land, the Abingdon Chronicle speaks of her wealth "on golde and on seolfre and on unasecgendlicum bingum." So that of Worcester says of her treasures, "ba wæron unatellendlice." So Florence; "quicquid in auro, argento, gemmis, lapidibus, aliisve rebus pretiosum habuerat."

<sup>4</sup> Will. Malms. ii. 196. "Congestis undecumque talentis crumenas infecerat, pauperum oblita; quibus non patiebatur dari nummum ne diminueret numerum. Itaque quod injustè coacervarat non inhoneste ablatum, ut egenorum proficeret compendio et fisco sufficeret regio." Though accepting

lat wither this bounty nor this niggardliness was a legal CHAP. VII. In wither was a legal more definite offence must here larked behind. Her treasures, or part of them, may here been gained by illegal grants from Harthacout; it is almost certain, from the language of our authorities, that they had been illegally refused to the public service. But what happened seems to imply some still deeper offence. Witens-The conduct of Emma became the subject of debate in Gloucester. a meeting of the Witan; her punishment was the result November, of a decree of that body, and all that was done to her was done with the active approval of the three great Earls, Godwine, Leofric, and Siward. In the month of November after Eadward's coronation, a Gemôt—perhaps a forestalling of the usual Midwinter Gemét-was held at Gloucester. That town seems now to take the place which was held by Oxford a little earlier 2 as the scene of courts and councils.3 It became during this reign, what it remained during the reign of the Conqueror, the place where the King wore his Crown at the Christmas festival, as he wore it at Winchester at Easter. It was convenient for such purposes as lying near at once to the borders of two of the great Earldoms. It lay also near to the borders of the dangerous Welsh, whose motions, under princes like the two Gruffydds, it was doubtless often expedient to watch with the whole wisdom and the whole force of the realm. The result of the deliberations of the Wise Men was that the King in person, accompanied by the this account (here referentibus etsi plurimum fides haberi debeat), he goes on, as he does elsewhere (ii. 181. see vol. i. p. 487), to speak of her bounty to monasteries, especially at Winchester.

1

&lt;sup>1</sup> A meeting of the Witan is implied in the language of the Worcester Chronicle, "Man gerædde ban cynge bet he rad of Gleawcestre," and in the presence and consent of the three Earls—" ut illi [Leofricus, Godwinus, et Siwardus] consilium ei dederant," as Florence says.

* See vol. i. p. 539.

&lt;sup>3</sup> See vol. i. p. 588.

Eadward and the Earls despoil Émma of her treagures. November 16, 1043.

CHAP. VII. three great Earls, 1 rode from Gloucester to Winchester, came unawares<sup>2</sup> upon the Lady, occupied her lands,<sup>3</sup> and seized all that she had in gold, silver, jewels, and precious stones. They left her, however, we are told, enough for her maintenance, and bade her live quietly at Winchester.4 She now sinks into utter insignificance for the remainder of her days.5

> Now the last order, to live quietly at Winchester, seems to imply some scheme or intrigue on the part of Emma more serious than even an illegal refusal to contribute of her wealth to the exigencies of the State. Is it possible that she had been one of the opponents of her son's election? A woman who had so completely transferred her affection to her second husband and his children, even though she had no hand in actual conspiracies against the offspring of her first marriage, may conceivably have preferred the nephew of Cnut to her own son by Æthelred. If so, her punishment was only the first act of a sort of persecution

&lt;sup>1</sup> So says the Worcester Chronicle, followed by Florence; "He rad of Gleawcestre, and Leofric eorl and Godwine eorl and Sigward eorl mid heora henge, to Wincestre;" "Festinato Rex cum comitibus Leofrico, Godwino, et Siwardo de civitate Gla worna Wintoniam venit." The other Chronicles do not imply the King's personal presence; "se cyng let geridan," &c.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Chron. Wig. "On unwer on be hlæfdian." Flor, Wig. "Venit improvise."

&lt;sup>3</sup> Chronn. Ab., Petrib., Cant. "Se cyng let geridan calle þa land þe his modor ahte him to handa." The Worcester Chronicler says nothing of the land.

&lt;sup>4</sup> Flor. Wig. "Verumtamen sufficienter ei ministrari necessaria præcepit et illam ibidem quietam manere jussit."

&lt;sup>5</sup> Emma signs a charter of her son's during this year 1043 (Cod. Dipl. iv. 74), which therefore belongs to an earlier Gemót than this of November, probably to one held at Winchester at the time of the coronation. From this time we find her signing only a few private documents (Cod. Dipl. iv. 86, 116) and documents connected with the Church of Winchester (iv. 90, 93). After her son's marriage she seems not to sign her son's charters at all. The documents at iv. 80, 99 are doubtful or spurious. On the Legend of Emma see Appendix H.

which during the next three or four years seems to have CHAP. VII. when during all who had supported the claims of Swend to the Crown. The whole party became marked men, and were gradually sent out of the Kingdom as occasion served. A few of their names may probably be recovered. We have records of several cases of banishment and confiscation during the early years of Eadward, which are doubtless those of the partisans of Eadward's Danish opponent. First and foremost was a brother of Swend himself, Osbeorn, who, like his brother Beorn, seems to have held the rank of Earl in England. The brothers must have Banishtaken different sides in the politics of the time, as Osbeorn swend's was banished, while Beorn retained his Earldom.2 banishment of Osbeorn did not stand alone. The great 1046. Danish Thegn Osgod Clapa was banished a few years later,3 and it was probably on the same account that Æthelstan the son of Tofig lost his estate at Waltham.4 and that Gunhild, the niece of Cnut and daughter of Wyrtgeorn, was banished together with her two sons Heming and Thurkill.<sup>5</sup> She was then a widow for the second time through the death of her husband Earl Harold.6 He had gone on a pilgrimage to Rome, and was on his way back to Denmark, when he was treacherously

1 See above, p. 10.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Adam of Bremen, iii. 13.

&lt;sup>3</sup> Chronn. and Flor. Wig. 1044, 1045, 1046, 1047. All dates are riven.

&lt;sup>4</sup> De Inv. 14. "Adelstanus . . . degenerans à patris astutis et sapientis . . . multa ex his perdidit, et inter cetera Waltham." This may however only mean that he squandered his estate. His son Esegar was Staller two years later. See Professor Stubbs' note, and vol. i. p. 591.

&lt;sup>5</sup> Chron. Wig. 1045. Flor. Wig. 1044. If Gunhild's sons were old enough to be dangerous, they must have been the children of Hakon who died in 1030. The names Heming and Thurkill have already appeared as those of a pair of brothers. Vol. i. p. 376. Cf. Knytlinga Saga, ap. Johnston, Ant. Celt. Scand. 105.

&lt;sup>6</sup> On this Harold see vol. i. p. 476. The signature to a charter of Bishop Lyfing's, 1042 (Cod. Dipl. iv. 69), must be his.

CHAP. VII. murdered by Ordulf, the brother-in-law of Magnus of Norway.<sup>1</sup> That Harold was bound for Denmark, and not for England, where his wife and children or step-children were, may perhaps tend to show that he was already an exile from England. It is not impossible that Godescale the Wend ought to be added to the list.<sup>2</sup>

Stigand, appointed Bishop of Elmham, and deposed. April-November, 1043. Whether the fall of Emma was or was not connected with the penalties which thus fell on the relics of the Danish party, it certainly carried with it the momentary fall of one eminent Englishman. The disgrace of the Lady was accompanied by the disgrace of the remarkable—we might almost say the great—churchman by whose counsels she was said to be governed. We have already seen Stigand, once the Priest of Assandun,<sup>3</sup> appointed to a Bishoprick and almost immediately deprived of it.<sup>4</sup> The like fate now happened to him a second time. He was, it would seem, still unconsecrated;<sup>5</sup> but, seemingly about the time of Eadward's coronation, he was named and

These banishments probably helped, along with the displaced massacre of Saint Brice, to form the groundwork for the legend of the general expulsion or massacre of Danes in England. See vol. i. p. 592.

¹ Adam Brem. ii. 75. "Caussa mortis ea fuit quod de regali stirpe Danorum genitus, propior sceptro videbatur quam Magnus."

&lt;sup>2</sup> The Chronica Sclavica, c. 13, makes Godescalc leave England after the death of Cnut (vol. i. 649, 494), but Adam (u. s.) puts his departure after the death of Cnut and his sons. If this last account be correct, it looks very much as if Godescalc was banished. According to Saxo (p. 204), he served for some time under Swend in his war with Magnus. Saxo also (p. 208) marries him to Siritha (Sigrid?) a natural daughter of Swend, but the national Chronicle distinctly makes his wife Demmyn, Cnut's sister or daughter, alive at the time of his death.

&lt;sup>3</sup> See vol. i. p. 473.

<sup>4</sup> See vol. i. p. 563.

&lt;sup>5</sup> A private document in Cod. Dipl. iv. 116 is signed by "Stigand p." It is assigned to the year 1049, but this date must be wrong, as it is signed by Ælfweard Bishop of London, who died in 1044. As it is signed by Eadward and Emma, it must belong to the early Gemót of 1043, that at which Stigand received his appointment as Bishop and Swegen as Earl.

consecrated to the East-Anglian Bishoprick of Elmham. CHAP. VII. But the spoliation of Emma was accompanied by the deposition of Stigand from the dignity to which he had just been raised. He was deprived of his Bishoprick, and his goods were seized into the King's hands, evidently by a sentence of the same Gemót which decreed the proceedings against the Lady. Whatever Emma's fault was, Stigand was held to be a sharer in it. The ground assigned for his deposition was that he had been partaker of the counsels of the Lady, and that she had acted in all things by his advice.2 That Stigand should have supported the claims of Swend is in itself not improbable. He had risen wholly by the favour of Cnut, his wife, and his sons. The strange thing is that so wary a statesman should not have seen how irresistibly the tide was setting in favour of Eadward. One thing is certain, that, if Stigand mistook his interest this time, he knew how in the long run to recover his lost place and to rise to places far higher.

During the whole of this period ecclesiastical appoint-Importments claim special notice. They are at all times im- ecclesiasportant witnesses to the state of things at any particular tical appointments moment, and in a period of this kind they are the best at this indications of the direction in which popular and royal favour is setting. The patrons or electors of an ecclesiastical office can choose far more freely, they can set themselves much more free from the control of local and family influences, than those who are called on to appoint to temporal offices. For King Eadward to appoint a French Earl would prove much more than his appointment of a French Bishop. It would prove much more as to his own inclinations; it would prove much more again as to

&lt;sup>1</sup> Chron. Ab. 1043. Chronn. Petrib. and Cant. 1042.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Chron. Ab. "And rate bes man sette Stigant of his bisceoprice, and nam eal beet he abte bam cinge to handa; for oam he wees nebst his modor ræde, and heo for swá swá he hire rædde; þæs te men wendon."

CHAP. VII. the temper of the people by whom such an appointment was endured. To appoint a French or German Earl as the successor of Godwine or Leofric would doubtless have been impossible. But Eadward found means to fill the sees of Canterbury, London, and Dorchester with French Prelates. In those matters he had a freer choice, because, in the case of an ecclesiastical office, no hereditary claim or preference could possibly be put forward. The same freedom of choice still remains to the dispensers of church patronage in our own times. The Lord Lieutenant, the Sheriff, the ordinary magistrates, of any county are necessarily chosen from among men belonging to that county. But the Bishop, the Dean, the ordinary clergy, may never have set foot in the diocese till they are called on to exercise their functions within it. Then, as now, various influences limited the choice of temporal functionaries which did not limit the choice of spiritual functionaries. It is therefore of special moment to mark the course of ecclesiastical appointments at this time, as supplying our best means of tracing the growth of the foreign influence and the course of the resistance made to it.

Mode of appointing Bishops.

It is not very clear what the exact process of appointing a Bishop at this time was. It is clear that the royal will was the chief power in the appointment. It is clear that the official document which gave the Bishop-elect a claim to consecration was a royal writ, to which now, under the French influences of Eadward's court, a royal seal, in imitation of continental practice, was beginning to be attached. It is also clear that the appointment was regularly made in full Witenagemót. This of course implies that the Witan had at least the formal right of saying Yea or Nay to the King's nomination. But we hear at the same time of capitular elections, which clearly were not a mere form, though it rested with the King CHAP. VII. to accept or reject the selected candidate. No doubt some process was in use, in which the Chapter, the Witan, and the King all took their parts,1 but in ordinary speech the appointment is always said to rest with the King, who is constantly described as giving a Bishoprick to such and such a man. The King too at this time exercised the right, which afterwards became the subject of so much controversy, of investing the Bishop-elect with the ring and staff.2 It is clear also, from the case of Stigand just recorded, that the King and his Witan had full power of deposing a Bishop. On the other hand, probably owing to Increased the number of foreign ecclesiastics now in the Kingdom, with Rome. references to the Court of Rome become from this time far more frequent. For an Archbishop to go to Rome for his pallium was nothing new; but now we hear of Bishops going to Rome for consecration or confirmation, and of the Roman Court claiming at least a veto on the nomination of the English King.3

&lt;sup>1</sup> Chron. Petrib. 1048. <sup>2</sup> See vol. i. p. 320. Chron. Ab. 1050. <sup>3</sup> See vol. i. p. 565. Vita Radw. p. 399.

It is perhaps more startling to find that the court of Prevalence Saint Eadward was no more free from the suspicion of simony. simony than the courts of ruffians like Harold and Harthacutt. It is clear however that it was neither on the King

In very much later times, in the fifteenth century, we find Parliament, King, and Chapter all combining in the appointment of Bishops, in a way which would rather surprise us now. The House of Commons petitions the King to recommend a particular person to the Chapter. Two such applications were made in favour of Archbishop Bourchier, at different stages of his advancement. See Hook, Lives of Archbishops, v. 276, 282. The order in Eadward's time was different, as the Chapter seems, sometimes at least, to have first elected and then to have asked the confirmation of King and Witan. But the principle is much the same. At all events, in the eleventh century, though the papal veto was just beginning to be heard of, a papal provision was quite unknown.

&lt;sup>2</sup> See Lingard, Anglo-Saxon Church, i. 94, where the whole matter is very fairly stated. Investiture by the staff is implied in the famous legend of Saint Wulfstan at the tomb of Eadward.

&lt;sup>3</sup> Chron. Petrib. 1047.

&lt;sup>4</sup> See vol. i. pp. 563, 588.

Siward appointed coadjutor to Archbishop Eadrige.

1044.

CHAP. VII. personally nor on the Earl of the West-Saxons that this disgraceful imputation rested. One can hardly help suspecting that it was the itching palms of the King's foreign favourites which proved the most frequent restingplace for the gold of those who sought for ecclesiastical dignities by corrupt means. In the year after Eadward's coronation we meet with a story which brings out all these points very strongly. Archbishop Eadsige found himself incapacitated by illness from discharging his functions, and wished either to resign his see or, as it would rather seem, to appoint a coadjutor. But he feared lest, if his intentions were made publicly known, some man whom he did not approve of might beg or buy the office.1 He therefore took into his counsels none but the two first men in the realm, Earl Godwine and King Eadward himself. Godwine would naturally be glad of the opportunity to put some check on the growing foreign influences, and Eadward, easily as he was led astray, would doubtless be anxious, when the case was fairly placed before him, to follow any course which tended to preserve the purity of ecclesiastical rule. By the authority then of Eadward and Godwine, but with the knowledge of very few otherpersons,2 Siward, Abbot of Abingdon, was consecrated as Coadjutor-Archbishop.<sup>3</sup> He acted on behalf of the Primate

&lt;sup>1</sup> Chron. Ab. 1044. Petrib. 1043. "Fordam se arcebiscop wende bæt hit sum offer man abiddan wolde, obbe gebicgan, be he wyrs truwode and ufe, gif hit ma manna wiste."

<sup>2</sup> Ib. "Be bees cynges leafe, and reade, and Godwines corles. Hit was elles feawum mannum cut ær hit gedón wæs." So William of Malmesbury, ii. 197. "Ante cum Rege tanthm et Comite communicato consilio, ne quis ad tantum fastigium aspiraret indignus, vel prece vel pretio."

&lt;sup>3</sup> He was consecrated to the see of Upsala, according to Professor Stubbs (Ep. Succ. p. 20) and Dean Hook (i. 491); to Rochester, according to the Abingdon History (i. 452). But Florence (1049) calls him "Siwardus, Edsii Dorubernensis archiepiscopi chorepiscopus." William of Malmesbury (De Gest. Pont. 116) has a strange story, how Siward was to succeed Eadsige, but treating him harshly, and not even allowing him enough to eat, was deprived of the succession to the Archbishoprick, and had to content

x years, till illness caused him in his turn to CHAP. VII. ffice and return to Abingdon, where he died. He returns sige again assumed the administration of the don and ick,2 for a short time before his own death. re memorable appointment was made in the Ponth of e same year. Ælfweard, Bishop of London Ælfweard f Evesham, a Prelate whose name has already of London. our history, fell sick of leprosy. He returned 1044. ey, but the brotherhood with one consent readmission. They met, we are told, with the of their churlishness. Ælfweard turned away ant Abbey of Ramsey, where he had spent his s, and where he was gladly received. He soon , leaving great gifts to the hospitable monks of R 1 mour however added that they largely conhis own former gifts to Evesham, and that he ith Rochester—"quo leviaret verecundlam, quo detrimentum tor." Siward signs charters with the title of Archbishop, Cod. 96, 103, 105 ; as Bishop only in iv. 99 ; as Abbot only in a very charter, iv. 101. See also Hen, Hunt. M. H. B. 759 B. Angl. 6. Bromton, 938.

not scruple to remove from that undutiful house ecious things which had been the gifts of other ors.5 Two great spiritual preferments were thus one of them, the see of London, one of the most nt in the Kingdom. The lesser office at Evesham

n. Ab. 1048. Chron. Wig. 1050. Fl. Wig. 1049. See Hist. Ab. livard was a benefactor to his abbey, and fills a considerable place ory.

n. Ab. 1048. Petrib. 1046.

roL i. p. 568.

n. Wig. 1045. Fl. Wig. 1044. Hist. Eves. p. 85. Hist. Ram. c. 104. Vg. u. s. "Ablatis ex maxima parte libris et conamentis, que m contulerat loco, et quadam, ut fertur, que alii contulerant." Bams, u. s. But the Evesham historian, who uses very strong sgainst the monks of his own house, does not charge Ælfweard e than transferring his intended gifts from Evesham to Rameey; iis loco offerre cogitabat, versă vice presfate ecclesia Ramesise ndonabat." Hist. Eves. p. 85.

1048-50.

CHAP. VII. was conferred on an Englishman, Wulfmer or Mannig,

He is succeeded by Robert of Jumièges.

a monk of the house; but in the nomination to the great East-Saxon Bishoprick, the foreigners obtained one of their most memorable triumphs. In a full Witenagemót, holden in London in the month of August, the Bishoprick of the city in which the Assembly was held was bestowed on August 101 one Robert, a Norman monk, who had first been Prior of Saint Ouen's at Rouen, and afterwards Abbot of the great house of Jumièges.<sup>2</sup> He has there left behind him a noble memorial in the stately minster which still survives in ruins, but in England it is not too much to say, that he became, in this high post and in the still higher post which he afterwards reached, the pest of the Kingdom. His influence over the mind of the feeble King was unbounded.3 We are ludicrously told that, if Robert said that a black crow was white, King Eadward would at once believe him.4 He is described at all hands as being the chief stirrer up of strife between Eadward and his native subjects.

Baneful influence of Robert.

His calumnies against Godwine.

> <sup>1</sup> Chron. Wig. 1045. Fl. Wig. 1044. Hist. Eves. p. 86. Mannig rebuilt the church (Chronn. Ab. and Wig. 1054), and continued Abbot till 1066, when he died, having been for some time disabled by palsy.

> He it was who separated the husband from the wife, and the King from his most faithful counsellors. He it was > whose slanderons tongue again brought up against the great

- <sup>2</sup> Will. Malm. Gest. Pont. 134 b. He is there spoken of simply as a monk of Jumièges, but from the Biographer (300) and from the Nova Chronica Normannia, A. 1037, it appears that he had been Abbot. (See Neustria Pia, p. 309.) He became Abbot in 1037, and began the church in 1040. William himself, in his History (ii. 199), speaks of his building as "Ecclesia Sanotæ Mariæ, quam ipse præcipuo et sumptuoso opere construxerat." He begins to sign as Bishop in 1046. Cod. Dipl. iv. 110.
- <sup>3</sup> William of Malmesbury (Gest. Pont. 116) makes Robert's influence with Eadward the recompense of some services done to him in Normandy. He goes on, "Is ergo et amore antiquo et recenti honore primas partes in consiliis regalibus vendicabat, quos vellet deponeret, quos liberet, sublimaret."
- <sup>4</sup> Ann. Wint. 21, Luard. "Tanti fuit homo ille in oculis Regis ut si diceret nigram cornicem esse candidam Rex citius ori illius quam oculis suis crederet."

Earl 1 that charge of complicity in the death of Ælfred CHAP. VII. of which he had been solemnly pronounced guiltless by the highest Court in the realm.2 And the career of Robert is His conone of great historical importance. It is closely connected with the with the immediate causes—it may even be reckoned among Norman invasion. the immediate causes—of the Norman invasion.3 Robert's appointment to the see of London may be fairly set down as marking a distinct stage in the progress of Norman influence in England. He was the first man of utterly alien speech who had held an English Bishoprick since the days of Roman, Scottish, or Cilician missionaries. His overthrow at a later time was one of the first-[1052.] fruits of the great national reaction against the strangers, and its supposed uncanonical character was one of the many pretences put forth by William to justify his invasion of England.

This appointment of Robert shows the great advance of the Norman influence. But it had not as yet reached its height. Godwine and the popular party seem to have been able to make a kind of compromise with the King. It was necessary to yield to the King's strong personal inclination in the case of Robert; but the other vacant preferments were secured for Englishmen. We have seen that Ælfweard's Abbey was not allowed to be held in plurality by his successor in the Bishoprick, but was bestowed on an Englishman of high character. Stigand Stigand too had by this time made his peace with Eadward and Bishop of Rimham. Godwine, and now began to climb the ladder of preferment afresh. He now again received the Bishoprick of odwin (Cat. of Bishops, p. 25) says truly, but without fully the force of his own words; "This man is said to have laid ation of the Normans conquest in England."

&lt;sup>1</sup> Vita Eadw. 400. So William of Malmesbury (u. s.); "Ille contra pertinaciùs insistere, donec præcipuos optimates, Godwinum dico et filios ejus, proditionis apud Regem accusatos Anglia expelleret. Expulsionis alise quoque fuere causse, et alii auctores, sicut aliàs non tacuimus. Sed ille clariùs ecinit, instantits accusavit." See vol. i. p. 573.

Banishment of Gunhild and her sons.

CHAP. VII. Elmham or of the East-Angles. And it was in the same year, and seemingly at the same Gemot, that Gunhild, "the noble wife," the widow of the Earls Hakon and Harold, the mother of Heming and Thurkill, was banished together with her sons.3

> This last event was one of that series of banishments which have been already spoken of as gradually falling on Condition of Northern Europe.

War of Swend and Magnus. 1044-1047.

all who had made themselves in any way prominent in opposition to the election of Eadward. But it was most likely not unconnected with the present threatening state of affairs in Northern Europe. The early years of Eadward in England were contemporary with the great struggle between Swend and Magnus for the Crown of Denmark. The details of that warfare are told in our Scandinavian authorities with the usual amount of confusion and contradiction, and it seems hopeless to think of altogether reconciling their conflicting statements. Our own Chronicles, as usual, supply the most promising means of harmonizing them in some small degree. We have seen that Magnus was in actual possession of both Norway and Denmark at the time of Eadward's coronation.3 Swend, after several battles, had found himself forsaken Connexion by every one, and had taken refuge in Sweden.4 Godescale the Wend, who had accompanied him from England, Swend and had forsaken him with the rest,5 and had entered on that mingled career as missionary and warrior among his heathen countrymen of which I have already spoken.6 In this warfare he most likely acted as an ally of Magnus, who was also renowned for victories over the same enemy.7

of Godescalc with Magnus.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Chron. Petrib. 1043. Fl. Wig. 1044.

&lt;sup>8</sup> See above, p. 63.

&lt;sup>3</sup> See above, p. 18.

Snorro, Saga of Magnus, 33, of Harold, 18 (Laing, ii. 391. iii. 17). Chron. Roskild. Lang. i. 377. Saxo, 203.

<sup>5</sup> Saxo, 204.

&lt;sup>6</sup> See vol. i. p. 649.

&lt;sup>7</sup> Saxo, 203. Swend. Agg. c. 5 (Lang. i. 56). So Adam Brem. ii. 75;

Magnus, now at the height of his power, King of Den- CHAP. VII. mark and Norway, conqueror of his heathen neighbours, Trium-phant posienjoying, as it would seem, the respect and attachment tion of of the people of both his Kingdoms, regretted and retracted the engagements of fidelity, perhaps even of submission, which he had made to Eadward when his own position seemed less secure. He now fell back on the He claims claim by virtue of which he had possessed himself of the Eng-Denmark, and which, in his eyes, gave him an equal right 1045. to the possession of England. Magnus sent an embassy to England, claiming the Crown, and setting forth his right.1 He and Harthacnut had agreed that whichever of them outlived the other should succeed to his domi-Harthacnut was dead; Magnus had, by virtue of that agreement, succeeded to the Crown of Denmark; he now demanded Harthacnut's other Kingdom of England. Eadward, we are told, answered in a magnanimous Eadward's strain, in which he directly rested his right to the English Crown on the choice of the English people.<sup>2</sup> While his brother lived, he had served him faithfully as a private man, and had put forward no claim by virtue of his birth. On his brother's death, he had been chosen King by the whole nation and solemnly consecrated to the kingly office. Lawful King of the English, he would never lay aside the Crown which his fathers had worn before him. Let Magnus come; he would raise no army against him, but Magnus should never mount the throne of England till he had taken the life of Eadward.3 Magnus, so the Norwegian Saga tells us, was so struck with this answer, that he gave up all thoughts of attacking

&quot;Magnus autem Rex pro justitia et fortitudine carus fuit Danis, verùm Sclavis terribilis, qui post mortem Chnut Daniam infestabant."

&lt;sup>1</sup> Snorro, Magnus, 38 (Laing, ii. 397). Ant. Celt. Scand. 184.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Snorro, Ant. Celt. Scand. 185. "Var þat þá rád her allra landsmanna at taka mik till Konungs her i Englandi."

&lt;sup>2</sup> Does this mean that Eadward meant to meet Magnus in single combat?

CHAP. VII. England, and acknowledged Eadward's right to the English Crown. This account, as perhaps Eadward's answer also, savours somewhat of romance. But that Magnus did contemplate an invasion of England is certain, and, as England had given him no cause for war, an invasion of England would seem to imply a Preparaclaim on the English Crown. The Norwegian King was tions looked on as dangerous in the year after Eadward's coroagainst Magnus. nation, and in the next year he was kept back from an 1044-5. invasion of England only by a renewal of the war in the North. In both these years Eadward found it necessary to gather a fleet together at Sandwich. In the first year the fleet amounted to thirty-five ships only; in the second year we are told that it was a fleet such as no man had ever seen before.2 In this last case we are distinctly told that its object was to repel an expected invasion on the

The war renewed by Swend in with HA-RADA. Early life and exploits of

Harold.

part of Magnus. The war was now renewed by Swend, seemingly in partnership with an actor of greater, though perhaps less partnership merited, renown than himself.3 Harold the son of Sigurd, ROLDHARD- the half-brother of Saint Olaf, had escaped as a stripling from the field of Stikkelstad, where his brother, according to one view, received the crown of martyrdom, while, according to another, he received only the just reward 1030-1044. of hasty and violent, however well-meant, interference with the ancient institutions of his country. Harold, surnamed Hardrada—the stern in council—lived to become the most renowned warrior of the North, the last Scandinavian King who ever set foot as an enemy on purely

&lt;sup>1</sup> Chron. Ab. 1044, 1045. Chron. Petrib. 1043.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Chron. Ab. 1045. "And þar wæs swa myoel here gegæderod swa nan man ne geseh, sciphere nænne maran on þysan lande."

* For the life of Harold Hardrada our chief authority is his Saga in Snorro, which will be found in the third volume of Laing's Translation. It fits in better than might have been expected with authentic history. There are also notices in Adam of Bremen and the Danish writers.

English ground, the last invader who was to feel the CHAP. VII. might of Englishmen fighting on their own soil for their own freedom, and who was, in his fall, to pave the way for the victory of an invader yet mightier than himself. The fight of Stamfordbridge, the fight of the two Harolds, will form one of the most striking scenes in a later stage of our history. As yet, Harold was known only as the hero of a series of adventures as wild and wonderful as any that have ever been recounted in poetry or romance. Wounded at Stikkelstad, the young prince was saved Escape of by a faithful companion, and was cherished during the from Stik. following winter by a yeoman ignorant of his rank. He kelstad. passed through Sweden into Russia, where he formed a friendship with King Jaroslaf of Novgorod. Thence, He goes after a few years, he betook himself, with a small train to Constantinople. of companions, to the Byzantine Court. He found the State of Eastern Empire in one of those periods of decay which pire. so strangely alternate in its history with periods of regeneration at home and victory abroad. The great Macedonian dynasty was still on the throne; but the mighty Basil was in his grave, and the steel-clad lancers of the New Rome were no longer the terror of Saracen, Bulgarian, and Russian. The Empire which he had saved, Reign of and which he had raised to the highest pitch of glory, Zoe. Zoe. had now become the plaything of a worthless woman, and the diadem of the Cæsars was passed on at every caprice of her fancy from one husband or lover to another. The Norwegian prince reached the Great City, the Mickelgard of Northern story, in the period of Byzantine history known as the Reigns of the Husbands of Zôê.1 The Eastern Cæsars had already begun to gather the Northern adventurers who appeared at their doors as friends or as enemies into that famous Warangian body-guard, the The Warcounterpart of the Housecarls of Cnut, which as yet angians.

&lt;sup>1</sup> See Finlay, Byz. Emp. i. 466.

CHAP. VII. seems to have been recruited wholly from Scandinavia, but which was afterwards to be reinforced by so large a body of exiles from our own land. Harold apparently received the command of this force, and at their head he is said to have performed a series of amazing exploits.2 It would almost seem as if the arrival of these Northern auxiliaries had inspired the Empire with a new life. Certain it is that, just about this time, we find the Byzantine Their services under armies, after an interval of torpor, once more in vigorous Harold in Sicily. action, and that in the very region in which the Nor-1038-1040. wegian Saga places the most memorable exploits of Harold. He waged war, we are told, against the Saracens both in Sicily and in Africa; he fought eight pitched battles, and took castle after castle from the misbelievers. That is, there can be little doubt, Harold and his followers served in the Sicilian expedition of Maniakes, who was at this time waging a vigorous war against the Saracens of Sicily, and who recovered many of their towns to the Empire.3 It does not appear that Maniakes actually ventured on an African campaign, but, as the Saracens of Africa undoubtedly aided their Sicilian brethren, a landing of Imperial troops on their coast is quite possible. At all events, warfare with African Saracens anywhere might easily, in the half-legendary language of the Sagas, grow into a tale of an actual invasion of Africa. Harold is His Crunext represented as entering on another series of adven-sade or Pilgrimage.

tures for which it is more difficult to find a place in authentic history. He set out, we are told, on a premature Crusade; he marched with his followers to Jerusalem, clearing the way of robbers, and winning back countless towns and castles to the allegiance of Christ and Cæsar. Here we have of course the mere reflexion CHAP. VII. of the age of the writer, who could not conceive so famous a warrior as entering the Holy City in any character but that of a conqueror. But that Harold, as a peaceful pilgrim, the brother of a canonized Saint, visited Jerusalem, prayed and gave gifts at the Holy Sepulchre, and bathed in the hallowed stream of Jordan, is quite in the spirit of the age and of the man. He shared in the penitential devotion of Robert the father of Norman William and of Swegen the brother of English Harold; and, more fortunate than either, he returned in safety and glory to his own land. He came back to Constantinople to find himself maligned at the Imperial Court, and to be refused the hand of a niece of the Empress.2 Scandal went so far as to say that the cause of this refusal was that Zôê, a woman whose passions survived to an unusually late period of life, herself cast an eye of love on the valiant Northman. Harold now made his escape from Constan-Harold tinople, after—so his Northern admirers ventured to say— escapes from Conputting out the eyes of the Emperor Constantine Mono-stantimachos. This of course is pure fiction. The historical truth of Harold's warlike exploits is in no way impugned by the silence of the Byzantine writers; but so striking an event as the blinding of an Emperor could hardly fail to have found a native chronicler. But we may believe, if we please, that Harold carried off the princess by force, that the Scandinavian galleys burst the chain which guarded

&lt;sup>1</sup> See vol. i. p. 577, and above, p. 44.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Adam Brem. iii. 16. "Erat vir potens et clarus victoriis, qui prius in Greecia et in Scythise regionibus multa contra barbaros proelia confecit." For some legends, see Saxo, 205. <sup>3</sup> See Finlay, i. 487.

<sup>1</sup> It is worth noticing that the reigning Emperor Constantine Monomachos had a hand in restoring the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. It would be singular indeed if Harold Hardrada were in any way the instrument of his bounty. See Finlay, i. 503.

&lt;sup>2</sup> So says the Saga, but it is hard to say who is meant by this niece of Zoe. It is possible that, if there be any truth in the story, some niece or other kinswoman of Constantine is intended. William of Malmesbury (iii. 260) gives another turn to the story. He was "pro stupro illustris fæminæ leoni objectus." Of course he kills the beast. In Saxo (205) the crime becomes murder, and the lion is exchanged for a dragon.

OBAP. VII. the Bosporos, that Harold then left his fair prize on shore, to Russia, bidding her tell her Imperial kinswoman how little her power availed against either the might or the craft of the He returns Northman. Harold now returned to Russia. He had carried off the Byzantine princess only as a bravado; his heart was fixed on Elizabeth, the daughter of his former host Jaroslaf of Novgorod., He now hastened to her father's court, obtained her in marriage, and passed over with her into Sweden. He there found Swend, defeated and in banishment. With him he concerted measures for a joint expedition against Magnus, now in possession of Swend and Denmark. There can be little doubt that it was this joint expedition of Swend and Harold which saved England from a Norwegian invasion. King Eadward watched at Sandwich with his great fleet during the whole summer. expecting the approach of the enemy. But Magnus came not. Harold and Swend together, by their invasion of Denmark, gave him full occupation throughout the year.2

Harold attack Magnus, and save England from invasion. 1045.

and finds

Swend in Sweden.

Eadward marries Eadgyth. January 23, 1045.

It was apparently early in this year of expected invasion that Eadward at last married Eadgyth the daughter of Godwine.3 It is not easy to see why the marriage had been &lt;sup>1</sup> Snorro, Harold, c. 18 (Laing, iii. 17).

&lt;sup>9</sup> Chron, Wig. 1046, "On bam geare gegaderade Eadward cyng mycele scypferde on Sandwic, burh Magnus breatunge on Norwegon; ac his gewinn and Swegenes on Denmarcon geletton beet he her ne com." So Fl. Wig. 1045. Rog. Wend. i. 483.

&lt;sup>3</sup> Chron. Ab. 1044. Petrib. 1043. Cant. 1045. But 1043 in Peterborough really means 1045, and the 1044 of Abingdon takes in the whole Christmas season running into the next year. The Hyde writer (288), amusingly enough, places the marriage after Godwine's return in 1052. Eadward "adveniens multa probitate multaque animi industria cœpit florere, et Normannos quos adduxerat principes per Angliam constituere; contra hunc quoque Comes Godwinus, pacis inimicus, tentans rebellare, ira commotus, Anglia discessit, moxque repatrians usque in ipsam metropolim Londoniam classem suam advexit. Denique se non posse prævalere animadvertens. pacem cum Edwardo statuit componere, et ut nullius rebellionis suspicio remaneret, filiam suam Editham nomine ei matrimonio copulavit, filiumque suum Haroldum ejus dapiferum constituit."

about the full completion of a promise was probably not very eager to full the full completion of a promise to the full completion of a promise to the full completion of a promise to full the full towever was not as well as the full the full towever was not as well as the full the full towever was not as well as the put, if the Norman influence was advanc- CHAP. VII. more promise was not as yet seriously shaken.

This year, as we have seen, that Earldoms the bly in this year, as we have seen, that Earldoms the bly in this pointment of the coclesiastical appointment to the first the bly in the coclesiastical appointment to the first the bly in the coclesiastical appointment to the first the bly in the coclesiastical appointment to the first the bly in the coclesiastical appointment to the first the bly in the coclesiastical appointment to the first the bly in the coclesiastical appointment to the first the coclesiastical appointment to the first the coclesiastical appointment to the coclesiastical appointmen probably not very eager to fulfil.

Nowever was not as yet seriously shaken.

bly in this year, as we have some the lot the lo his wife's nephew Beorn received their Harold and ecclesiastical appointments of the to the predominance of the patriotic principles of the pat ear died Brihtwold, Bishop of Wilton Death of Prelate who had in past times been Brittwold. party. Benefit d who had had the good luck of living to honoured when and fulfilled.2 The appointment of his suc-Hermann the Crown, and be carefully noticed. He was Hermann and I haplain of the his prophety carefully noticed. The appointment of his suc-Hermann of of Lothanie his prophety carefully noticed. He was Hermann of ringia successor should be chaplain of the King's, the first of the ceeds honoured with the Crown, and noticed. He was Hermann of flot chaplain of the King's, the first of the ceeds.

Lothering's, a or other Imperialist Prelator of the lother Index. Lotherings, or other Imperialist Prelates of whom spoken. The promotion of O The promotion of Germans in Promotion of Germans in Promotion I have already not wholly new. It seems to have England was not wholly new. It seems to have begun man Pre-England was probably a fruit of his friendship lates. with the Emperor Conrad. In his time the Saxon Duduc Duduc with the see of Wells, and another German, Wells. bad obtain by name, had held the great abbey of 1033-1060. Wythman Wythman Ramsey.5 Had the appointment of Hermann stood alone, Abbot of 1 See above, p. 36.

This legend occurs in the Vita Eadwardi, p. 394. It is of course not omitted by the professed hagiographers. See Appendix B.

s See above, p. 41.

See Gisa's narrative in Hunter's Ecclesiastical Documents, pp. 15, 16. Compare the promotion of Savaric to the same see by the less kindly influence of a later Emperor. Canon. Well. ap. Angl. Sacr. i. 563.

s Hist. Rams. c. 75. (p. 434). "Quum esset bonse vitæ et prudentiæ laudabilis, genuins tum animi feritate, utpote Teutonicus natione, damnum aliqued sum attulit laudi." His appointment is more remarkable, as he succeeded Wulfsige who died at Assandun (vol. i. p. 432), so that he must have been promoted very early in Cnut's reign, before his connexion with Conrad began. Wythmann got into all kinds of trouble with his monks. and at last, after a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, died a solitary. His story in the Ramsey History is worth reading.

The Gerprobably favoured by

Godwine.

Policy of Lotharingian appointments.

L 42.

CHAP. VII. we might have simply looked on it as the result of Eadward's connexion with King Henry. Or we might even have looked on it in a worse light, as a sign that Eadward preferred foreigners of any sort to his own countrymen. But several considerations may lead us to look on the matter in another way. These German pointments appointments are clearly part of a system; the system is continued after the death of Henry the Third, when the close connexion between Germany and England ceases; Harold himself, in the height of his power, appears as a special promoter of German churchmen. therefore hardly fail to see in these appointments, as I have already hinted, an attempt of Godwine and the patriotic party to counterbalance the merely French tendencies of Eadward himself. We must observe that most of these Prelates were natives of Lotharingia, a term which, in the geography of that age, includes and indeed most commonly means—the Southern Netherlands. That is to say, they came from the border-land of Germany and France, where the languages of both kingdoms were already familiar to every educated man. 1 We can well understand that, in those cases in which the patriots found it impossible to procure the King's consent to the appointment of an Englishman, they might well be content to accept the appointment of a German of Lotharingia as a compromise. One whose blood, speech, and manners had not wholly lost the traces of ancient brotherhood would be more acceptable to Godwine and to England than a mere Frenchman. And one to whom the beloved speech of Gaul was as familiar as his mothertongue would be more acceptable to the denationalized Eadward than one of his own subjects. This policy was probably as sound as any that could be hit upon in such ched state of things. But its results were not case vm. atisfactory. I know of no reason to believe that d: but in gian Prelates actually proved traitors d; but the certainly did not, as a class, offer the resistance to French influences as the men who n in the land. And, if they were not Nore at least Romanizers. They brought constant reference to the Papal See, Scruples on points of small canonical hich Englishmen had hitherto been Something was gained, if Godwine, on twoold, could procure the appointment of nstead of a French, successor. A slight hus gained to the influence of the Nor-But, at the next great ecclesiasmdon.

<sup>1</sup> See vol. i. p. 178.

patriotic party were more successful. In Death of mext year England lost one of her Lyfing. 0 the great Earl lost one who had been March 23 in so many crises of his life, in so the welfare of his country. Lyfing, His career of Worcester, died in March in the moter.

originally a monk of Winchester, he was bbacy of Tavistock. While still holdhad been the companion of Cnut in his grimege, and had been the bearer of the great Igrum letter to his English subjects. The cone produce which he had displayed in that and in e Prusions, had procured his appointment to the

Ab. 1045. "Eadward cyng geaf Heramanne his precate bet Thron. Wig. 1046. "Man sette Hereman on his settle," an rice uniquing the consent of the Witan. Florence says, "Regis Herimannus, de Lotharingia oriundus."

Wig. 1031 Will. Malms. Gest. Pont. 145 b.

, H.

vir Prudentissimus Livingus," says Florence (1031); "Omnibus que of fuerant, saprenter et mirifice ante adventum Regis consummays William

F

OHAP. VII. Bishoprick of Crediton or Devonshire. With that see the Bishoprick of Cornwall had been finally united during his episcopate. With that double see he had held, according to a vicious use not uncommon at the time, the 1038. Bishoprick of Worcester in plurality.<sup>2</sup> In that office, he had steadily adhered to the cause of the great Earl through all the storms of the days of Harold and Harthacnut, and he had had a share second only to that of Godwine himself in the work of placing Eadward upon the throne.3 Either his plurality of benefices had given, as it reasonably might, offence to strict assertors of ecclesiastical rule,4 or, what is at least as likely, the patriotic career of Lyfing had made him, like Godwine himself, a mark for Norman slander, whether alive or dead. His death, we are told, was accompanied by strange portents, which were however quite as capable of a favourable as of an unfavourable interpretation.5 But his memory was loved and cherished in the places where he was best known. Long after the Norman Conquest, the name of the Prelate whose body rested in their minster still lived in the hearts and on the mouths of the monks of Tavistock.6 And the simple entry of a Chronicler who had doubtless heard him with his own ears bears witness to that power of speech in the exercise of which he had so often stood side by side with his illustrious friend. The other Chronicles merely record

&lt;sup>1</sup> Will. Malms. Gest. Pont. 145 b. Cf. Gest. Regg. iii. 300.

&lt;sup>2</sup> See vol. i. p. 563. See above, p. 7.

&lt;sup>4</sup> Will. Malms. u. s. "Ambitiosus et protervus ecclesiasticarum legum tyrannus, ut fertur, invictus, qui nihil pensi haberet, quominus omni voluntati sus assisteret."

&lt;sup>5</sup> Will. Malms. u. s. "A majoribus accepimus, quum ille spiritum efflaret, tum horrisonum crepitum per totam Angliam auditum, ut ruina et finis totius putaretur orbis." The loss of men like Lyfing is indeed the ruin of nations.

&lt;sup>6</sup> Will. Malms. (u. s.), who speaks of his gifts to the monastery, and of the services still said for him, "ut hodieque xv. graduum psalmos continuata per successores consuctudine pro ejus decantent quiete."

his death; the Worcester writer adds the speaking title, CHAP. VII. "Lyfing the eloquent."

The great mass of preferment held by Lyfing did not Leofric, pass undivided to a single successor. The Bishopricks of Grediton Devonshire and Cornwall remained united, as they have or Exeter. done ever since. They were conferred on the King's Chancellor, Leofric, who is described as a Briton, that is, doubtless, a native of the Cornish portion of his diocese.2 His name however shows that he was of English, or at least of Anglicized, descent. But in feeling he was neither AS Hermann was a Lotharingian British nor English; by birth, Leofric was equally a Lotharingian by education.3 Four years after his appointment, he followed He rethe example of Ealdhun of Durham in removing his see to episcopal see to a new site. He did not however, like Exeter. 1050. Kallhun, create at once a church and a city; he rather forestalled the practice of Prelates later in the century by transferring his throne to the greatest town of his The humbler Crediton had to yield its episcopal rank to the great city of the West, the city which Æthelstan had fortified as a cherished bulwark of his realm,6 the stan usu valiant burghers had beaten back the Dane city whose might, and which had fallen into his hands only in his full might, in the Norman traitor was set to guard its walls.7 She

1 "Lyfing se wordsnotera biscop." He adds, "he hæfde iii. biscoprice an on Defenascire, and on Cornwalon, and on Wigracestre." So Florence an on Detenment, Dominania, et Cornubia præsul." In the Petercalls him "Hwiociorum, Discop on Defenascine" calls him "Live can be so biscop on Defenascire," which the Canterbury borough Chronicle he is "biscop of his own are the language of his own borough Chronicler, using the language of his own age, turns into "biscop of Chronicler," s Flor. Wig. 1046. "Regis cancellario Leofrico Brytonico mox Cridiatunensis et Cornubiensis datus est præsulatus."

nensis ... Malms. Gest. Pont. 145 b. "Lefricus apud Lotharingos altus et doctus." • See vol. i. p. 320. <sup>5</sup> See vol. i. p. 353.

See Vol. 1. p. 353.
Will. Malms. u. s. He again speaks of Æthelstan's walls. See

vol. i. pp. 337-340. 7 See vol. i. pp. 345, 346.

CHAP. VII. whose fatal presence had caused that great misfortune still 1003-1050 lived. The first years of Emma in England beheld the capture and desolation of her noble morning-gift. Her last years saw the restored city become the spiritual capital of the great western peninsula. And, within the life-time of many who saw that day, Exeter was again to stand 1067. a siege at the hands of a foreign King, and again to show forth the contrast between citizens as valiant as those who drove Swend from before their walls and captains as incompetent or as treacherous as Hugh the Churl. church of Saint Peter in Exeter now became the cathedral church of the western diocese, and there Leofric was solemnly enthroned in his episcopal chair by the saintly King and his virgin wife. Hitherto the church had been He subjects occupied by nuns. They were now removed, and the his Canons to the rule chapter of the Bishop was formed of secular Canons. of Chrode-Leofric however required them to conform to the stricter gang. discipline which he had learned in Lotharingia. The rule of Chrodegang of Metz, the model rule of secular Canons, though it did not impose monastic vows, yet imposed on those who conformed to it much of the strictness of monastic discipline.2 The clerks who submitted to it were severed, hardly less than actual monks, from all the ordinary habits of domestic life. They were condemned to the common table and the common dormitory; every detail of their life was regulated by a series of minute ordinances; they were cut off from lay, and especially from female, society, and bound to a strict obedience to their Bishop or other stical superior. Still they were not monks; they war. vn. atrictly forbidden to wear the monastic garb, astoral duties of baptism, preaching, and hearing were strictly enforced upon them. In accordance precepts of Chrodegang, the Canons of Exeter ired to eat in a common hall and to sleep on dormitory. Their temporal concerns were y an officer, who provided them with daily with a yearly change of raiment. This sort never found favour in England. All who etual monks clave earnestly to the usage of ses, in which they were often solaced by the wives and children. Every earlier and later introduce the Lotharingian rule in England d.2 Leofric's discipline seems to have lasted onger than commonly happened in the like iges of the severer rule still remained at Exeter t century, but even then the purity of ancient ad greatly fallen off.3

&lt;sup>1</sup> Such a personal installation seems to be the meaning of the description in the foundation charter of the new see of Exeter, in Cod. Dipl. iv. 118. The Charter is doubtful, but it may probably be trusted for a fact of this kind. Cf. Will. Malms. iii. 300.

&lt;sup>2</sup> See the whole subject fully illustrated by Professor Stubbs in the Preface to the De Inventione, p. ix. et seqq.

The rule of Chrodegang will be found at length in D'Achery's Spicilegium, i. 565 et seqq.

the sees vacated by the death of Lyfing thus Baldred, lot of a zealous ecclesiastical reformer, but a man Tavistock, no important part in the general history of the Bishop of Worcester, ne fate of Lyfing's other Bishoprick was widely 1046; It was bestowed on a Prelate who, without ever bishop of any very great qualities, played a prominent, York the whole not a dishonourable, part for many years The early career of the famous Ealdred, who neceeded Lyfing in the see of Worcester, had led him

ŗ

p. 53. ... De la martione p.

Stabbs, De Inventione, p. z.

vill. Malma. Gest. Pont. 145 b. "Canonicos statuit qui, contra morem The state of the s Transmissa est hujuscemodi regula ad posteros, quamvis pro temporum nonnullă jam ex parte deciderit, habentque elerici esconoab episcopo constitutum, qui eis diatim necessaria viotui, annuatim tui commods suggerat "

997.

CHAP. VII. through nearly the same stages as that of his predecessor. Like him, he had been a monk at Winchester; like him, he had been thence called to the government of one of the great monasteries of the West. The Abbey of Tavistock, destroyed by Danish invaders in the reign of Æthelred,1 had risen from its ashes, and it now proved a nursery of Prelates like Lyfing and Ealdred.2 The new Bishop was of Ealdred. a man of ability and energy. He exhibits, like Harold, the better form of the increasing connexion between England and the continent. As an ambassador at the Imperial court, as a pilgrim at Rome and Jerusalem, he probably saw more of the world than any contemporary Englishman. He was renowned as a peacemaker, one who could reconcile the bitterest enemies.3 But he was also somewhat of a time-server, and, in common with so many other Prelates of his time, he did not escape the charge of simony. This charge is one which it is easy to bring and often hard to answer, but the frequency with which it is brought shows that the crime itself was a familiar one. Like many other churchmen of his time, Ealdred did not scruple to bear arms both in domestic and in foreign warfare, but his campaigns were, to say the least, not specially glorious. His most enduring title to remembrance is that it fell to his lot to place, within a single year, the Crown of England on the brow, first of Harold and then of William, and to die of sorrow at the sight of his church and city brought to ruin by the mutual contentions of Normans, Englishmen, and Danes.

&lt;sup>1</sup> See vol. i. p. 353.

&lt;sup>2</sup> The name of Ealdred will be constantly recurring in our history for the next twenty-three years. His general life and character are described by William of Malmesbury, De Gest Pont. 154, and Thomas Stubbs, Gest. Pont. Eb. X Scriptt. 1700 et seqq.

<sup>3</sup> T. Stubbs, u. s. "Iste apud Regem Edwardum tantæ erat auctoritatis, ut cum eo mortales inimicos reconciliaret et de inimicissimis amicissimos faceret."

We shall find the new Bishop of Worcester appearing a CHAP. VII. few years later in arms against the Welsh, to whose incur-Gruffydd sions the southern part of his diocese lay open. yet it was only his powers of persuasion and peacemaking with the which he was called upon to exercise in that quarter. was probably by Ealdred's intervention that a reconciliation was now brought about between the famous King of North Wales, Gruffydd ap Llywelyn, and his English overlord.

But as welyn re-

Gruffydd's immediate neighbour to the east was Swegen, Expedition whose anomalous Earldom took in the border shires of and Gruf-Gloucester and Hereford. Gruffydd accordingly gave fydd hostages, and accompanied Swegen in an expedition against Gruffydd the other Gruffydd, the son of Rhydderch, the King of ap Rhyd-South Wales.<sup>2</sup> On his triumphant return Swegen was <sup>1046</sup>. guilty of an act which embittered the remainder of his days, a breach of the laws of morality which the ecclesiastical feelings of the time clothed with tenfold guilt. He sent for Eadgifu, Abbess of Leominster, kept her

<sup>1</sup> The reconciliation of Gruffydd appears from his acting immediately afterwards in concert with Earl Swegen. That Ealdred brought about this present reconciliation is not distinctly stated, but it quite falls in with his general character, and with the fact that he played a prominent part in a later reconciliation between Eadward and Gruffydd. The success of Ealdred in reconciling both Swegen and Gruffydd to the King is specially commented on by Thomas Stubbs, the biographer of the Archbishops of York (X Scriptt. 1701). Now Stubbs wrote more than three hundred years after the time; still he is not a romancer like Bromton or Knighton, but a really honest and careful writer, and he doubtless had access to materials which are now lost or unprinted. He may indeed refer to the later reconciliation in 1056, but the combination of the names of Swegen and Gruffydd might lead us to think that he was speaking of some event

<sup>2</sup> Chron. Ab. 1046. "Her on bysum geare for Swegn eorl into Wealan, and Griffin se Norberna cyng ford mid him, and him man gislode." In Ann. Camb. 1046 we read, "Seditio magna orta fuit inter Grifud filium Lewelin et Grifud filium Riderch." Or possibly the expedition may be that recorded under the next year, when Gruffydd ap Llywelyn ravaged all South Wales in revenge for the treacherous slaughter of one hundred and forty of his nobles. In any case the two independent accounts exactly fit in to one another.

Swegen seduces Eadgifu, Abbess of Leominster. He seeks in vain to marry her.

CHAP. VII. awhile with him, and then sent her home. Like the Hamor of patriarchal story, he next sought, with a generosity as characteristic of his wayward temper as any of his worst deeds, to make reparation by marriage.2 But the law of the Church stood in his way. Richard of Normandy, as we have seen, found it easy to raise his mistress to all the honours due to a matron and the wife of a sovereign. The Lady Emma herself, wife and mother of so many Kings, was the offspring of an union which the Church had thus hallowed only after the fact.3 But no such means of reparation were open to the seducer He throws of a consecrated virgin. The marriage was of course forbidden, and Swegen, in his disappointment, threw up his and goes to Earldom, left his country, and betook himself, first to Flanders, the usual place of refuge for English exiles, and thence to the seat of war in the North.4 A formal sentence of outlawry seems to have followed, as the lord-up his Earldom. Denmark.

- <sup>1</sup> Chron. Ab. 1046. "ba he hamwerdes was, ba het he feccan him to ba abbedessan on Leomynstre, and hæfde hi þa while þe him geliste, and let hi syooan faran ham."
- * Florence does not mention the affair of Swegen and Eadgifu in its chronological order, but refers to it when he describes the return of Swegen in 1049. "Suanus . . . qui, relicta prius Anglia, eo quod Edgivam Leonensis monasterii abbatissam, quam corruperat, in matrimonium, habere non licuerit, Danemarciam adierat." So the Worcester Chronicle, which does not mention Eadgifu, says, under 1050, "Swegen Eorl, be for ær of bisan lande to Denmarcon, and ber forworhte hine wio Denum." Abingdon, the only Chronicle which mentions Eadgifu, does not speak directly of Swegen's departure, but implies it under 1049. Mr. St. John (ii. 148 et seqq.) works up the story into an elaborate romance, with a glowing description of the beauty, accomplishments, and wickedness of Eadgifu and of nuns in general. M. de Bonnechose (ii. 85) tells us, "Sweyn cinquième fils de Godwin, fit violence (?) à Elgive, abbesse de Leominster; banni par le roi pour ce crime," &c. <sup>3</sup> See vol. i. p. 270.
- <sup>4</sup> Chronn. Petrib. 1045. Cant. 1046. "On 5am ilcan geare ferde Swegen eorl ut to Baldewines lande to Brycge, and wunode ber ealne winter, and wende þa to sumere út." "Út" means, of course, to Denmark. William of Malmesbury says (ii. 200), "Swanus, perversi ingenii et infidi in Regem, multotiens à patre et fratre Haroldo descivit, et pirata factus, prædis marinis virtutes majorum polluit." Whom did William look on as the forefathers of Swegen?

ships of Swegen were confiscated, and divided between his CHAP. VII. brother Harold and his cousin Beorn. On Eadgifu and her monastery the hand of ecclesiastical discipline seems to have fallen heavily. The numery of Leominster, one Fate of Leomin of the objects of the bounty of Earl Leofric, now vanishes ster monasfrom history. The natural inference is that the miscon-tery. duct of Eadgifu led, not only to her own disgrace, but to the dissolution of the sisterhood over which she had so unworthily presided.3 We hear of no later marriage on the part of Swegen, but in after years we shall meet with a son of his, probably a child of the frail Abbess of Leominster. Born under other circumstances, he might Hakon son have been head of the house of Godwine. As it was, the son of Swegen and Eadgifu was the child of shame and sacrilege, and the career to which he was doomed was short and gloomy.

The banishment of the Staller Osgod Clapa, at the Banishbridal of whose daughter King Harthacout had come to Osgod his untimely end, took place this year. Like the banish-Clapa. ment of Gunhild, this measure was evidently connected Chron. Petrib. 1046. Swegen on his return asks for their restoration. Will Mains. "So Flor. Wig. 1057. On Leominster see Leonense, et nonnulla alia."

Monastery had no existence in the time of Henry the First, s Leoninster Monasticon, iv. 51. Leominster Mirutum monasterium" which that King granted to his when it was a Reading (Will. Malms. Gest. Pont Communication of Henry the First, when it was a Reading (Will. Malms. Gest. Pont. Scriptt. p. Bed. 144).

new Abbey of Romesday (180) that the house had no control of the cont new Abbey of Domesday (180) that the house had no corporate being at I infer also from Domesday (Leominster was then hald be the Survey. I infer also from Leominster was then held by the King; in King the time of the Survey. Leominster was then held by the King; in King the time of the Survey and held by Queen Eadgyth. The monastery is Fadward's time it had been held by Queen Eadgyth. The monastery is Fedward's time and the state of only casually memorialium." These facts together seem to me to show for the "victus monialium." a certain rent hains at for the "value was dissolved, a certain rent being set aside for the surthat the society was dissolved, a certain rent being set aside for the surthat the society was dissolved, a certain rent being set aside for the surthat the society was dissolved, a certain rent being set aside for the surthat the society was dissolved, a certain rent being set aside for the surthat the society was dissolved, a certain rent being set aside for the surthat the society was dissolved. that the society like the pensions granted at the general Dissolution under viving members, like the Appendix E. Henry the Eighth. See Appendix E.

Chron. Petrib. 1044. "On bis ilcan geare weard aflemed ut Osgot Clapa."

Chron. Petrib. 1045. "And Osgod Clapa ward ut of the control of the Chron. Petris. "And Osgod Clapa wero ut adriven." The difference Chron. in the different Chronicles is second." Chron. Can in the different Chronicles is remarkable. On "ut adriven," of expression in the difference 1046 save "Occaling" of expression 561. Florence, 1046, says, "Osgodus Clapa expellitur Anglia."

CHAP. VII with the movements in the North of Europe. Osgod was doubtless one of those who had been marked men ever since the election of Eadward, and who, in the present state of Scandinavian affairs, were felt to be dangerous. The immediate peril came from Magnus; but there could be little doubt that, of the three princes who were disputing the superiority of Scandinavia, the successful one, whether Magnus, Harold, or Swend, would assert some sort of claim to the possession of England. Magnus had 1066. done so already. Harold lived to invade England and to perish in the attempt. It was only the singular prudence of Swend which kept him back from any such enterprise till he was able to interfere in English affairs in the guise of a deliverer. Partisans of any one of the contending 1069. princes were clearly dangerous in England. Osgod was driven out, seemingly by a decree of the Christmas Gemót,2 and he presently, after the usual sojourn in Flanders, betook himself to the seat of war in Denmark.3

Affairs of Scandinavia. Osgod and Swegen most probably took service with Swend Estrithson. The presence of Swegen would doubtless be welcome indeed to that prince's partisans. The nephew of Ulf, the cousin of their own leader, the son of the great English Earl, renowned in the North as the conqueror of the Wends,4 was a recruit richly to be prized. And the cause of Swend Estrithson just then greatly needed recruits. His hopes, lately so flourishing, had been again dashed to the ground. Magnus had contrived to gain over his uncle Harold to his side, by the costly bribe of a share in the Kingdom of Norway. The gift indeed

Harold Hardrada joins Magnus and receives a

&lt;sup>1</sup> See above, p. 7.

&lt;sup>2</sup> The Abingdon Chronicle says "on bis ylcan geare man geútlagode Osgod Clapan foran to middanwintre."

&lt;sup>3</sup> This is implied in the narrative of Florence, 1049. "Osgodus autem ... Danemarciam rediit."

<sup>4</sup> See vol. i. p. 466.

was not quite gratuitous. Besides cooperating in the war CHAP. VII. with Swend, Harold was to share with Magnus the trea- share of the Kingsures which he had gathered in his Southern warfare. dom of The two Kings now joined their forces, and drove Swend 1047. out of Jütland and the Danish Isles. He retained only Scania, that part of the old Danish realm which lies on the Swedish side of the Sound, and which is now politically part of Sweden.2 In the next year Swend was again aiming at the recovery of his Kingdom. It was Swend probably the presence of English exiles in his camp, English which suggested to him the ides of obtaining regular help. help from England as an ally of the English King. He sent and asked for the help of an English fleet. In those Hisrequest days questions of peace and war were not decided either by the by the Sovereign only, or by the Sovereign and a few secret counsellors; they were debated openly by the Witan of the whole land. The demand of Swend was discussed in full Gemót. Swend had certainly acted, whether of set purpose or not, as a friend of England; the diversion caused by him had saved England from a Norwegian invasion. But, setting aside any feelings of gratitude on this account, any feelings of attachment to the kinsman of Cnut and of Godwine, it does not appear that England had any direct interest in embracing the cause of Swend. A party which sought only the immediate interest of England might argue that the sound policy was to stand aloof, and to leave the contending Kings of the North to wear out each other's power and their own. Such however was not the view taken by Godwine. In the Gemót Godwine in which the question was debated, the Earl of the West- the claim Saxons supported the petition of his nephew, and proposed of Swend; that fifty ships should be sent to his help. It is clear that such a course might be supported by plausible arguments.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Snorro, Harold, 21 (Laing, iii. 19).

&lt;sup>2</sup> Ibid. 26, 28 (Laing, iii. 25, 27).

but his demand is opposed by Leofric, and rejected. 1047.

Magnus defeats Swend and occupies Denmark.

CHAP. VII. It is clear that equally plausible arguments might be brought forward on the other side. And if, as is possible, this question was discussed in the same Gemot in which sentence of outlawry was pronounced against Swegen the son of Godwine, it is clear that the father of the culprit would stand at a great disadvantage in supporting the request of the prince with whom that culprit had taken service. It marks the still abiding influence of Godwine that he was able to preserve the confiscated lordships of Swegen for Harold and Beorn. But in his recommendation of giving armed support to Swend Estrithson all his eloquence utterly failed. The cause of non-intervention was pleaded by Earl Leofric, and his arguments prevailed. All the people, we are told—the popular character of the Assembly still impresses itself on the language of history -agreed with Leofric and determined the proposal of Godwine to be unwise. The naval force of Magnus, it was said, was too great to be withstood. Swend Estrithson had therefore to carry on the struggle with his own unaided forces. Against the combined powers of Magnus and Harold those forces were utterly unavailing. Swend was defeated in a great sea-fight; Magnus took possession of all Denmark, and laid a heavy contribution upon the realm.2 Swend again took refuge in Sweden, and now began to meditate a complete surrender of his claims upon Denmark. Just at this moment, we are told, a messenger appeared, bringing the news of the sudden death of

<sup>1</sup> The application of Swend and the refusal by the Witan come from the Worcester Chronicle, 1048. "And Swegen eac sende hider, bead him fylstes ongeon Magnus Norwega cyng; þæt man sceolde sendan L. scypa. him to fultume; ac hit buhte unræd eallum folce; and hit weard ba gelet, burh best be Magnus hæfde mycel scypecræft." The personal share of Godwine and Leofric in the debate comes from Florence, 1047. "Tunc comes Godwinus consilium Regi dedit ut saltem L. naves militibus instructas ei mitteret; sed quia Leofrico comiti et omni populo id non videbatur consilium, nullam ei mittere voluit."

&lt;sup>2</sup> Flor, Wig. 1047.

The victorious King had perished by an accident oner. vn. e that which had caused the death of Lewis of Sudden His horse, suddenly startled by a hare, dashed Magnus. against the trunk of a tree.8 On his death-bed 1047. thed the crown of Norway to his uncle Harold of Denmark to his adversary Swend. Such a Harold quite in harmony with the spirit of the corre- Norway, between Magnus and Eadward. Swend returned Swend in Denmark. possession of his Kingdom, and though he was Their long engaged in constant warfare with Harold, he warfare. olly lost his hold upon the country. The first Their emh the new Kings was to send embassies to Eng- England. trold offered peace and friendship; Swend again armed help against Harold.5 The debate of the e was again reopened. Godwine again supported Help again st of his nephew, and again proposed that fifty swend, ald be sent to his help. Leofric again opposed and peace n, and the people again with one voice supported with Ha-Help was refused to Swend and peace was con- 1048. th Harold. Swend, despairing of English aid, nave sought for protection in another quarter, and knowledged himself a vassal of the Empire. wo years seem to have been marked by several Physical phænomena. In the former we hear of the phæno-1046 -7.

Harold, 30 (Laing, iii. 29).

4. Cf. vol. i. p. 257.

ythical version of the death of Magnus, mixed up with a story f Eadward's, see Æthel. Riev. X Scriptt. 378.

76, p. 73.

ig. 1048. I insert this story with a certain amount of fear ng, as it reads so like a mere repetition of what happened fore. Still the authority of Florence is high, and it is not t Swend, in his new circumstances, might make a second

1048. "Haroldus... nuntios ad Regem Eadwardum misit izitiamque illi obtulit, et recepit." ıw, р. 98,

CMAP, vii. unusual severity of the winter, accompanied by an extraordinary fall of snow.1 In the latter several of the May 1, 1048. midland shires were visited by an earthquake. We read also of epidemics both among men and beasts, and of the appearance called wild fire.2. A few ecclesiastical appointments are also recorded; but one only calls for notice. Ælfwine, Bishop of Winchester, died, and his Bishoprick fell neither to Frenchmen nor to Lotharingian. Stigand rose another step in the ladder of promotion by his translation from the humbler see of Elmham to the Bishoprick of the Imperial city.4

Death of Ælfwine of Winchester, Aug. 29, 1047. Stig and succeeds.

Ravages of Lothen 1048.

As far as we can make out through the confused and Yrling, chronology of these years, it was in the year of the peace with Norway that England underwent, what we have not now heard of for many years, an incursion of Scandinavian pirates.5 Two chiefs, named Lothen and Yrling, came with twenty-five ships, and harried various parts of the coast. This event must have been in some way connected with the course of the war between Harold and Swend. Probably some enterprising Wikings in the service of one or other of those princes found a moment of idleness just as the two Kings were taking possession of their crowns,

&lt;sup>1</sup> Chron. Ab. 1046. Fl. Wig. 1047. Chron. Wig. 1048. It was after Candlemas, i. e. of 1047.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Chronn. Ab. 1048. Wig. 1049. Fl. Wig. 1048.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Chron. Wig. 1049. "Pæt wilde fyr on Deorbyscire micel yfel dide." Florence (1048) calls it "ignis aërius, vulgo dictus silvaticus."

&lt;sup>4</sup> Chroan. Ab. 1047. Wig. 1048. Petrib. 1045. Cant. 1046. Fl. Wig. 1047. By some extraordinary confusion Florence places here the death of Eadmund, Bishop of Durham, and the succession of Eadred, which happened in 1041. See vol. i. pp. 588-9.

Chron. Ab. 1048. Chron. Petrib. 1046. These clearly refer to the same event. I hardly understand Mr. Thorpe's note to his Translation of the Chronicles, p. 137. "This predatory expedition, assigned here to the year 1046, is of a much earlier date"—one seemingly before the year 1000. This is because a Lothen and an Yrling occur in the story of Olaf Tryggwesson. But the Chronicler could hardly be mistaken on such a point. Lappenberg (499, Thorpe, ii. 239) seems to have no doubt on the matter.

and thought the opportunity a good one for an attack on CHAP. VII. England. Such an attack was doubtless unexpected, especially as such good care had been taken to keep on good terms with both the contending Kings. But possibly the more daring policy of Godwine would really have been the safer.1 Had fifty English ships, whatever their errand, been afloat in the Northern seas, Lothen and Yrling could hardly have come to plunder the shores of England. Anyhow the story shows us the sort of spirit which still reigned in the North. There were still plenty of men ready to seek their fortunes in any part of the world as soon as a moment of unwelcome quiet appeared at home. Harold and Swend at least did the world some service by finding employment for such men in warfare with one another. The Wikings harried far and wide. From Sandwich they carried off a vast booty in men, gold, and silver.2 In the Isle of Wight they must have met with more resistance, as many of the best men of the island are said to have been slain.3 In Thanet too the landfolk withstood them manfully, refused them landing and water, and drove them altogether away.4 Thence they sailed to Essex, where they plundered at their pleasure.5 By this time the King and the Earls had got together some ships. The Earls Eadward were doubtless Godwine and Harold, on whose govern- Earls purments the attack had been made, and the words of our sue the pirates, but

&lt;sup>1</sup> "Godwines Rath wurde bald als der richtige erkannt." Lappenberg, 499.

&lt;sup>2</sup> I make up the details by joining the narratives of the two Chronicles. Both mention Sandwich; but the Peterborough Chronicle alone speaks of the vast booty.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Chron. Ab. 1048. "Man gehergode Sandwic and Wiht, and ofslohan þa betsta men þe þa wæron," they escape to Flanders.

&lt;sup>4</sup> Chron. Petrib. 1046. "And wendon be onbuton Tenet, and woldon her bet ilce don; ac bet landfolc hardlice widstodon, and forwerndon heom ægfer ge upganges ge wæteres, and aflymdon hi þanon mid ealle." The refusal of water is remarkable. Probably in other cases the landfolk had to provide provisions out of sheer fear.

&lt;sup>5</sup> Chron. Petrib. u. s.

CHAP. VII. authorities seem to imply that Eadward was really present in person.1 They sailed after the pirates, but they were too late. The enemy had already made his way to the common refuge of banished Englishmen and of foes of England. The Wikings were now safe in the havens of Flanders—of Baldwines land; there they found a ready market for the spoils of England, and thence they sailed back to their own country.2

Analogy with the relations with Normandy in 991 and 1000.

Alliance with the Emperor Henry.

The German Popes.

Leo the Ninth.

ı

We here seem to be reading over again the history of the events which led to the first hostile relations between England and Normandy.3 The Northmen are again plundering England, and a continental power again gives them so much of help and comfort as is implied in letting them sell their plunder in his havens. This time the offending power was not Normandy but Flanders, and Eadward, unlike his father, had no lack of powerful friends on the continent. The great prince who had, a year before, been raised to the throne of the world was, as we have seen,5 on the most intimate terms with his English brother, and it is plain that close alliance with the Empire formed part of the policy of the patriotic party. The illustrious Cæsar had filled the Papal chair with a Pontiff likeminded with himself. A series of German Popes of Imperial nomination had followed one another in a quick succession of short reigns, but they had had time to show forth in their virtues a marked contrast to the utter degradation of the Italian Pontiffs who had gone immediately before them. The throne of Peter was now 1048-1054 filled, at the Imperial bidding, by Bruno, Bishop of Toul, a native of Elsass and kinsman of the Emperor, who had

<sup>1</sup> Chron. Ab. 1048. "And Eadward cining and be corlas for an æfter bam út mid heore scypun." Eadward had been on board the fleet once before (see p. 74), but that time he saw no service.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Chron, Petrib, 1046.

&lt;sup>3</sup> See vol. i. pp. 313, 330, 633.

<sup>4</sup> Lamb. Herz. 1047.

&lt;sup>5</sup> See above, p. 17.

taken the name of Leo the Ninth. He was now in his CHAP. VII. second year of office, having been appointed in the year of the peace between England and Norway. perhaps only a later legend which told how, on his way to Rome, he fell in with the famous Hildebrand, then in exile, how he listened to his rebukes for the crime of accepting a spiritual office from an earthly lord, how he entered Rome as a pilgrim, and did not venture to ascend the Pontifical throne till he was again more regularly chosen thereto by the voice of the Roman clergy and people.<sup>2</sup> But, in any case, this concession to ecclesiastical rule or prejudice had abated nothing of Leo's loyalty to his Teutonic sovereign, nothing of his zeal for the welfare, both spiritual and temporal, of lands which the Italian Pontiffs so seldom visited. The Pope was now at Aachen, ready with his spiritual weapons to help the Emperor Rebellion against a league of his rebellious vassals. They had of Godfrey waged war against their suzerain; they had burned the win against the Emcity and church of Verdun; they had destroyed the noble peror. palace of the Emperor at Nimwegen. Foremost among the offenders were Theodoric of Holland, Baldwin of Flanders, and Godfrey of Lotharingia. Godfrey was specially guilty. After a former rebellion he had been imprisoned and released, and now he was foremost in the new insurrection, especially in the deed of sacrilege at Verdun.<sup>3</sup> The Pope therefore did not hesitate to issue

&lt;sup>1</sup> See the Life of Leo by the contemporary Archdescon Wibert, in Muratori, iii. 282.

The intervention of Hildebrand, as told by Otto of Freisingen in his Annals, lib. vi. c. 33, seems apocryphal, as Muratori remarks in his note, iii. 292. But the germ of the story is to be found in Wibert; Leo entered Rome barefoot, and though he announced his appointment by the Emperor, he demanded the assent of the clergy and people before he entered on his office.

On this war see Hermannus Contractus, 1044–1050. Lambert, 1044–1050. Sigebert, 1044–1049 (ap. Pertz, vi. 358–9). Ann. Leodienses (ap. Pertz, iv. 19, 20). Otto Fris. Chron. vi. 33. Conrad Ursp. 1045–9 (p. 229.

Leo excommuni-1049.

Continued ravages of Baldwin.

CHAP, VII. his excommunication against him. Godfrey yielded; the ban of the father of Christendom bent his soul; he subcates God- mitted to scourging, he redeemed his hair at a great sum. he contributed largely to the rebuilding of the cathedral which he had burned, and himself laboured at the work like a common mason. But Baldwin of Flanders, possibly trusting to his ambiguous position as a vassal both of the Empire and of the French Crown, was more obstinate, and still continued his ravages. The Emperor accordingly called on his vassals and allies for help against a prince whose power might well seem dangerous even to Kings Swend and and Cassars. King Swend of Denmark—so low had Denmark fallen since the days of Cnut-obeyed the summons as a vassal. King Eadward of England contributed his > ed. 1537). Annalista Saxo (ap. Pertz, vol. vi. p. 689). Struvius, i. 352. The destruction of the palace is mentioned in our own Abingdon and Worcester Chronicles, 1049, 1050; "Se casere gaderode unarimedlice fyrde ongean Baldewine of Brycge burh best best he bræc bæne pallant æt Neomagan, and eac fela offra unbanca be he him dyde." So Florence, 1049; "Quod apud Neomagum suum palatium combussisset atque fregisset pulcherrimum." The year of its destruction was 1046, according to Lambert ("Inter alias quas rei publice intulit clades, Neumago domum regiam miri et incomparabilis operis incendit"), 1047 according to Sigebert, ("Godefridus palatium Neomagi incendit et irreparabiliter destruit"). Both writers speak of the destruction of the church of Verdun; Lambert adds the singular penance of Godfrey, which must have followed his submission in 1049. "Post modicum facti in tantum pœnituit, ut publicè se verberari faceret, et capillos suos ne tonderentur [one is reminded of the Merwings] multa pecunia redimeret, sumptus ad reædificandam ecclesiam daret, et in opere cæmentario per seipsum plerumque vilis mancipii ministerio functus deserviret." Abbot Hugh in the Verdun Chronicle (Labbe, i. 190) makes the destruction at Verdun still more extensive; "Templum Sancte Marie à Duce Godefrido et Balduino succensum est, vasa sacra ablata, civitasque destructa. viii. Kal. Nov." So in another Verdun Chronicle (ib. 401); "1048 Civitas Virdunensis a Duce Godefrido et Balduino Comite depresdatur et una cum Monasterio Sanctse Marise incenditur."

Eadward join the Emperor against Baldwin.

> <sup>1</sup> Florence (1049) seems pointedly to distinguish the relations in which Swend and Eadward stood to the Emperor. "Suanus . . . ut Imperator illi manddrat, cum sua classe ibi affuit, et ea vice fidelitatem Imperatori juravit. Misit quoque ad Regem Anglorum Eadwardum et rogavit illum ne Baldwinum permitteret effugere, si vellet ad mare fugere."

an ally, and as one who was himself an injured CHAP. VII. The reception of English exiles at Baldwin's court, ce allowed to Scandinavian pirates of selling the England in Baldwin's havens, caused every Engto look on the Count of Flanders as an enemy. which had been refused to Swend was therefore ranted to Henry. The King of the English was ed asked to take any share in continental warfare The share of the enterprise assigned to him was the coast with his ships, in case the rebellious hould attempt to escape by sea. Again, as in of Æthelstan and Eadmund, an English fleet in the Channel, ready, if need be, to take a part nental warfare. But now, as in the days of in and Eadmund,2 nothing happened which called Baldwin ctive service. Endward and his fleet watched at without b, while the Emperor marched against Baldwin lish help. But the Count of Flanders, instead of betaking to the sea, submitted in all things to the will of ity overlord whom he had provoked.3

mmediate object for the assembling of the fleet The suba attained; but the events which immediately Baldwin showed that the fleet was just as likely to be lets loose the Eng-

Wig. 1049. Chronn. Ab. and Wig. ib. "but he ne gehafode but wæters ne ætburste."

l. i, pp. 229, 245.

a. Ab. and Wig. "just se casere herfie of Baldwine call just he The reconciliation was at Aachen. Sigebort, 1049. Hermann, nbert seems to confound this reconciliation with the later synod William of Poitiers holdly turns the tables; the father-in-law 'illiam could not have made submission even to an Emperor; riquidem Romani Imperii miles fuit, re decus et gloria summa in summa necessitudine . . . Est enim et nationibus procul resimum quam frequentibus, quamque gravibus bellis Imperatorum en fatigaverit, pace demum ad conditiones ipsius arbitratu mposita, quum Regum dominos terres ipsorum nonnulla parte violenter exteria, sua quæque vel inexpugnata vel indefessa u tutam." Giles, 90. Duchesne, 183 D.

CHAP. VII. needed for protection at home, as for a share in even just and necessary warfare abroad. The submission of Swegen and Osgod return.

Swegen's reconciliation with Eadward. 1049.

Baldwin to the Emperor seems to have let loose the English exiles who had been flitting backwards and forwards between Flanders and Denmark,1 and who had possibly taken a part on Baldwin's side in the last campaign. Both Osgod Clapa and Swegen the son of Godwine now appeared at sea. Swegen had only eight ships; but Osgod had—we are not told how—gathered a force of thirty-nine. While the King was still at Sandwich, Swegen returned to England. He sailed first to Bosham, a favourite lordship of his father's, and one whose name we shall again meet with in connexion with events of still greater moment to the house of Godwine. He there left his ships, and went to the King at Sandwich, and offered to become his man.2 His natural allegiance as an English subject was perhaps held to be cancelled by his outlawry or by his having become the man of Swend of Denmark or of some other foreign prince. A new personal commendation was seemingly needed for his reconciliation with his natural sovereign. He seems to have asked for his Earldom again; at any rate, he was tired of the life of a sea-rover, and asked that his lands which had been confiscated might be given back to him for his maintenance. He seems to have found favour, either with the King personally or with some of those who were about him, for it was proposed, if not actually resolved, that Swegen should be restored to all his former possessions.3 But the strongest opponents of such a course

&lt;sup>1</sup> See pp. 88, 90.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Chron. Ab. 1049. "He com hider mid hiwunge, cweet beet he wolde his man been."

&lt;sup>8</sup> Chron. Petrib. 1046. "And com Swegn eorl in mid vii. scypum to Bosenham, et grivode wit bone cyng, and behet man him bet he moste wurde [beon] ælc þæra þinga þe he ær ahte."

were found in the kinsmen to whom his confiscated lands CHAP. VII. had been granted, his cousin Beorn and his brother Harold. Harold and Boorn op-They both refused to give up any part of what the King pose his reconciliahad given them. 1 Swegen's petition was accordingly re-tion. fused; his outlawry was confirmed; only, as seems to have Swegen's been usual in such cases, he was allowed four days to get is renewed, bim out of the country. How far Harold and Beorn were actuated in this matter by mere regard to their own interests, how far by a regard to the public good, how far by that mixture of motives which commonly determines men's actions, we have no means of judging. This is not the only act of Harold's early life which may be taken to show that he had not yet acquired those wonderful gifts of conciliation and self-restraint which mark his more mature Of the character of Beorn we know nothing except from this story; what we hear of him directly afterwards certainly sets him before us in a generous and amiable light. The tale is told us in a perfectly colourless way, without any hint how the conduct of the two cousins was judged of in the eyes of contemporaries in general or in those of Earl Godwine. At all events, Swegen went away from Sandwich disappointed. He thence went to Bosham, where his ships were lying in the land-locked haven of that place. This was just at the moment when the fleet, no longer needed for service against Baldwin, was beginning to disperse. We see that this fleet also had been gathered in the ancient way by the contingents or contributions of the shires,2 and that only a small number of the ships were in the King's permanent service. of the crews who had come from distant, especially inland, &lt;sup>1</sup> Chron. Petrib. 1046. "Da wiöleg Harold eorl his broffor and Beorn corl beet he ne moste been nan beere binga wurde be se cyng him geunnen hæsse." So Chron. Ab. 1049. The Worcester Chronicle and Florence do not mention this opposition of Harold and Beorn.

&lt;sup>2</sup> See vol. i. p. 370.

Godwine at Peven-

веу.

CHAP. VIL districts were naturally weary of tarrying when there was no prospect of active service, and the contingent of Mercia was accordingly allowed to return home. The King remained at Sandwich with a few ships only. Meanwhile a rumour came that hostile ships had been seen ravaging to the west. The Earl of the West-Saxons accordingly sailed forth to the rescue, with forty-two ships belonging to the men of, his Earldom.2 He took also two ships of the King's, commanded respectively by Harold and by his third son Tostig, of whom we now hear for the first time.3 Stress of weather however hindered them from getting further west than Pevensey. While they lay there, a change, of the motive of which we are not told, was made in the command of the two royal ships which had accompanied Godwine. Harold gave up the ship which he had commanded to his cousin Beorn.4 This accidental change possibly saved Harold's life.5 Swegen now came from Bosham to Pevensey, and there found his father and cousin. He there spoke with both of them. The result of their discourse was that Beorn

<sup>1 &</sup>quot;Fóron fela scypa hám," says the Worcester Chronicle; but Abingdon puts it more distinctly; "And hase cing lyfde eallon Myrceon ham; and hig swa dydon."

&lt;sup>2</sup> Abingdon and Worcester mention Godwine's going with forty-two ships, but Peterborough has more distinctly, "Da ge[wende] Godwine eorl west onbuton mid bes cynges ii. scipum ban anan steorde Harold eorl and þan oðran Tostig his brofor, and landesmanna sciþa xlii."

&lt;sup>2</sup> The first certainly authentic signature of Tostig seems to be in this year. Cod. Dipl. iv. 115. The charter, after the signatures of Godwine, Leofric and Siward, has those of "Harold Dux," "Beorn Dux," "Tosti nobilis," "Leowine nobilis." Leofwine must have been very young.

<sup>4</sup> Chron. Petrib. "Da scyfte man Harold eorl up bes cynges scipe be Harold eorl ser steorde." Mr. Earle's conjecture that for "Harold eorl" we should read "Beorn eorl" is absolutely necessary to make sense of the passage. Parallel Chronicles, 343.

Was it some feeling that a brother's life had been at least in jeopardy that led William of Malmesbury, or those whom he followed, into the strange statement (ii. 200), "Pro conscientia Brunonis cognati interempti, et, at quidam dicunt, fratris"?

was persuaded to undertake the office of intercessor with CHAP. VII. the King on Swegen's behalf. What arrangement was Beorn entrapped to be proposed—whether Beorn brought himself to con- and slain sent to the sacrifice which he had before refused—whether Swegen was to be again invested with his Earldom or only with his private lordships—whether Harold, Beorn, or Swegen was to be compensated in any other way for the surrenders which one or more of them would have to makeof all this nothing is explained to us. We hear however that Beorn, trusting to his kindred with Swegen, did not hesitate to set out to ride with him to the King at Sandwich. He even agreed to a proposal of Swegen's, according to which they left the road from Pevensey to Sandwich, and went westward to Bosham. For this deviation from his original scheme Swegen made an excuse, which was doubtless more intelligible then than it is now, namely a fear lest the crews of his ships should forsake him, if they were not confirmed in their faith to him by the presence of Beorn. The young Earl fell into the snare, and accompanied his cousin to the haven of Bosham. But when Swegen pressed him to go on board one of his ships, Beorn's suspicions were at last aroused, and he vehemently refused. At last Swegen's sailors bound him, put him in a boat, rowed him to the ships, and there kept him a prisoner. They then hoisted their sails and steered for Dartmouth.2 There Beorn was killed by Swegen's orders, but his body was taken on shore and buried in a church. As soon as the murder became known, Earl Harold,3 with others of Beorn's friends, and the sailors by Swegen.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Chron. Ab. " be wende Beorn for beere sibbe beet he him swican nolde." So Wig.

&lt;sup>2</sup> "To Dertamutan," Chronn. Ab. and Wig. "to Axamutan," Chron. Petrib.

* The personal share of Harold in the burial comes from the Abingdon Chronicle, the one least favourable to Godwine. Peterborough, so strongly Godwinist, is silent.

CHAP. VII. from London—a clear mark of Beorn's popularity—came and took up the body, carried it to Winchester, and there buried it in the Old Minster by the side of Beorn's uncle King Cnut.

Swegen declared Nithing by the armed Gemót.

1087.

Functions of the Witan dis-

the army.

The general indignation at the crime of Swegen was intense. The King and the army publicly declared the murderer to be Nithing. This was the vilest epithet in the English language, implying utter worthlessness. It was evidently used as a formal term of dishonour. We shall find it at a later time resorted to by a Norman King as a means of appeal to his English subjects. William Rufus, when he needed English support, proclaimed in the like sort that all who failed to come to his standard should be declared to be Nithing. But this proclamation has a deeper importance than the mere use of this curious expression of public contempt. It is to be noted that the proclamation is described as the act of the King and his army. Here is charged by clearly a case of a military Gemót.2 The army, as representing the nation, assumes to itself in time of war the functions which belonged to the regular Gemót in time of peace. The army declares Swend to be Nithing, and it was doubtless the army, in the same sense, which had just before hearkened to, and finally rejected, his petition for restoration to his estates. So it was the army, Cnut's Danish army, which assumed to itself the functions of the English Witan by disposing of the English Crown on the ing Swend. In the ancient Teutonic constitu- CHAP. VII. army was the nation and the nation was the the primitive Gemôte described by Tacitus,* all men came armed, no distinction could be tween the two. But it should be noticed that Nature of used is not that which denotes the armed levy Gemét. ingdom, but that which expresses the army in its relation to the King.3 This fact exactly falls in e practical, though not formal, change which had blace in the constitution of the ordinary Gemôts. litary Gemôt which passed this sentence on Swegen t the whole force of England, for we were just told that the contingents both of Mercia and Wesd left Sandwich. This assembly must have conof the King's Comstatus of both kinds, of the bound to him by the older and more honourable d also of the standing force of the Housecarls, or rate of their officers. Setting churchmen asidewe have seen that even churchmen often bore oth by land and by sea-such a body would procontain a large proportion of the men who were to attend an ordinary Witenagemôt. By an asof this kind, acting, whether constitutionally or the character of a National Assembly, the outand disgrace of Swegen were decreed.

1014.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Chron. Ab. "And se cing be and eall here cweeton Swegen for nitting." Cf. Chron. Petrib. 1088. "Da se cyng . . . sende ofer eall Englalande, and bead best selc man be were unnifing socolde cuman to he." Will. Malms. iv. 306. "Jubet ut compatriotas advocent ad obsidionem venire, nisi si qui velint sub nomine Niffing, quod nequam sonat, remanere." Matt. Paris. p. 15 (Wats); "Absque mora ut ad obsidionem veniant jubet; nisi velint sub nomine Nithing, quod Latine nequam sonat, recenseri. Angli, qui nihil contumeliosius et vilius estimant quam hujusmodi ignominioso vocabulo notari, catervatim ad Regem confluentes." &c.

&lt;sup>3</sup> On military Assemblies, Macedonian, Ætolian, and even Achaian, see Hist. Fed. Gov. i. pp. 413, 511, 549.

ould seem that this decree preceded the translation Swegen, rn's body to Winchester, a ceremony which may most of his probably have been ordered by the Assembly. For ships, escapes to before that translation 6 that the men of Hastings, Flanders.

rol. i. p. 404. <sup>2</sup> See vol. i. p. 86. , which implies a standing force, very often a paid force, not fyrd, ral levy of the country.

vol. i. p. 109.

the Housecarls, as a later and inferior form of the Comitatus, see 490.

tel mr |an " (namely the second burial of Beorn), the men of CHAP. VII. most probably by some commission from the King or his military council, sailed forth to take vengeance on the murderer. Swegen was already forsaken by the greater part of his following. Of his eight ships six had left him. Their crews were probably rough Wikings from the North, men familiar with all the horrors of ordinary pirate warfare, not troubled with scruples about harrying a land whose people had never wronged them, but who nevertheless shrank from the fouler wickedness of slaying a kinsman by guile. Two ships only remained with Swegen, those doubtless whose crews had been the actual perpetrators of the deed. The men of Hastings chased and evertook these ships, slew their crews, and brought the ships to the King.1 How Swegen himself escaped it is not easy to see; possibly the men of Hastings still scrupled personally to lay hands upon a son of Godwine. At any rate the murderer baffled pursuit, and again took shelter in his old quarters. Baldwin, so lately restored to his dominions, again began his old practice of receiving English exiles, and Swegen spent the whole winter at the court of Flanders under the full protection of its sovereign.<sup>2</sup>

Hastings set forth, according to the Worcester Chronicle, the only one which mentions their exploit.

¹ So I understand the words of the Worcester Chronicle. The men of Hastings go after Swegen and take "his twa scypa"—the only ships he then had. To explain his having only two ships the writer adds, "ehta scypa he heefde ær he Beorn beswice; syövan hine forleton ealle buton twam." The only meaning of these words seems to be that which I have given, though it involves the difficulty as to the personal escape of Swegen. But it is clear that Florence took them differently; "Dimiserunt illum sex naves, quarum duas paullò post coeperunt Hastingenses... Swanus verò ad Flandriam duabus fugiens navibus ibi mansit." This accounts for his escape, but I cannot see how "his twa scypa" can mean two of the ships which had left him. The Abingdon Chronicle also mentions the desertion of the six ships, but not the exploit of the Hastings men.

For other examples of the vigorous action of the men of the "Cinque Ports" in 1293 and 1297, see Walter of Hemingburgh, vol. ii. pp. 41, 158 (Hist. Soc. Ed.).

&lt;sup>3</sup> Chron. Ab. "And har wunode mid Baldwine." Chron. Petrib.

ory of the murder of Beorn is told in so minute GIAP. VII. phic a way that it seems impossible to throw doubt Character of the act part of the tale. And every account represents the of Swegen. a deed of deliberate treachery. An act of mere e would not have greatly offended the morality of re. Had Swegen killed even a kinsman in a moment vocation or in a fair fight to decide a quarrel, his would not have seemed very black. Had he even craft in carrying out an ancestral deadly feud, he t have quoted many precedents in Northumbrian ry, and, among them, an act in the life of the reigning of the North hardly inferior in guilt to the worst t of his own. But to kill a kineman, a confiding kins. Universal one who had just granted a somewhat unreasonable against er, was something which offended the natural instincts Swegen. only of contemporary Englishmen but of Scandinavian es. At the moment Swegen seems to have found no ds; the voice of all England was against him; there sign that any of his family stood by him; the symies of Harold clearly lay with his murdered cousia. hardly possible to conceive a blacker or more unonable crime. One would have thought that Swegen d have failed to find patrons or protectors in any er of Christendom. Yet, strange to say, the mur- His recep-, forsaken by all, was at once received with favour by Baldwin. win, even though Baldwin must have known that by ving him he was running the risk of again offending King of the English and even the Emperor himself. what followed is stranger still. In the next year, His out-Witenagemot held in London in Midlent, Swegen's reversed

Swegen gewende ha sast to Baldewines lands, and set her calno on Brycge mid his fullan grife."

bron. Wig. 1050. "Swein eorl bad Beorn corl mid facue," " ar be beswice," Chron. Ab. 1949. "er he Beern amyrorede." e vol. i. p. 588.

and he returns to England. Midlent, 1050. Swegen re-conciled to Eadward by Bishop Ealdred.

CHAP. VII. outlawry was reversed, and he was restored to his Earldom.1 And, strangest of all, his restoration is attributed, not to the influence of Godwine or his family, not to any revulsion of feeling on the part of the King or the nation, but to the personal agency of Bishop Ealdred the Peacemaker. He it was who, it would seem, crossed over to Flanders, brought Swegen to England, and procured his restoration at the hands of the King and his Witan. There is nothing to show that Ealdred was specially under the influence of Godwine. We shall before long find him acting in a manner which, to say the least, shows that he was not one of Godwine's special followers. His episcopal city and the greater part of his diocese lay within the Earldom of Leofric; no part of it lay within the Earldom of Godwine.<sup>3</sup> And, if part of his diocese lay within the Earldom of the man whom he sought to restore, that only makes him the more responsible for the act which was so directly to affect a portion of his own flock. In the restoration of Swegen, Ealdred seems to have acted purely in his capacity of peacemaker.4 At first sight it might seem that Ealdred strove to win the blessing promised to his class by labouring on behalf of a sinner whom the most enlarged charity could hardly excuse. The very strangeness of the act suggests that there must have been some explaining cause, intelligible at the time, but which our authorities have not

&lt;sup>1</sup> I think that by comparing the Abingdon Chronicle under 1050 with the Peterborough Chronicle under 1047, it will appear that Swegen was reinstated in this Gemot of Midlent 1050, one which I shall have to mention again.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Flor. Wig. "Swanus . . . ibi mansit, quoad Wigornensis episcopus Aldredus illum reduceret, et cum Rege pacificaret." This seems to imply that Ealdred brought him over in person.

* The old diocese of Worcester took in the shires of Worcester and Gloucester and part of Warwick. Of these Gloucestershire was in Swegen's Earldom, the rest in Leofric's.

The reconciliation of Swegen with Eadward is mentioned by Thomas Stubbs (see above, p. 87) as an instance of the peacemaking powers of Ealdred, along with that of Gruffydd.

The later history of Swegen shows that, if he CHAP. WIL. eat sinner, he was also a great penitent. We can s that Ealdred already marked in him some signs e and amendment, that he had received from him nfession of his crime, to which we possibly owe nd graphic accounts of the murder of Beorn which n handed down to us.1 If so, it was doubtless charitable not to break a bruised reed; still again st the government of five English shires to the of Eadgifu and murderer of Beorn was, to say the erilous experiment.

ast now go back to the time when King Eadward dismissed the Mercian contingent after the reconbetween Baldwin and the Emperor. While the Various events which I have just narrated were going on, military operations en had cause to be alert in more than one quarter of the year sland against assaults of various kinds. In the rively peaceful reign of Eadward this year stands marked by warlike operations of every sort. had to resist the assaults of foreign enemies, of vassals, and of banished men seeking their resto-Besides the small force of Swegen, Osgod Clapa Movements as been already said,2 at sea with a much larger claps. of ships. He first appeared at Wulpe near Sluys east of Flanders, and the news of his arrival there ight to Eadward at the moment when the King at Sandwich at the head of a very small force. rcian contingent had just been dismissed, and , with the force of Wessex, had sailed westward.

ear that the details of the murder could come only from Swegen his accomplices were killed by the Hastings men. Ealdred the obvious person for Swegen to confess them to. I do not Bishop of betraying the secrets of the confessional. A public that of Swegen was doubtless followed by a public confession. ve, pp. 90, 100.

CHAP. VII. Eadward was therefore nearly defenceless. He therefore countermanded the orders for the dismissal of the Mercian vessels, and as many of them as was possible were brought He returns back. Osgod however did not act personally as the to Denenemy of England. He merely took his wife from Bruges, mark. where she had been left, and sailed back to Denmark with Piracy and six ships. The remainder of his fleet took to piracy off destruction of his fleet. Eadulfsness in Essex, and there did much harm. But a violent storm arose and destroyed all the vessels except four.1 These were chased and captured, and the crews slain, whether by Eadward's own fleet in pursuit or by some of the foreign allies of England is not very clear.2

Ships from Ireland in the Bristol Channel: joined by South Wales.

The rumour which had called Godwine westward from Sandwich was not wholly a false one. The ships which were then said to be ravaging the south coast, were Gruffydd of doubtless Danish pirate vessels from Ireland, the same which, in the course of July, sailed up the Bristol Channel July, 1049. as far as the mouth of the Usk.3 There they were welcomed by the South-Welsh King Gruffydd,4 who was doubtless rejoiced at the prospect of such allies, alike against the English and against his Northern namesake, the momentary confederate of England. After a certain amount of harrying along the coast of the Channel, the combined forces of Gruffydd and the pirates crossed the Wye, and slew and plundered within the diocese of Worcester. It is not clear who was the Earl responsible for the safety of the country since the banishment of Swegen. It was probably the

They invade Gloucestershire, and defeat Bishop Ealdred.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Four, according to the Worcester Chronicle, two, according to Florence. The Abingdon Chronicle does not mention this last incident, and that of Peterborough passes by the whole story of Osgod.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Chron. Wig. " pa man ofsloh begeondan sæ." Flor. Wig. "Quæ in transmarinis partibus captæ sunt, occisis omnibus qui in illis erant."

&lt;sup>2</sup> Chron. Wig. "On Wylisce Axa." Flor. Wig. "Ostium intrantes Sabrinse, in loco qui dicitur Wylesc Eaxon appulerunt." The "Welsh Axe" is of course the Usk. The rivers of the same name in Somersetshire and Devonshire had ceased to be looked on as Welsh.

<sup>4</sup> On the details of this perplexing campaign, see Appendix I.

King's nephew, Ralph the Timid, whose name begins about CHAP VII. this time to appear in the Charters with the title of Earl.1 If this be so, this was the first appointment of a foreigner to a great temporal office, a further step in the downward course, still more marked than that of appointing foreign Prelates. Under such a chief as Ralph no vigorous resistance was to be looked for, and the person who really took upon himself the defence of the country was Bishop Eald-He gathered a force from among the inhabitants of red. Gloucestershire and Herefordshire; but part of his army consisted of Welshmen, whether mere mercenaries hired for the occasion, or Welshmen living as immediate subjects of England. But whoever these Welshmen were, their sympathies lay wholly with Gruffydd and not with Ealdred. They sent a secret message to the Welsh King, suggesting an immediate attack on the English army. Gruffydd willingly answered to the call. With his twofold force, Welsh and Danish, he fell on the English camp July 29, early in the morning, slew many good men, and put the rest, together with the Bishop, to flight.<sup>2</sup> Of the further results of this singular and perplexing campaign, especially when and how the retreat of the invaders was brought about, we hear nothing.

Everything which happened about this time sets before Increasing us the great and increasing intercourse which now pre- connexion with the vailed between England and the continent. Our fathers continent. were now brought into a nearer connexion with both the attendance

&lt;sup>1</sup> Ralph's signatures seem to begin in 1050. See Cod. Dipl. iv. 123, 125. That in 121 is more doubtful. That in 113 Mr. Kemble marks as doubtful, but refers it to 1044-1047. But it must be spurious. It makes Radsige Archbishop and Ælfgar Earl at the same time, as also Tostig, who was not an Earl till long after. See Appendix G.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Chron. Wig. 1050. "And hi comon unwær on heom, on ealne serne morgen, and fela godra manna bær ofslagon; and ba obre ætburston for mid ham biscope."

marriage of priests and against their bearing arms.2 The days of Otto the Great seemed to have returned, when the Pope and the Emperor, seemingly without reference to the Parisian King, held a Council on French ground, attended by a vast multitude of Prelates, clergy, and laity from the Imperial Kingdoms and from other parts of Europe. There, besides the Metropolitan of the city in which the synod was held, was the Archbishop of Burgundy, as our Chronicles call him,4 that is, the Archbishop of the great see of Lyons, Primate of all the Gauls, but no subject or vassal of the upstart dynasty of Paris. There were the Archbishops of Trier and Besançon; and CHAP. VII. spiritual and the temporal chiefs of Christendom than they had ever known before. We have already seen England in close alliance with the Empire; we have now to contemplate her relations with the Papacy. The active and saintly Pontiff who now presided over the Church held at this time a series of Councils in various places, at most of which English Prelates attended. Leo, after receiving the submission of Godfrey at Aachen, entered France, at the request of Heremar, Abbot of Saint Remigius at Rheims, to hallow the newly built church of his monastery. He then held a synod, which sat for six days, Synod of and passed several canons of the usual sort, against the

Rheims.

from England came Duduc, the Saxon Bishop of Wells, 1 "bet micele mynster et Rémys," says the Worcester Chronicle, which might seem to mean the Metropolitan church; but Florence makes it plain that the Abbey is meant; "Rogatu eximize religionis Abbatis Herimari . . . . sancti Remigii Francorum apostoli monasterium, Remis constitutum, maximo cum honore dedicavit." Cf. Will. Gem. vii. 15.

&lt;sup>3</sup> Ord. Vit. 575 A.

&lt;sup>3</sup> The presence of the Emperor is asserted by the Worcester Chronicle; "per was se Papa Leo and se Casere." Florence does not speak of the Emperor, but says that Leo took with him "prefectum et digniores quosdam Romulese urbis."

<sup>4</sup> Chron. Petrib. 1046. "per was on Leo se Papa and se arcebiscop of Burgundia and se arcebiscop of Bysincun and se arcebiscop of Treviris, and se arcebiscop of Remis, and manig mann beerfo ge hadode ge læwede."

and the Abbots Wulfric of Saint Augustine's and Æltwine CHAP. VH. of Ramsey, whom King Eadward had sent to bring him word of all that should be done for the good of Christendom.1 It does not appear that any English Prelates were Synod of present at the synod which Leo held soon after at Mainz; 2 Mainz. but the two Italian synods which were held soon after were, as we shall see, connected in a singular manner with English affairs. There seems to have been about Deaths of this time a kind of mortality among the English Prelates. and Among those who died was the Abbot of Westminster or Abbots. Thorney, the humbler foundation which was soon to give way to the great creation of the reigning King. He bore the name of Wulfnoth, a name which suggests the likelihood of kindred with the house of Godwine. Another was Oswiu, the Abbot of the other Thorney in the fen land, the neighbour of Peterborough and Crowland. This Siward year too died Siward the Coadjutor-Archbishop, and Ead- Eadsige sige again resumed his functions for the short remainder resumes of his life.3 Eadnoth too, the good Bishop of Dor- Primacy. chester,4 the builder of Stow-in-Lindesey, died this year, Eadnoth of and his death offered a magnificent bait to Norman am-Dorchester bition and greediness. The great Bishoprick stretching succeeds. from the Thames to the Humber, was conferred by the 1049. King on one of his Norman chaplains, who however bore the Scandinavian name of Ulf. As to the utter unfitness of this man for such an office there is an universal con-The King, even the holy sent among our authorities. Eadward, did evil in appointing him; the new Prelate

&lt;sup>1</sup> Chron. Petrib. 10.46. "Eadward cyng sende bider Dudoce [the Abbots only and not Dudoc are mentioned by the Worcester Chronicle, 1050] . . . bet hi seeolden bam cynge cyfan hwæt bær to Christendome gecoren wære."

&lt;sup>2</sup> Lambert, 1050 (see above, p. 99). Herm. Contr. 1050.

&lt;sup>3</sup> See above, p. 68.

&lt;sup>4</sup> Chron. Ab. 1049. "Forofferde Eadnoö se goda biscop on Oxnafordscire." The same words seem to have dropped out of the Worcester Chronicle.

CHAP. VII. did nought bishoplike; it were shame to tell more of his deeds.1

Witenagemot of London. Midlent, 1050.

Reduction of the Fleet.

The year which followed was one of great note in ecclesiastical history. In England the first event recorded is the usual meeting of the Witan in London at Midlent. The proceedings of this Gemót, like those of many others about this time, give us a glimpse of that real, though very imperfect, parliamentary life which was then growing up in England, and which the Norman Conquest threw back for many generations. Then, as now, there were economists pressing for the reduction of the public expenditure, and what we should now call the Navy Estimates were chosen as being no doubt a popular subject for attack. The narrative of the naval events of the last year shows that, on special occasions, naval contingents were called for, according to the old law,2 from various parts of the Kingdom, but that the King still kept a small naval force in constant pay. This force had, under Cnut and Harold, consisted of sixteen ships; 3 it seems now to have consisted only of fourteen. The experience of the last year showed that England was still open to attack from the West; but the great fear, fear of invasion from the North, had now quite passed away. It seemed therefore to be a favourable moment for further reductions. By the authority of this Gemót nine ships were accordingly paid off, the crews receiving a year's pay, and the standing force was cut down to six.4 It was in this same assembly that Swegen

¹ Chron. Ab. 1049. "Eadwerd cing geaf Ulfe his preoste best biscoprice, and hit yfele beteah." Chron. Wig. 1050. "Ac he was sybban of adryfon, forban be he ne gefremede naht biscoplices beron, swa best us sceamab hit nu mare to tellanne." Flor. Wig. "Regis capellanus Ulfus genere Nortmannus."

&lt;sup>2</sup> See vol. i. p. 368. <sup>3</sup> See vol. i. p. 570.

&lt;sup>4</sup> Chron. Petrib. 1047. "Her on bisum geare was mycel gemot on Lundene to midfestene, and man sette ut ix. litsmanna scipa, and fif belifan wið æftan." The Abingdon Chronicle, 1049, to much the same

was inlawed,1 that is, his outlawry was reversed, by the CHAP. VII. intercession of Bishop Ealdred. That Prelate, as we have Swegen inseen, seems to have gone over to Flanders, and to have brought Swegen back with him.2

But Ealdred had soon to set forth on a longer Mission of journey. He and the Lotharingian Bishop Hermann Ealdred and Herwere now sent to Rome on the King's errand.3 What mann to that errand was we learn only from legendary writers and doubtful charters, but, as their accounts completely fit in with the authentic history, we need not scruple to accept their general outline.4 The King had in his youth The King's vowed a pilgrimage to Rome, and the non-fulfilment row of pilof this vow lay heavy on his conscience. It probably Rome. lay heavier still when he saw so many of his subjects of all ranks, led by the fashionable enthusiasm of the time, making both the pilgrimage to Rome and also the more distant pilgrimage to Jerusalem.<sup>5</sup> A broken vow was a crime; still Eadward had enough of political sense and right feeling left to see that his absence from his Kingdom at such a time as the present would be a criminal forsaking of his kingly duty. The Great Cnut might account as that just quoted, adds the words, "and se cyng heom behet xii. monaë gyld."

&lt;sup>1</sup> Chron. Ab. 1050 (the chronology of this Chronicle is utterly confused); "and man geinlagode Swegen Eorl."

&lt;sup>2</sup> See above, p. 108.

&lt;sup>3</sup> Chron. Ab. 1049. "On bæs cinges ærende."

* See the charter in Cod. Dipl. iv. 173, and the accounts in Æthelred of Rievaux, 379. Estorie de S. Ædward, 65 et seqq.

<sup>5</sup> Besides the many exalted persons who followed the example of Cnut, some of whose pilgrimages are of historical importance, the prevalence of the fashion is shown by its incidental mention in more than one charter. Thus in Cod. Dipl. iv. 140 we find the mention of the Roman pilgrimage of a Lincolnshire Thegn whose name of Anskill or Anscytel witnesses to his Danish origin. (The charter may be quoted for such a point as this, though there is clearly something wrong in the signature of "Wulfwinus Lincolniensis episcopus.") And at p. 141 we find "Leofgyva femina Lundonica" (a holder of property in Lincolnshire) dying on her way to Jerusalem.

Eadward sends the Bishops to obtain a dispensation.

1050.

CHAP. VII. venture on such a journey; his eye could see and his hand could act from Rome or Norway or any other part of the world. But the personal presence of Eadward was the only check by which peace could be for a moment preserved between the true sons of the soil, and the strangers who were eating into its vitals. The King laid his case before his Witan; the unanimous voice of the Assembly forbade him to forsake his post; the legend adds that the Witan farther counselled him to satisfy his conscience by obtaining a Papal dispensation from his vow. This was the King's errand on which Ealdred and Hermann were sent to attend the great synod held this year at Rome. They made good speed with their journey; starting at The Synod Midlent, they reached the Holy City on Easter Eve.<sup>2</sup> In LANFRANC, that synod they stood face to face with a man then known only as a profound scholar and theologian, the bulwark of orthodoxy and the pattern of every monastic virtue, but who was, in years to come, to hold a higher place in the English hierarchy, and to leave behind him a far greater name in English history, than either of the English Prelates whose blessing he may now have humbly craved. In that synod of Rome the doctrines of Berengar of Tours were debated by the assembled Fathers, and the foremost champion of the faith to which Rome still cleaves was Lanfranc of Pavia. Suspected of complicity with the heretic, he produced the famous letter in which Berengar had maintained the Eucharist to be a mere figure of the Body of Christ.<sup>3</sup> How far Ealdred or Hermann took part in these theological debates we know not; but they are said to have successfully accomplished their own errand.

of Rome.

<sup>1</sup> Chron. Petrib. 1047. "On bysum ilcan geare wees se myccla sinof on Rome"-like our own "mycel gemôt" just before.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Ib. "Hi comon byder on Easter æfen."

&lt;sup>3</sup> Vita Lanfr. c. 10. ap. Giles, i. 288. Will, Malms. iii. 284. Sig. Gemb. 1051. See Milman, Latin Christianity, iii. 24.

ing's vow of pilgrimage was dispensed with, on GRAP. VII. on of the rebuilding and endowment on a grander f that renowned West Minster whose name was separably bound together with that of the sainted

Before the year was out the unwearied Leo held Synod of synod at Vercelli. Here the theological contro- Confirmaras again raised, and Lanfranc again shone forth as tion of Ulf esistible smiter of heresy. Berengar was finally ter. nned, notwithstanding his appeals to the elder teach-John Scotus, and his protests that those who rejected Scotus rejected Augustine, Jerome, Ambrose, and Fathers of the Church.<sup>2</sup> These disputes, renowned Church at large, are wholly passed over by our Chroniclers. To them the famous Synod of Vercelli to have been memorable only as showing the Roman in what was apparently a new relation towards the y of England. Before the assembled Fathers came wly appointed Bishop of Dorchester, Ulf the Noreeking, it would seem, for consecration or confirma-His unfitness for his post was manifest; he was incapable of going through the ordinary service of urch. The Synod was on the point of deposing him, king the staff which, according to the ceremonial of imes, he had already received from the King. But fluence which was already all-powerful at Rome nel, Biev. ap. X Scriptt. 381. If the letter there given be genuine, ensation was granted by the authority of the synod as well as of the Endward was either to build a new or restore an old monastery of eter; "ant novum construss ant vetustum augeas et emendes." French Life, 1601 et seqq., where the Bishops are both quartered g sees, Ealdred prematurely at York, Hermann at Winchester. y does not occur in the contemporary Life, p. 417.

nim. He retained his Bishoprick; but only at the a lavish expenditure of treasure, of which we may e that no portion found its way into the private the first letter in Dr. Giles' collection, p. 17.

Possible pilgrimage of Macbeth.

CHAP. VII. coffers of Leo. 1 It was in this same year that Macbeth made that mysterious bestowal of alms or bribes at Rome from which some have inferred a personal pilgrimage on the part of the Scottish usurper.2 It is not beyond the bounds of possibility that one who seems to us hardly more real than the creations of Grecian tragedy may have personally appeared at Rome or at Vercelli, that he may have shown his pious indignation at the heresies of the Canon of Tours, or have felt his soul moved within him at the incapacity of the Bishop of Dorchester. A personal meeting between Leo, Lanfranc, Ealdred, and Macbeth would form no unimpressive scene in the hands of those who may venture on liberties with the men of far-gone times which to the historian are forbidden.

> Ealdred and Hermann thus came back from Rome with the wished for dispensation from the King, and Ulf came back from Vercelli to hold the great see of Mid-England, and to rule it in his unbishoplike fashion for a little time. But before long a still greater ecclesiastical preferment became vacant. Eadsige, who had so lately resumed his archiepiscopal functions, died before the end of the year.3 The day of complete triumph for the Norman monks and chaplains who surrounded Eadward now seemed to have come. A Frenchman might now sit on the throne of Augustine. Patriotic Englishmen were of course proportionably alarmed, and among them none more so than those who were most immediately concerned, the Chapter of the metropolitan church. The monks of Death of Archbishop Eadsige. October 20, 1050.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Our ancient tongue appears to advantage in the pithy narrative of this affair given in the Peterborough Chronicle (1047); "And eft se Papa hæfde sinot on Uercel, and Ulf biscop com beerto; and forneah man sceolde tobrecan his stef, gif he ne sealde be mare gersuman ; fordan he ne cube don his gerihte swa wel swa he sceolde." Florence passes by the story : his Latin would be feeble after such vigorous English.

&lt;sup>2</sup> See above, p. 54.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Chron. Petrib. 1047. Flor. Wig. 1050.

po and made what is called a canonical CHAP. VII. the eye of English law such a process was of Christ a petition to the King and his Witan Church in ment of the man of their choice. That Alfric. member of their own body, their selecshowed that seclusion from the world had incapable of a happy union of the dove pent. There was in their house a monk, ame, who had been brought up in the monashis childhood, and who enjoyed the love of society. Notwithstanding his monastic educaras held to be specially skilled in the affairs of a. And he had a further merit as likely as any others to weigh either with an English Chapter h an English Witenagemót; he was a near kins-F Earl Godwine.2 The monks petitioned the Earl, atural patron of a corporation within his governto use his influence to obtain the King's confirmaof their choice.3 Godwine was doubtless nothing to avail himself of so honourable an opportunity to note an Englishman and a kinsman. But his influwas crumbling away. Four years before he had able to obtain the confirmation of Siward as Eadcoadjutor; he was now unable to obtain the con- Ælfric renation of Ælfric, or of any other man of native birth, the King,

With Radw. 400. Elfric was "secundum canonica instituta electus," " netitio et electic ecclesiastici conventas."

<sup>3</sup> Thid. 399. "Ex supradicti ducis Godwini stirpe." 2 Thid. 399. "Quem tam totius ecclesis universales filii quam ipsius
2 Thid. 399. "Quem tam totius ecclesis universales filii quam ipsius
2 Thid. 399. "Quem tam totius ecclesis universales filii quam ipsius
2 Thid. 399. "Quem tam totius ecclesis universales filii quam ipsius
3 Thid. 399. "Quem tam totius ecclesis universales filii quam ipsius monasterii monachi in archipreseulem sibi exposcunt dari, huncque et affectu communi et petitione eligunt presente regulari. Mittunt etiam ad supradictum Godwinum, qui regio favore in et dominabatur parte regni, comnonent eum generis sui, precantur ut ex affectu propinquitatis Regem adent, et hand, utpote in cadem ecclesis nutritum et secundum canonica instituta electum, sibi pontificem annuat. Promittit fideliter pro viribus Eule Dux incline, Regenque adiens innotescit petitionem et electionem ecclesinatioi conventita" and Robert Bishop of London appointed to the see of Canterbury. Midlent. 1051. Spearhafoc to London, to the Abbey of OHAP. VII. as Eadsige's successor. The saintly King paid no regard to the canonical election of the Convent, and in the Midlent Witenagemót of the next year, the Archbishoprick of Canterbury was bestowed on the King's French favourite, Robert, Bishop of London. The national party however prevailed so far as to secure an English successor to the see which Robert vacated. Spearhafoc, Abbot of appointed Abingdon, a man famous for his skill in the goldsmith's and Rudolf craft, was named to the see of London by the King's writ under his seal.3 The Abbacy of Abingdon was Abingdon. given to a man whose description raises our curiosity; he was one Rudolf, described as a kinsman of King Eadward and as a Bishop in Norway.4 For a native Northman to have been a kinsman of the son of Æthelred and Emma is hardly possible, unless the common ancestor was to be looked for so far back as the days before the settlement of Rolf. A Norman is hardly likely to have desired or obtained preferment in so unpromising a land; but it is highly probable that Cnut, who appointed several

<sup>1</sup> Chron. Ab. 1050. "ba hæfde Eadward cing witenagemot on Lunden to Midlencten, and sette Hrodberd to arcebiscop to Cantwarebyrig, and Sperhafoc abbud to Lunden, and geaf Robulfe biscop his mage best abbudrice on Abbandune."

&lt;sup>2</sup> See the Abingdon History, i. 463. He was a monk of Saint Eadmund's, and was charged with alienating some of the lordships of the house to Stigand. The account of his promotion to London I do not fully understand; "Spearhavoc autem a Rege civitati Lundonensi [civitatis Lundonensis?] eodem prædictæ pactionis anno, in episcopatum promotus, dum auri gemmarumque electarum pro corona imperiali cudenda, Regis ejusdem assignatione receptam haberet copiam." Was Saint Eadward's favour purchased by the materials of an earthly crown !

&lt;sup>3</sup> Chron. Petrib. 1048. "Mid bees cinges gewrite and insegle." See above, p. 67.

* Rudolf's kindred to the King is asserted more positively in the local Chronicle just quoted than in the local History (463); "Inde Rodulfum quemdam longævum abbatis loco ponendum Rex transmisit, qui episcopatum apud Norweiam gentem diu moderans, et tandem ab hujusmodi fasce privatum se agere malens, ad Regem ipsum suum, ut ferebatur, cognatum venit; a quo et susceptus est."

hmen to Bishopricks in Denmark, may have made cuar. vit.

a see in Norway either to reward or to remove some and unrecorded member of the English royal family. herefore very probable that Rudolf may have been glishman. He was an aged man and weary of ice. The hand of Harold Hardrada pressed heavily Church. Pilgrim of the Holy Sepulchre as he ie is charged with destroying ecclesiastical buildand even with sending Christian men to martyr-Rudolf sought and found a place of more quiet somewhat less honour, in the dominions of his in. The monks of Abingdon received him, not rillingly, it would seem, but they were won over e prospect that the old man would not live very nd by the King's promise that at the next vacancy ection should be allowed. 3 Presently the new Arch-Robert re-Robert came back from Rome with his pallium; turns from Rome. s enthroned in the metropolitan church, and soon July 27, ed to the royal presence. Spearhafoc, the Bishopof London, came with the royal writ, and demanded dolf, in any of its forms, is not an usual English name, but it might ike the rare names of Carl and Lothar (Hlothære). See vol.

am Brem. iii. 16. "Rex Haraldus orndelitate sua omnes tyranexcessit furores. Multes ecclesise per illum virum dirutes, multini ab illo per supplicia sunt necati. . . . . Itaque multis imperans ns, propter avaritiam et crudelitatem mam omnibus erat invisus." on to give a full account of Harold's dealings with the Archbishop dbjem.

t Mon. At. 463. "Ut vero tam Dei quam sui respectu eum a resiperent honorificèque tractarent, utpote summă cenitie jam m, co discedante, licere eis dedit quem de suis vellent, potibs sucn eligere. Paretur Regi. Reverentise aubjectio debitse a fratribus upetenter impenditur. At ipsos regia nequaquam fefoliit in postsmassio," Rudolf survived only two years.

on Petrib, 1948. "Pæs sylfan Lentenes be for to Rome æfter his ... Da com se arcebiscop fram Rome ane dæge ær Scs Petrus efene, and gesset his arcebiscopatol at Xpes cyrcean on Ses Petrus ug, and some bæs to bam cyng gewands."

He refuses to consecrate Spearhafoc.

CHAP. VII. consecration of his Metropolitan. Robert refused, saying that the Pope had forbidden him to consecrate Spearhafoc.1 Things had come to such a pass, that an Englishman, appointed to an English office by the King and his Witan, was to be kept out of its full possession by one foreigner acting at the alleged bidding of another. times when the Roman see showed itself a real refuge for the oppressed, and, as far as good intentions went, so it doubtless was in the days of good Pope Leo. But Englishmen now needed protection against no one except against the foreign favourites of their own King, and it was on behalf of those foreign favourites, and against Englishmen, that these stretches of Papal authority were now made. The unworthy Ulf was allowed, by the power of bribes, to retain his see-for he was a stranger. Spearhafoc, on what ground we know not-except so far as his English birth was doubtless a crime in the eyes of Robertwas refused the rite which alone could put him into full possession of his office. A second demand was again made by the Bishop-elect, and consecration was again refused Spearhafoc by the Norman Archbishop.2 Spearhafoc, rejected, unthe Bishop- consecrated, nevertheless went to Saint Paul's, and took possession of the see which he held by the King's full and regular grant.3 No doubt he did not pretend to occupies rick without consecration.

&lt;sup>1</sup> The Peterborough Chronicle (1048) is here again very graphic; "Da com Sparhafoc abbod to him mid bæs cynges gewrite and insegle (see above, p. 120); to ban bet he hine hadian secolde to biscop into Lundene. ba wiocweo se arcebiscop, and cwee bet se papa hit him forboden hæfde."

&lt;sup>2</sup> Chron. Petrib. The pithy narrative of this writer is cut much shorter in the Worcester Chronicler (1051), followed by Florence; "Spearhafoc . . . feng to ban biscoprice on Lundene, and hit was eft of him genumen ar he gehaded were." Florence turns this into, "Antequam esset consecratus, a Rege Eadwardo est ejectus." Now the Chronicles do not at all imply that the refusal of Robert was at all the King's personal act. Florence is perhaps confounding this business with the final expulsion of Spearhafoc later in the year, which he however places under another year.

&lt;sup>3</sup> Chron. Petrib. 1048. "Da gewende se abbod to Lundene, and sæt on

discharge any purely episcopal functions, but he kept CHAP. VII. possession of the see and its revenues, and probably exercised at least its temporal authority. This he did, the Chronicler significantly adds, all that summer and autumn. Before the year was out, the crisis had come, and had brought with it the momentary triumph of the strangers.

One act more must be recorded before we come to the end of this portion of Eadward's reign. In a meeting of the Witan, seemingly that in which Robert, Spearhafoc, and Rudolf received their several appointments, the remaining five ships of the standing or mercenary naval force were paid off.2 The war-contribution or Heregyld The rewas therefore no longer exacted. This tax had now been ships paid paid for thirty-eight years, ever since Thurkill and his off and the Heregyld fleet entered the service of Æthelred.3 This impost had all remitted. along been felt to be a great burthen; we are told that it was paid before all other taxes, the other taxes themselves, it would seem, being looked upon as heavy.4 The glimpse which is thus given us of the financial system of the time is just enough to make us wish for fuller knowledge. We must remember that in a rude state of society any kind of taxation is apt to be looked on as pam biscoprice, be se cyng him ær geunnan hæfde be his fulre leafe." This is one of those little touches which show the sympathies of the writer.

- 1 Chron. Petrib. 1048. "Ealne bone sumor and bone hærfest."
- <sup>2</sup> Chron. Ab. 1050. "And bees ylcan geare he settle ealle be litsmen of male."
- <sup>3</sup> Chron. Wig. 1052. "On þan ylcan geare aléde Eadward cyng þæt heregyld þæt Æþelred cyng ær astealde; þæt was on þam nigon and þrittigoðan geare þæs þe he hit ongunnon hæfde." Flor. Wig. 1051. "Rex Eadwardus absolvit Anglos a gravi vectigali tricesimo octavo anno ex quo pater suus Rex Ægelredus primitus id Danicis solidariis solvi mandårat. See vol. i. p. 391. The Heregyld is a tax for the maintenance of the here or standing army as distinguished from the fyrd or militia.
- <sup>4</sup> Chron. Wig. 1052. "Pæt gyld gedrehte ealle Engla beode on swa langum fyrste swa hit bufan her awriten is; fæt was æfre ætforan offrum gyldum be man myslice geald, and men mid menigfealdlice drehte."

CHAP. VII. a grievance. It requires a very considerable political developement for a nation to feel that the power of the purse is the surest safeguard of freedom. But there must have been something specially hateful about this tax to account for the way in which it is spoken of by the contemporary chroniclers, and for the hold which, as the legends show,1 it kept on the popular imagination.

between Danegeld and Heregyld.

holy King, we are told, in company with Earl Leofric, one day entered the treasury in which the money raised by the tax was collected; he there saw the Devil sitting and playing with the coin; warned by the sight, he at once Distinction remitted the tax. In this story the tax is called Danegeld, and as many of the sailors in the English service were likely to be Danes, the Heregybd seems to have been confounded with the Danegeld, and to have been popularly called by that name.2 The Danegeld was in strictness a payment made to buy off the ravages of Danish invaders, a practice of which we have seen instances enough and to spare in the days of Æthelred. But the tax now taken off was simply a war-tax for the maintenance of a fleet, a fleet whose crews may have been to a great extent Danes, but Danes who were not the enemies of England, but engaged in her service. The two ideas however easily ran into one another; it might be difficult to say under which head we ought to place some of the payments made both under Cnut and under Harthacnut. the Heregyld, in its more innocent shape, would, according to modern ideas, be an impost absolutely necessary for the defence of the country. If the tax were remitted, no naval force would be retained, except the contingents of the shires, which could not in any case be very readily forthcoming. But, besides the general dislike to taxation of any kind, this particular tax was a painful and hateful CHAP. VII. badge of national disgrace. It was a memory of times Import of the remiswhen England could find no defence against strangers sion. except by taking other strangers into her pay. Its remission was doubtless looked on as a declaration that England no longer needed the services of strangers, or of hired troops of any kind, but that she could trust to the ready patriotism and valour of her own sons. The Law required every Englishman to join the royal standard at the royal summons.1 The effectual execution of that law was doubtless held to be a truer safeguard than the employment of men, whether natives or strangers, who served only for their pay. Such reasonings had their weak side even in those days, but they were eminently in the spirit of the time. The measure was undoubtedly a popular one, and we are hardly in a position to say that, under the circumstances of the time, it may not have been a wise one.

&lt;sup>1</sup> See Bromton, 942. Estoire de S. Ædward, 919 et seqq. Leofric is also Eadward's partner in another vision. Æthel. Riev. X Scriptt. 389. <sup>2</sup> See Appendix K. Bromton, 949.

§ 4. The Banishment of Earl Godwine. 1051

The influence of the strangers had now reached its Theforeign height. As yet it has appeared on the face of the nar-influence at its rative mainly in the direction given to ecclesiastical pre-height. ferments. During the first nine years of Eadward's reign, we find no signs of any open warfare between the national and the Normannizing parties. The course of events shows that Godwine's power was being practically undermined, but he was still outwardly in the enjoyment of royal favour, and his vast possessions were still being added to by royal grants.<sup>2</sup> It is remarkable how seldom, at this stage of Eadward's reign, the acts of the Witan bear

&lt;sup>1</sup> See vol. i. p. 366.

&lt;sup>2</sup> There is a grant of lands to Godwine (uni meo fideli Duci nuncupato nomine Godwino) as late as 1050. Cod. Dipl. iv. 123. The description of the grantee as "Dux" of course identifies him with the Earl.

CHAP. VII. the signatures of any foreigners except churchmen. We meet also with slight indications showing that the King's foreign kinsmen and the national leaders were not yet on terms of open enmity.2 It was probably the policy of the strangers to confine their action in public matters to influencing the King's mind through his ecclesiastical favourites, while the mass of them were gradually providing in other ways for their own firm establishment in the land. But the tale which I now have to tell clearly reveals the fact that the number of French land-owners in England was already considerable, and that they had made themselves deeply hateful to the English people. Stealthily but surely, the foreign favourites of Eadward had eaten into the vitals of England, and they soon had the means of showing how bitter was the hatred which they bore towards the champions of English freedom. England now, under a native King of her own choice, felt, far more keenly than she had ever felt under her Danish Danish and conqueror, how great the evil is when a King and those influences, who immediately surround him are estranged in feeling from the mass of his people. The great Dane had gradually learned to feel and to reign as an Englishman, to trust himself to the love of his English subjects, and to surround the throne of the conqueror with the men whom his own axe and spear had overcome. Even during the troubled reigns of his two sons, the degeneracy was for the most part merely personal. Harthacnut indeed laid

Its seemingly stealthy character.

Comparison be tween Norman

&lt;sup>1</sup> The only absolutely certain instances that I can find at this time are the signatures of Earl Ralph in 1050. See above, p. 111. His name is added to doubtful charters at pp. 113, 121, and another doubtful one is signed by Robert the son of Wimarc, of whom more anon. The signatures of ecclesiastics, Rægnbold the Chancellor and others, are more common.

<sup>2</sup> Ralph's wife bore the name of Gytha, and their son was named Harold. Robert the son of Wimarc had also a son named Swegen, afterwards famous in Domesday. See Ellis, i. 433, 489. ii. 117. These names certainly point to a certain identification with England, and suggest the idea that the sons of Ralph and Robert were godsons of the two sons of Godwine.

on heavy and unpopular taxes for the payment of his CHAP. VII. Danish fleet; 1 but it does not appear that, even under him, Englishmen as Englishmen were subjected to systematic oppression and insult on the part of strangers. And, after all, the Danish followers of Cnut and his sons were men of kindred blood and speech. They could hardly be looked on in any part of England as aliens in the strictest sense, while to the inhabitants of a large part of the Kingdom they appeared as actual countrymen. But now, as a foretaste of what was to come fifteen years later, men utterly strange in speech and feeling stood around the throne, engrossed the personal favour of the King, perverted the course of justice, shared among themselves the highest places in the Church, and were already beginning to stretch out their hands to English lands and lordships as well as to English Bishopricks. The Dane, once brought to the knowledge of a purer faith and a higher civilization, soon learned to identify himself with the land in which he had settled, and to live as an Englishman under the Law of England. But to the French Incapacity favourites of Eadward the name, the speech, the laws of French to England were things on which their ignorant pride looked appreciate English down with utter contempt. They had no sympathy with instituthat great fabric of English liberty, which gave to every freeman his place in the commonwealth, and even to the slave held out the prospect of freedom. Gentlemen of the school of Richard the Good,2 taught to despise all beneath them as beings of an inferior nature, could not understand the spirit of a land where the Churl had his rights before the Law, where he could still raise his applauding voice in the Assemblies of the nation, and where men already felt as keenly as we feel now that an Englishman's house is his castle. Everything in short which had already made England free and glorious, everything which it is now our

<sup>1</sup> See vol. i. p. 570.

&lt;sup>2</sup> See vol. i. p. 281.

CHAP. VII. pride and happiness to have preserved down to our own times, was looked on by the foreign counsellors of Eadward as a mark of manifest inferiority and barbarism. The Dane spoke a tongue which hardly differed more in speech; widely from our own than the dialects of different parts of the Kingdom differed from one another. But the ancient mother-speech, once common to Dane and Frank and Angle and Saxon, the speech of which some faint traces may still have lingered at Laon and at Bayeux, had now become only one of many objects of contempt in the eyes of men whose standards were drawn from the in military Romanized courts of Rouen and Paris. The Dane met tactics. the Englishman in battle, face to face and hand to hand, with the same tactics and the same weapons. Shield-wall to shield-wall, sword to sword or axe to axe, had men waged the long warfare which had ranged from the fight 871-1016. of Reading to the fight of Assandun. To the Frenchman the traditions of Teutonic warfare appeared contemptible.1 His trust was placed, not in the stout heart and the strong arm of the warrior, but in the horse which is as useful in the flight as in the charge, and in the arrow which places the coward and the hero upon a level.<sup>2</sup> Men brought up in such feelings as these, full too no doubt of the insolent and biting wit of their nation, now stood round the throne of the King of the English. They were not as yet, to any great extent, temporal rulers of the land, but they had already begun to be owners of its soil; they were already the Fathers of the Church; they were the personal friends of the King; they were the channels of royal favour; their influence could obtain the highest ecclesiastical office, when it was refused alike to the

<sup>1 &</sup>quot;Nescia gens belli solamina spernit equorum," says Guy of Amiens of the English (Giles, p. 38), but his following lines are, however unwittingly, a noble panegyric.

 $<sup>^{2}</sup>$  Thuc. iv. 40. ἀπεκρίνατο αὐτῷ πολλοῦ ὰν ἄξιον εἶναι τὸν ἄτρακτον (λέγων τὸν ὀἴστὸν), εἰ τοὺς ἀγαθοὺς διεγίγνωσκε.

of the Earl of the West-Saxons and to the prayer CHAP. VII. anonical electors. In the company of these men g was at home; among his own people he was a . The sight of a denationalized Court, a Court Evils of a the national tongue is despised and where the alized of a foreign speech are alone thought worthy of Court, esos, a Court in which the heart of the sovereign early times. ore warmly for foreign favourites or foreign kinsn for the children of the soil, is a sight which in is enough to stir up a nation's blood. But far is the wrong in an age when Kings govern as reign, when it is not the mere hangers-on of a out the nation itself, which is made personally to strangers fill the posts of honour and influence, on soil and at its own cost. Often indeed since the Eadward has the Court of England been the least thing within the realm of England. But, for ages sovereign, however foreign in blood or feeling, ave ventured to place a stranger, ignorant of the tongue, on the patriarchal throne of Dunstan and Against such a state of things as this the Revolt of England rose. And the soul of the patriotic against the nt, the leader of the patriotic struggle, was the foreign inom Norman calumny has ever since picked out as ial victim, but with whom every true English as prepared to live and die. The man who strove land, the man who for a while suffered for Engt who soon returned in triumph to rescue England, e more Godwine, Earl of the West-Saxons.

efusal of the King to confer the Archbishoprick of Indiguaury on a kinsman of the great Earl regularly appointby the Convent of the metropolitan church, its ment of Robert to instead on an intriguing monk from Jumièges, Canterdoubt deeply embittered the feelings of Godwine

Robert's cabals against Godwine. 1051.

CHAP, VII. and of all true Englishmen. All the sons of the Church, we are told, lamented the wrong; and we may be sure that the feeling was in no way confined to those who are no doubt chiefly intended by that description. It now became the main object of the foreign Archbishop to bring about the ruin of the English Earl. Robert employed his influence with the King to set him still more strongly against his father-in-law, to fill his ears with calumnies against him, above all, to bring up again the old charge, of which Godwine had been so solemnly acquitted, which made him an accomplice in the death of Ælfred.2 A dispute about the right to some lands which adjoined the estates both of the Earl and of the Primate further embittered the dissension between them.3 Godwine's influence was manifestly fast giving way, and an open struggle was becoming imminent. Just at this moment, an act of foreign insolence and brutality which surpassed anything which had hitherto happened brought the whole matter to a crisis.

Marriages of Godgifu Æthelred with Drogo of Mantes and Eustace of Boulogne.

We have seen that Eadward's sister Godgifu—the Goda daughter of of Norman writers—the daughter of Æthelred and Emma, had been married to Drogo, Count of Mantes or of the French Vexin. Their son, Ralph the Timid, was now high in favour at the court of his uncle.4 Drogo had accompanied Duke Robert on his pilgrimage, and, like him, had died on his journey.5 His widow, who must now have been a good deal past her prime,6 had never-

&lt;sup>1</sup> Vita Eadw. 400. "Totius ecclesiæ filiis hanc injuriam pro nisu suo reclamantibus."

&lt;sup>2</sup> Vita Eadw. 401. See vol. i. pp. 543, 573.

&lt;sup>3</sup> Vita Eadw. 400. See Appendix E.

<sup>4</sup> See vol. i. p. 584. <sup>5</sup> Ord. Vit. 487 D, 655 C.

&lt;sup>6</sup> A daughter of Æthelred and Emma must have been thirty-five years old at this time, and she may have been forty-seven. Considering the position held by her son, Godgifu is likely to have been approaching the more advanced age of the two.

found a second French husband in Eustace, Count GRAP. VII. dogne. This prince, whom English history sets us only in the darkest colours, was fated by a e destiny to be the father of one of the noblest of Christendom, of Godfrey, Duke of Lotharingia ing of Jerusalem. We cannot however claim the Crusader as one who had English blood in his veins h either parent. The second marriage of Godgifu ildiess, and the renowned sons of Eustace, Godfrey s brother Baldwin, were the children of his second da. The Count of Boulogne, now brother-in-law Visit of King of the English, presently came, like the Endward. f the world, to the English Court. The exact September, of his coming is not recorded, but we are told vhatever he came for he got. Some new favours loubtless won for foreign followers, and some share wealth of England for himself. It was now Sepr, and the King, as seems to have been his custom, ending the autumn at Gloucester.2 Thither then Count Eustace, and, after his satisfactory interview he King, he turned his face homewards. We have Return of count of his journey till he reached Canterbury; 8 Eustaco. he halted, refreshed himself and his men, and rode rards Dover. Perhaps, in a land so specially devoted dwine, he felt himself to be still more thoroughly enemy's country than in other parts of England. l events, when they were still a few miles from , the Count and all his company took the pren of putting on their coats of mail. They entered Malme, ii. 199. "Collocutus cum co, et re impeirată quam " This perhaps comes from Chron. Petrib. 1048; "And space will t beet he ba wolde."

onn. Wig. 1052, Petrib. 1048. See vol. i. p. 588.

eserve an examination of the authorities for this parrative for endix. See Note L. I here refer to the Chronicles only for details. on. Petrib. 1048. "Da he was sume mila offic mare beheonan Outrages of Eustace and his party at Dover.

ers resist,

CHAP. VII. the town: accustomed to the unbridled licence of their own land, puffed up no doubt by the favourable reception which they had met with at the King's Court, they deemed that the goods and lives of Englishmen were at their mercy. Who was the villain or the burgher who could dare to refuse ought to a sovereign prince, the friend and brother-in-law of the Emperor of Britain? Men born on English soil, accustomed to the protection 1020-1051. of English Law, men who for one and thirty years 1 had lived under the rule of Godwine, looked on matters in quite another light. The Frenchmen expected to find free quarters in the town of Dover, and they attempted to lodge themselves at their pleasure in the houses of There was one Englishman especially the burghers. his name unluckily is not preserved—into whose house a Frenchman was bent on forcing himself against the The burgh- owner's will. The master of the house resisted; the stranger drew his weapon and wounded him; the Englishman struck the intruder dead on the spot.<sup>2</sup> Count

> Dofran, be dyde he on his byrnan, and his geferen calle, and foran to Dofran."

> Eustace mounted his horse as if for battle; 3 his followers

- <sup>1</sup> Thirty-one, reckoning from Godwine's appointment as Earl of the West-Saxons in 1020. See vol. i. p. 469. If Godwine really became Earl of Kent in 1017 or 1018 (see vol. i. p. 451) two or three years more must be added.
- <sup>2</sup> Chron. Petrib. "pa com an his manna, and wolde wician æt anes bundan huse, his unbances, and gewundode bone husbundon, and se husbunda ofsloh bone offerne." So Will. Malms. ii. 199; "Unus antecursorum ejus ferocitis cum cive agens, et vulnere magis quam prece hospitium exigens, illum in sui excidium invitavit." I do not know why Mr. Hardy says that William implies that all this happened at Canterbury. Surely "per Doroberniam" means Dover.
- <sup>2</sup> Chron. Petrib. "Da weard Eustatius uppon his horse, and his gefeoran uppon heora, and ferdon to bam husbundon, and ofslogon hine binnan his agenan heoroæ." It shows how impossible it seemed to a French noble of that age to strike a blow except on horseback, that Eustace and his companions mounted their horses at such a moment as this, when one would have thought that horses were distinctly in the way.

ed theirs, the stout-hearted Englishman was slain caar. vu. his own house. The Count's party then rode h the town, cutting about them and slaying at e. But the neighbours of the murdered man had ome together; the burghers resisted valiantly; a sh began; twenty Englishmen were slain, and nine-and drive renchmen, besides many who were wounded. Count out of the e and the remnant of his party made their way out town. town, and hastened back to King Eadward at Glou-

They there told the story after their own fashion, Eustace ng of course all the blame upon the insolent burghers men of er. 1 It is not hard to throw oneself into the position Dover to the King. accusers. To chivalrous Frenchmen the act of the h burgher in defending his house against a forcible would seem something quite beyond their underngs. To their notions the appeal to right and law ch Englishmen were familiar, would seem, on the f men of inferior rank, something almost out of urse of nature. We often see the same sort of now-a-days in men whom a long course of milisbits, a life spent in the alternation of blind obedind arbitrary command, has made incapable of underng those notions of right and justice which seem ly plain to men who are accustomed to acknowledge ster but the Law.* The crime of Eustace was a dark ut we may be inclined to pass a heavier judgement n the crime of the English King, who, on the mere tion of the stranger, condemned his own subjects t a hearing. When Eustace had told his tale, the

on. Petrib. 1048. "Forban Eustatius hæfde geoydd bam cynge swa." So Will. Malms. "Inde ad curiam pedem referens, ne secretum, suse partis patronus assistens, iram Regis in Anglos od. vži. 104. Επεστι γάρ σφι δεσπότης νόμος, τον υποδειμαίνουσι re partar h of sot ser noisuse you tá ar dusires diadyy.

Eadward commands Godwine to inflict military chastisement on the town.

CHAP. VII. King became very wroth with the burghers of Dover,1 and this time he thought that he had not only the will but the power to hurt.2 He sent for Godwine, as Earl of the district in which the offending town lay. The English champion was then in the midst of a domestic rejoicing. He had, like the King, been strengthening himself by a foreign alliance, and had just connected his house with that of a sovereign prince. Tostig, the third son of Godwine, had just married Judith, the daughter or near kinswoman of Baldwin of Flanders.3 Such a marriage could hardly have been contracted without a political object. An alliance with a prince reigning in the debateable land between France and Germany, a land which, though its princes were rapidly becoming French, had by no means wholly lost its Teutonic character, was quite in harmony with the Lotharingian connexion so steadily maintained by Godwine and Harold. At the same time, an alliance with a prince who had been so lately in arms against England may not have tended to increase Godwine's favour with the King. The Earl left the marriagefeast of his son, and hastened to the King at Gloucester. Eadward then told him what insults had been offered within his Earldom to a sovereign allied to himself by friendship and marriage. Let Godwine go, and subject the offending town to all the severity of military chastisement.4 Godwine had once before been sent on the like

&lt;sup>1</sup> Chron. Petrib. 1048. "And weard se cyng swybe gram wid ba <sup>3</sup> See above, p. 26. burhware."

<sup>3 &</sup>quot;Baldwines mage" says the Worcester Chronicler; Florence (1051) alters this into "filia." The Biographer of Eadward, p. 404, says "soror," making her Eadward's niece, which is hard to understand. It is from this passage that we learn that all this happened just at the very time of Tostig's marriage; "Acciderant heec in ipsis nuptiis filii sui ducis Tostini." The title of "Dux" is premature.

<sup>4</sup> Chron. Petrib. "And ofsænde se cyng Godwine eorl, and bæd hine faran into Cent mid unfrida to Dofran." The full force of the word "unfrioa" may be understood by its being so constantly applied to the

ed in the days of Harthacnut. He had then not CHAP. VII. d to refuse, though he had done what he could to Compariten the infliction of a harsh and unjust sentence. And, tween the all, the two cases were not alike. In the case of Worcester cester, Godwine was required to act as a military that mander against a town which was not within his and Dover rnment, and whose citizens stood in no special relation ward. im. The citizens of Worcester too had been guilty real crime. Their crime was indeed one which might ly have been pardoned, and the punishment decreed out of all proportion to the offence. Still the death ne two Housecarls fairly called for some atonement, gh certainly not for an atonement of the kind comded by Harthacnut. At that time too it was prosound policy in Godwine to undertake the comion in which he was joined with the other great Earls ingland, and merely to do his best to lighten its rity in act. But in the present case all the circumces were different. Dover was a town in Godwine's Earldom; it would almost seem that it was a town coned with him by a special tie, a town whose burghers ed a part of his personal following.<sup>3</sup> At all events it h armies and fleets. See vol. i. p. 327. So William of Malmesbury 99) ; "Quamvis Rex jussisset illum continuò cum exercitu in Cantiam isci, in Dorobernenses graviter ulturum."

ee vol. i. p. 580.

bron. Petrib. "And so corl nolde ha geowerian bere infare; forim was lab to amyrrene his agene folgab." One might be tempted lieve that this last word implied some special connexion between ine and Dover, were it not that we directly after read, "on Swegenes folgode," where it can hardly mean more than that the place was n his jurisdiction as Earl. The very first entry in Domesday repre-Godwine as receiving a third of the royal revenues in Dover, but this f course simply his regular revenue as Earl. The relations of the townsto the Crown are rather minutely described. They held their priviby providing twenty ships yearly for fifteen days; each had a crew enty-one men. There is not a word to show that the demands of ce and his followers were other than utterly illegal.

Godwine refuses to obey the

King's

orders.

CHAP. VII. was a town over which he exercised the powers of the . highest civil magistracy, where, if it was his duty to punish the guilty, it was equally his duty to defend and shelter the innocent. Such a town he was now bidden, without the least legal proof of any offence, to visit with all the horrors of fire and sword. Godwine was not long in choosing his course. Official duty and public policy, no less than abstract justice and humanity, dictated a distinct refusal. Now or never a stand was to be made against the strangers. Now that Englishmen had been insulted and murdered by the King's foreign favourites, the time was indeed come to put an end to a system under which those favourites were beginning to deal with England as with a conquered country. The eloquent voice of the great Earl was raised, in the presence of the King, probably in the presence of Eustace and the other strangers, in the cause of truth and justice.1 In England, he told them, there was a Law supreme over all, and courts in which justice could be denied to no man. Count Eustace had brought a charge against the men of Dover. They had, as he alleged, broken the King's peace, and done personal wrong to himself and his companions. Let then the magistrates of the town be summoned before the King and his Witan,

He demands a legal trial for the burghers.

> <sup>1</sup> I get my speech from William of Malmesbury (ii. 119), whose account is very clear and full, and thoroughly favourable to Godwine. "Intellexit vir acrioris ingenii, unius tantum partis auditis allegationibus, non debere proferri sententiam. Itaque . . . restitit, et quòd omnes alienigenas apud Regis gratiam invalescere invideret, et quod compatriotis amicitiam præstare vellet. Præterea videbatur ejus responsio in rectitudinem propensior, ut magnates illius castelli blandè in curia Regis de seditione convenirentur; si se possent explacitare, illæsi abirent; si nequirent, pecunis vel corporum suorum dispendio, Regi cujus pacem infregerant, et Comiti quem læserant, satisfacerent: iniquum videri ut quos tutari debeas, eos ipse potissimum inauditos adjudices." Here are the words which either tradition put into the mouth of Godwine, or else which a hostile historian deliberately conceived as most in keeping with his character. Who would recognize in this assertor of the purest principles of right the object of the savage invectives of William of Poitiers?

here be heard in their own defence and in that of char. VII. fellow-burghers. If they could make a good excuse eir conduct, let them depart unhurt; if they could ved to have sinned against the King or against the , let them pay for their fault with their purses or heir persons. He, as Earl of the West-Saxons, was tural protector of the men of Dover; he would never to any sentence pronounced against them without trial, nor would be consent to the infliction of ort of illegal hardship upon those whom he was to defend. The Earl then went his way; he had his own duty; he was accustomed to these mory ebullitions of wrath on the part of his royal -law, and he expected that the affair would soon be ten.1

there were influences about Eadward which cut off pe of any such peaceful settlement of the matter. e probably still lingered about the King, to repeat n story, to enlarge on the insolence of the men of , and on the disobedience—he would call it the n-of the West-Saxon Earl himself. And there Archbishop nother voice ever at the royal ear, ever ready to Robert the the royal mind against the English people and King leader. The foreign monk who sat on the throne Godwine. many English saints again seized the opportunity to the calumnies of past times. He once more imd upon the King that the man who refused to obey ders, the man who had protected, perhaps excited, ous burghers against his dearest friends, was also an who had, years before, betrayed his brother to a of torment.2 The old and the new charges worked revival of the story about Ælfred and the special part played by CHAP. VII. together on the King's mind, and he summoned a Meeting summoned ter to hear charges against Godwine.

<sup>1.</sup> Malms. ii. 199. "Ita tune discessum, Godwine parvi pendente gorem quasi momentaneum." On these oscasional fits of wrath on of Eadward, see above, p. 23.

Richard's Castle in Herefordshire.

The Witan of the Witan at Gloucester, to sit in judgement, no longer to Glouces on the men of Dover, who seem by this time to have been forgotten, but on Godwine himself.1 The Earl now saw that he must be prepared for all risks. And, just at this moment, another instance of the insolence and violence of the foreigners in another part of the Kingdom served Building of to stir up men's minds to the highest pitch. Among the Frenchmen who flocked to the land of promise was one named Richard the son of Scrob, who had received a grant of lands in Herefordshire. He and his son Osbern had there built a castle on a spot which, by a singularly lasting tradition, preserves to this day the memory of himself and his building.2 The fortress itself has vanished, but its site is still to be marked, and the name of Richard's Castle, still borne by the parish in which it stood, is an abiding witness of the deep impression which its erection made on the minds of the men of those times. The building of castles is something of which the English writers of this age frequently speak, and speak always with a special kind of horror.3 Both the name and the Import of the building of castles.

> Archbishop Robert comes from the Biographer of Eadward. I shall discuss this point in Appendix L.

> <sup>1</sup> The summoning of the Witan is distinctly set forth in the Peterborough Chronicle; "Da sende se cyng æftre eallon his witan, and bead heom cuman to Gleaweceastre neh bære æfter Sca Maria mæssan." The charge against Godwine comes from the Life of Eadward, p. 401; "Ergò perturbato Rege de talibus plus justo, convenerunt de tota Britannia [did any Scottish or Welsh princes appear !] quique potentes et duces Glaucestræ regio palatio, ubique in eo querimoniam talium habente, perlata est in insontem Ducem tanti criminis accusatio."

> <sup>2</sup> Richard, the son of Scrob or Scrupe, and son-in-law of Robert the Deacon (Flor. Wig. 1052), appears in Domesday, 186 b. His son Osbern, of whom we shall hear again, appears repeatedly in Domesday as a great landowner in Herefordshire and elsewhere. See 176 b. 180. 186 b, 260.

> See the entries in the Chronicles, Wig. 1066, Petrib. 1087, 1137. In all these passages the building of castles is reckoned among the chief grievances of the reign of the Conqueror and of the anarchy of the time thing were new. To fortify a town, to build a citadel to CHAP. VII. protect a town, were processes with which England had long been familiar.1 To contribute to such necessary public works was one of the three immemorial obligations from which no Englishman could free himself.2 But for a private landowner to raise a private fortress to be the terror of his neighbours was something to which Englishmen had hitherto been unaccustomed, and for such a structure the English language had hitherto contained no name. But now the tall, square, massive donjon of the Normans, a building whose grandest type is to be seen in the Conqueror's own Tower of London and in the more enriched keep of Rochester, began, doubtless on a far humbler scale, to rear itself over the dwellings of Englishmen. Normandy had, during the minority of William, been covered with such buildings, and his wise policy had levelled many of them with the ground.3 Such buildings, of Stephen. Compare Giraldus' description of Ireland, after the invasions in the time of Henry the Second. (Exp. Hib. ii. 34. vol. v. p. 865 Dimock); "Insula Hibernica, de mari usque ad mare, ex toto subacta et incastellata." Cf. ii. 38, 39.

&lt;sup>1</sup> On the different developements of fortification in England, see vol. i. pp. 64, 338. The Norman castle makes the **fth* stage.

&lt;sup>2</sup> See vol. i. pp. 99-101.

&lt;sup>2</sup> I shall have to speak of this destruction of castles in Normandy when I come to deal with the reign of William in that country. This is the real cause why Normandy contains so few castles earlier than the twelfth century. I can see no reason whatever to believe that the castles of the eleventh century, either in Normandy or in England, were commonly of wood. The temporary wooden towers which were often used in the military art of the time, and which sometimes are called castles, are also sometimes pointedly distinguished from the permanent stone fortresses. Thus in the Angevin Chronicle in Labbé, i. 286, 287, we read how in 1025 Count Odo of Chartres (see vol. i. p. 509, and in the next chapter) besieged the castle which Fulk of Anjou had built as an ἐπιτειχισμός against Tours (contra civitatem Turonicam firmaverat), and "turrem ligneam miræ altitudinis super domgionem ipsius castri erexit." The donjon itself was surely of stone. We shall find other evidence of the same kind in the next Chapter. Stone was also fast coming into use for domestic as well as for military and ecclesiastical buildings. Avesgaud, Bishop of Le Mans, CHAP. VII. strange to English eyes, bore no English name, but retained their French designation of castles. Such a castle at once became a centre of all kinds of oppression. Men were harboured in it, and deeds were done within its impregnable walls, such as could find no place in the open hall of the ancient English Theon. So it was with the castle which was now raised within the government of the eldest son of Godwine. The Welshmen, as they are called -that is, not Britons, but Frenchmen, Gal-Welsh, not Bret-Welsh-built their castle, and "wrought all the harm and besmear"—an expressive word which has dropped out of the language-"to the King's men thereabouts that they might."2 Here then was another wrong, a wrong perhaps hardly second to the wrong which had been done at Dover. Alike in Kent and in Herefordshire men had felt the sort of treatment which they were to expect if the King's foreign favourites were to be any longer tolerated. The time was now come for Englishmen to make a stand.

rebuilt in stone both the episcopal palace and also a hospital; before him they had been of wood—"que antea ligness fuerat, petrinas...constituit." Gest. Ep. Cenom. ap. Mabillon, Vetera Analecta, iii. 300*.

! The word "castel" evidently appears at this stage to denote some new thing, quite distinct from the familiar "burh" of earlier times. So Orderic (511 C), in speaking of the rarity of castles in England before the Norman Conquest, speaks of the name as something specially French; "Munitiones (quas castella Galli nuncupant) Anglicis provinciis paucissimse fuerant." He adds, "ob hoc Angli, licet bellicosi fuerint et audaces, ad resistendum tamen iminicis exstiterant debiliores."

<sup>2</sup> Chron. Petrib. 1048. "ha hæfdon ha Wellsce menn gewroht ænne castel on Herefordscire on Swegenes eorles folgote, and wrohton æle hæra harme and bismere hæs cynges mannan hær abutan he hi mihton." These Welshmen are undoubtedly Frenchmen (see Earle, p. 345. Lingard, i. 337. Lappenberg, 508); Britons did not build castles, nor were they on such terms of friendly intercourse with King Eadward. William of Malmesbury's misconception of the whole passage (ii. 199) is amusing; "ut Walenses compescerent qui, tyrannidem in Regem meditantes, oppidum in pago Herefordensi obfirmaverant, ubi tune Swanus, unus ex filiis Godwini, militiæ prætendebat excubias." This last is simply a misunderstanding of the words "on Swegenes eorles folgote," which seems merely to mean "within Swegen's government."

Earl of the West-Saxons was not a man to be CHAP. VII. to his country at such a moment. He, with his Godwine egen and Harold, gathered together the force of sons most ree Earldoms at Beverstone in Gloucestershire. stone with a point on the Cotswolds, not far from the Abbey their Earlnesbury, still marked by a castle of far later date, <sup>doma</sup>. aining fragments of which form one of the most ble antiquities of the district. At this time it o have been a royal possession, and it may not have contained a royal house, which would proe at the disposal of Swegen as Earl of the shire.1 erstone then assembled the men of Wessex, of Eastand of that part of Mercia which was under the ion of Swegen. They came, it would seem, ready or debate or for battle, as might happen. We must un remember what the ancient constitution of our l Assemblies really was. If all actually came who rict right to come, the Gemot was a ready-made On the other hand we have seen that an army, d together as an army, sometimes took on itself ctions of a Gemot.2 Meanwhile, while Godwine The forces ed his men at Beverstone, the forces of the Earl-Leofric, f Siward, Leofric, and Ralph were assembling and Ralph he King at Gloucester. Each of the two gatherings Gloucester. pass for the local Witenagemot of one half of Eng-At the head of the men of three Earldoms Godas still bolder than when he had stood alone in the resence. He had then only refused to punish the stone appears in Domesday (163) only as an appendage to the ship of Berkeley, and is not mentioned as a possession of Godwine. one would have expected to find one of the Earl's many houses the place of meeting. But perhaps the suggestion in the text in matters.

i

other hand the mysterious connexion between Godwine and (see Appendix E) must not be forgotten. bove, p. 104.

CHAP. VII. innocent; he now demanded the punishment of the guilty.

His first steps however were conciliatory. He first demanded an audience for himself and his sons, as Earls of the three Earldoms; they were ready and anxious to take counsel with the King and his Witan on all matters touching the honour of the King and his people. He even offered to renew his compurgation on the old charge Godwine's of the death of Ælfred. But the Frenchmen swarmed offers to the King re- around the King; they filled his ears with the usual fused sharpers against Godwine and his sons; they assumed him

Godwine's offers to the King refused through the influence of Frenchmen.

Godwine demands the surrender of Eustace and the around the King; they filled his ears with the usual charges against Godwine and his sons; they assured him that the only object of the Earls was to betray him.<sup>3</sup> Eadward therefore refused the audience, and declined to receive the compurgation.<sup>4</sup> Godwine then took a higher tone; messages were sent in his name and in the name of the men of the three Earldoms, demanding the surrender of Eustace and his men and of the Frenchmen at Richard's Castle.<sup>6</sup> The demand was a bold one; Godwine asked for

- ¹ Chron. Petrib. 1048. "Da com Godwine eorl and Swegen eorl and Harold eorl togædere æt Byferesstane and manig mann mid heom, to oon bæt hi woldon faran to heora cyne-hlaforde, and to bam witan eallon be mid him gegaderode wæron, bæt hi bæs cynges ræd hæfdon, and his fultum, and ealra-witena, hu hi mihton bæs cynges bismer awrecan and ealles beodscipes."
- <sup>2</sup> Vita Eadw. 401. "Quod ubi per quosdam fideles comperit [Godwinus], missis legatis, pacem Regis petivit, legem purgandi se de objecto crimine frustra prætulit."
- <sup>3</sup> Chron. Petrib. "Da wæron þa Wælisce menn ætforan mid þam cynge, and forwregdon þa eorlas þæt hi ne moston cuman on his eagon gesihte, forðan hi sædon þæt hi woldon cuman þider for þes cynges swicdome."
- Vita Eadw. p. 401. "Nam adec super hujus sceleris fide animum Rex induxerat ut nec verbum aliquod oblats purgationis audire posset."
- b Chron. Wig. 1052. "Ealle gearwe to wige ongean bone cyng, buton man ageafe Eustatsius and his men heom to handsceofe, and eac ba Frencyscan be on ban castelle weron." "The castle" undoubtedly means Richard's Castle, as it must mean in the entry of the next year in the same Chronicle. The Frenchmen in the castle are distinguished from Eustace and his men. So Lappenberg, 508. Florence (1051) clearly misunderstood the passage when he translated it "insuper et Nortmannos et Bononienses qui castellum in Doruvernise clivo tenuerant." It shows the impression which render of the person of a foreign prince, the King's GHAP. VII. vourite and brother-in-law. But the demand, if other crias perfectly justifiable. The two parties of French-September ad been guilty of outrageous crimes within the tions of Godwine and Swegen respectively. instead of bringing them to justice, was sheltering and even listening to their charges against innocent Their lawful judges, the Earls of the two districts, ady, at the head of the Witan of their Earldoms, to justice which the King had refused. The demand mingly backed by threats of an appeal to that last ent by which unrighteous rulers must be brought son. Godwine and his followers threatened war Eadward, as the later Barons of England threatened ainst John. The King was frightened and per-

He sent to hasten the coming of Siward, Leofric, The Northalph, and bade them bring a force strong enough ern Earls bring their Godwine and his party in check. Seemingly they full forces. first brought or sent only a small body of men; they heard the full state of the case, they hastened King with the whole force of their Earldoms, and d confidence to his timid mind.2 This was the sort asion which was sure to awaken those provincial ies which in that age were often lulled to sleep, but were never completely got rid of. The northern uthern parts of England were again arrayed against s Castle had made on men's mind that it was known generally as stle," and this reference by the Worcester Chronicler to a part of which he has not himself given at length is a strong confirmae truth of the Peterborough narrative.

Wend. iii. 294. "Juraverunt super majus altare, quod, si Rex libertates jam diotas concedere diffugeret, ipsi ei guerram tamdiu et ab ejus fidelitate se subtraberent."

. Wig. 1051. "Ob id autem ad tempus Rex perterritus, et in agno constitutus, quid ageret ignorabat penitus. Sed ubi exercitum Leofrici, Siwardi, et Radulfi adventare comperit, se nullatenus n aliosque requisitos traditurum constanter respondit."

The outlawry of Swegen renewed.

CHAP. VII. terms. Each had been declared to be alike the King's friends; each alike had given hostages to the other; the matters at issue between them were to be fairly discussed in the adjourned Gemot. Instead of this agreement being carried out, Godwine and his sons found themselves dealt with as criminals. The first act of the Assembly, seemingly before Godwine and his sons had appeared at all, was to renew the outlawry of Swegen. 1 No act could Injustice of its renewal. be more unjust. His old crimes could no longer be brought up against him with any fairness. The time when they might have been rightly urged was on the motion for the repeal of his former outlawry.2 But, whether wisely or unwisely, that outlawry had been legally reversed; Swegen had been restored to his Earldom, a restoration which of course implied the absolute pardon of all his former offences. Since that time, we hear of no fresh crime on his part, unless it were a crime to have been a fellow-worker with his father, his brother, and the men of his Earldom, in resistance to the wrongs inflicted by the strangers. To condemn Swegen afresh for his old offences was a flagrant breach of all justice; to condemn him for his late conduct was a breach of justice equally flagrant in another way. Besides this, his condemnation on this last ground would carry with it an equal condemnation of Godwine and Harold. Swegen then was outlawed, and that, as far as we can see, without a hearing; and Godwine and Harold were summoned to appear before the King, seemingly as criminals to receive judgement. Stigand, in whose diocese Godwine was then living, procured some delay; but Archbishop Robert took ad-

Godwine and Harold summoned before the King.

&lt;sup>1</sup> So I infer from the Peterborough Chronicle, 1048; "Da cwæ5 man Swegen eorl titlah, and stefnode man Godwine eorle and Harolde eorle to bon gemote." The Worcester Chronicle puts it a little later, along with the demand for the hostages. <sup>3</sup> See above, p. 108.

Vita Eadw. 402. "Elaborante Stigando . . qui etiam tunc medius ibat, procrastinata est judicii dies, dum Rex su orum uteretur consiliou."

the hill-side which overlooks the fairest and most GHAP. VII. of English valleys.1 The broad Severn wound h the plain beneath them; beyond its sandy flood ange beyond range, the hills which guarded the f the still unconquered Briton: Far away, like a e of another world, opened the deep vale of the Axe,2 the mountain land of Brecheining, where, in rthest distance, the giant Beacons soar, vast and he mightiest natural fortress of the southern Cymry. then some glimpses of days to come may have d the soul of Harold, as he looked forth on the land was, before many years, to ring with his renown, see his name engraved as conqueror on the trophies many battle-fields. They passed by relics of uned antiquity, by fortresses and tombs reared by the of men who had been forgotten before the days of in, some perhaps even before the days of Casar. They by the vast hill-fort of Uleybury, where the Briton id defiance to the Roman invader. They passed by ge mound, the Giants'-Chamber of the dead, covering mains of men whose name and race had passed away, se before even the Briton had fixed himself in the s of the West.<sup>3</sup> Straight in their path rose the s, in that day no doubt tall and slender, of the great er of the city which was their goal, where their King willing captive in the hands of the enemies of his the splendid panegyric of William of Malmesbury on this region Gesta Pontificum (Scriptt, p. Bedam, 161). He especially speaks bundance of the vineyards and the excellence of the wine, which was ir, as seemingly other English wine was, but as good as that of No wine is now grown in the vale of Severa, but there is excellent id parry.

he prospect here spoken of see Sydney Smith's Sketches of Mozal phy, p. 218. * See above, p. 110.

. II.

descriptions of these two semarkable monuments of primeval times, Thurnam and Professor C. C. Babington, see the Archeological, vol. zi. (1854), pp. 315, 328.

ŗ

ï

CHAP. VII. people. And, still far beyond, rose other hills, the heights of Herefordshire and Shropshire, the blue range of Malvern War hindered by the intervention of Leofric.

and the far distant Titterstone, bringing the host as it were into the actual presence of the evil deeds with which the stranger was defiling that levely region. Godwine had kept his watch on the heights of Beverstone, as Thrasyboulos had kept his on the heights of Phyle, and he now came down, with the truest sons of England at his bidding, ready, as need might be, to strive for her freedom either in the debates of the Witan or in the actual storm of battle. But there were now men in the King's train at Gloucester who were not prepared to shed the blood of their countrymen in the cause of strangers. Eadward had now counsellors at his side who had no mind to push personal or provincial jealousy to the extent of treason to their common country. Earl Leofric had obeyed the command of the King, and had brought the force of Mercia to the royal muster at Gloucester. Some jealousies of Godwine may well have rankled in his breast. but love of his country was a stronger feeling still. He was not ready to sacrifice the champion of England to men who had trampled on every rule of English law and of natural right, men who seemed to deem it a crime if Englishmen refused to lie still and be butchered on their He effects hearth-stones. The good old Earl of the Mercians now, as ever,2 stood forth as the representative of peace and compromise between extreme parties. The best men of England were arrayed in one host or the other. It were madness indeed for Englishmen to destroy one another, a compromise, and procures the adjournment of the Gemót.

1 Childe Harold, ii. 84:

"Spirit of Freedom, when on Phyle's brow Thou sat'st with Thrasybulus and his train," &c.

simply to hand over the land to its enemies without defence.8 But, while two armed hosts stood ready for

&lt;sup>3</sup> See vol. i. p. 539.

&lt;sup>3</sup> Chron. Wig. 1052. "pet mycel unred were bet hy togedere comon

there was no room for peaceful debate. Let both CHAP. VII. lepart; let hostages be given on both sides, and let feeting of the Witan stand adjourned, to assemble after a few weeks, in another place. Meanwhile mities on either side should cease, and both sides be held to be in full possession of the King's peace iendship.1 The proposal of Leofric was accepted by parties, and the Gemot was accordingly adjourned, et in London at Michaelmas.

objects of Leofric in this momentary compromise Gemot of undoubtedly honourable and patriotic. But King Beptember ard and his foreign advisers seem to have been de- 29, 1051. ed to make the most of the breathing-space thus them for the damage of the national cause. employed the time in collecting an army still more Eadward ful than that which had surrounded him at Glou-the head He seems to have got together the whole force of an army. rthumberland and Mercia, and to have summoned amediate following of the King, the royal House-and perhaps the King's immediate Thegas, even Godwine's own Earldom.2 The King's quarters probably at his favourite palace of Westminster. ine came, accompanied by a large force of the men Earldom, to his own house in Southwark.3 Several The King's ges passed to and fro between him and the King. Godwine. t soon became clear that, though the King's full and friendship had been assured to Godwine, there to intention in the royal councils of showing him your, or even of treating him with common justice.

n bam twam gefylcum; and leton best hi urum feondum rymdon to nd betwyz us sylfum to mycolum forwyrde." on. Petrib. 1048. "Da gerædden ba witan en æg5er halfe, best wo parties had separated at Gloucester on equal

i. i. p. 435], forbam beer wees masst best rotoste best was on Ænglasaloss yfeles geswae, and goaf so cyng godes grid and his fulne cipe on mgöre bealfe." <sup>2</sup> See Appendiz L.

CHAP. VII. terms. Each had been declared to be alike the King's friends; each alike had given hostages to the other; the

The outlawry of Swegen renewed. Injustice of matters at issue between them were to be fairly discussed in the adjourned Gemot. Instead of this agreement being carried out, Godwine and his sons found themselves dealt with as criminals. The first act of the Assembly, seemingly before Godwine and his sons had appeared at all, was to renew the outlawry of Swegen. 1 No act could its renewal. be more unjust. His old crimes could no longer be brought up against him with any fairness. The time when they might have been rightly urged was on the motion for the repeal of his former outlawry.2 But, whether wisely or unwisely, that outlawry had been legally reversed; Swegen had been restored to his Earldom, a restoration which of course implied the absolute pardon of all his former offences. Since that time, we hear of no fresh crime on his part, unless it were a crime to have been a fellow-worker with his father, his brother, and the men of his Earldom, in resistance to the wrongs inflicted by the strangers. To condemn Swegen afresh for his old offences was a flagrant breach of all justice; to condemn him for his late conduct was a breach of justice equally flagrant in another way. Besides this, his condemnation on this last ground would carry with it an equal condemnation of Godwine and Harold. Swegen then was outlawed, and that, as far as we can see, without a hearing; and Godwine and Harold were summoned to appear before the King, seemingly as criminals to receive judgement. Stigand, in whose diocese Godwine was then living, procured some delay; but Archbishop Robert took ad-

Godwine and Harold summoned before the King.

&lt;sup>1</sup> So I infer from the Peterborough Chronicle, 1048; "Da cwæ5 man Swegen eorl titlah, and stefnode man Godwine eorle and Harolde eorle to bon gemote." The Worcester Chronicle puts it a little later, along with the demand for the hostages. <sup>2</sup> See above, p. 108.

Vita Eadw. 402. "Elaborante Stigando . . qui etiam tunc medius ibat, procrastinata est judicii dies, dum Rex su orum uteretur consiliou."

ge of that very delay, still further to poison the CHAP. VII. 's mind against the Earl. Godwine, after the treatwhich his eldest son had just received, declined to r, unless he received an assurance of the King's r, guaranteed by the placing of special hostages s hands, as pledges for his personal safety during nterview. The King's answer was apparently a nd that the Earls should allow, or perhaps compel, se King's Thegas who had joined them, to go over e King's side.2 The demand was at once obeyed. nis time the tide was clearly turning against Godwine, the force which he had brought with him to Southwas getting smaller and smaller.3 The King again Final sumnoned the Earls to appear, with twelve companions the Earls. We can hardly believe that Stigand was compelled, ver against his will, to announce as a serious message odwine that the King's final resolution was that vine could hope for his peace only when he restored im his brother Ælfred and his companions safe and d.4 It is inconceivable that such words can have ed part of a formal summons, but it is quite possible they may have been uttered in mockery, either by King or by his Norman Archbishop. But whatever Their dethe form of the summons, Godwine and Harold refused mand for a pear, unless they received hostages and a safe-conduct duct is retheir coming and going.5 Without such security

ita Eadw 402.

uch on the whole I take to be the meaning of the very difficult ssions of the two Chroniclers, which I have discussed at length in ndix L.

hron. Wig. 1052. "And his wered wanede mfre be leng be swiffer." ita Eadw. 402. "Eo [Rodberto] agente tandem a Rege prolata est cem hac indimolubilis causes que agebatur diffinitio ; Illum scilicet ge tunc primam posse sperare pacem, ubi ei reddidit vivum suum m cum suis omnibus et que eis viventibus vel interfectis ablata sunt ntegritate corum."

bron. Petrib. "Da geornde se eori eft gribes and giala, best he moste betellan æt ælo þæra þinga þe him man onlede."

ī

CHAP. VII. they could not appear in an Assembly which had sunk into a mere gathering of their enemies. They had obeyed, and would obey, the King in all things consistent with their safety and their honour. But both their safety and their honour would be at stake, if they appeared before such a tribunal without any sort of safeguard, and without their usual retinue as Earls of two great Earldoms.2 The demand was perfectly reasonable.3 Godwine and his son could not be expected to appear, without safeguards of any kind, in such an assembly as that which now surrounded the King. The adjourned Gemót had been summoned for the free and fair discussion of all disputes between two parties, each of which was declared to be in the full enjoyment of the King's peace and friendship. It was now turned into a Court, in which one son of Godwine had been outlawed without a crime or a hearing, in which Godwine himself was summoned to receive judgement on charges on one of which he had been years before solemnly acquitted. The hostages and the safe-conduct were refused. The refusal was announced by Stigand to the Earl as he sat at his evening meal. The Bishop wept; the Earl sprang to his feet, overthrew the table,4 sprang on his horse, and, with his sons, rode for his life all that night.<sup>5</sup> In the morning the King held his Witenagemót,

William of Malmesbury (ii. 199), from whom I get the materials of God-wine's answer, makes them call the Assembly "conventiculum factiosorum."

&lt;sup>3</sup> Will. Malms. u. s. "Si veniant inermes, vite timeri dispendium; si paucos stipatores habeant, glorise fore opprobrium."

&lt;sup>3</sup> Kemble, ii. 231. "They very properly declined, under such circumstances, to appear."

&lt;sup>4</sup> Vita Eadw. p. 402. "Flente nimium episcopo Stigando, qui hujus legationis morens bajulus erat, reppulit d se mensam qua adstabat, equis ascensis, viam ad Bosanham maritimam celeritis tetendit." This little touch, coming from a contemporary and friendly writer, increases our confidence in the story of the Biographer, difficult, as it is, at first sight to reconcile with the Chronicles.

&lt;sup>5</sup> Chron. Wig. 1052. "For 5a on niht awag; and se cyng hæfde þæs on morgen witenagemot."

l by a vote of the King and his whole army, God- GRAP. VIL. e and his sons were declared outlaws, but five days and his e allowed them to get them out of the land.2 By this family e Godwine, Swegen, Tostig, and Gyrth, together with Godwine. tha and Judith, the newly-married wife of Tostig, had Swegen, ched either Bosham or the South-Saxon Thorney.<sup>2</sup> There refuge in ld be little doubt as to the course which they were to Flanders, Baldwines land, was the common refuge e. English exiles, and Godwine and the Flemish Count said to have been bound to one another by the tie many mutual benefits.4 It was at the court of Baldwin t Swegen had taken refuge in his exile, and the Count s the near kinsman, perhaps the father, of Tostig's bride, ose wedding-festivities had been so cruelly interrupted these sudden gatherings of Gemots and armies. For ges then they set sail in a ship laded with as much asure as it would hold. They reached the court of Chron. Wig. 1052. "Se cyng , . . owed hine utlage, and eall here." above, p. 104.

nders in safety; they were honourably received by Count,7 and passed the whole winter with him.8

Chron. Petrib. 1048. "And seeswede bim mann v. nihta grib tit of le to farenne," See vol. i, p. 561.

To "Bosenham," according to the Peterborough Chronicler and the grapher; to "Thornege," according to the Worcester Chronicler and rence. As it is of course the South-Sazon Thorney near Chichester Lappenberg, 509) which is meant, the two accounts no doubt merely r to different stages of the same journey.

Vita Eadw. 404. "Tem pro antique feederationis jure, tum pro mulum ipsius Ducis beneficiorum vicistitudine." One would like to know e of this connexion between Godwine and Baldwin. It is odd, when think of the war of 1049, that the Biographer (p. 403) calls Baldwin tiquum Anglice gentis amicum,"

See above, p. 134.

Ohron, Wig. "Mid swa miclum gersuman swa hi mihton ber meet gelogian to selcum mannum." Of. Florence and the Biopher, 402. "Cum conjuge et liberis et connibus que illius arant ad oum."

"Cum magno honore." Vita Endw. 404.

Chron. Petrib. "And gesohton Baldewines griff, and wanodon bur

Į

CHAP. VII.

Godwine then, with the greater part of his family,1 had found shelter in the quarter where English exiles of that age commonly did find shelter. But two of his sons sought quite another refuge. To seek shelter in Flanders, a land forming the natural point of intercommunication between England, France, and Germany, was the obvious course for one whose first object, as we shall presently see, was to obtain his restoration by peaceful diplomacy. Such were the designs of Godwine, the veteran statesman, the man who never resorted to force till all other means Harold de- had been tried in vain. But Harold, still young, and at all times more vehement in temper than his father, had not yet learned this lesson. His high spirit chafed under his wrongs, and he determined from the first on a forcible return to his country, even, if need be, by the help of termines on resistance.

Estimate of his conduct.

a foreign force. This determination is the least honourable fact recorded in Harold's life. It was indeed no more than was usual with banished men in his age. It is what we have already seen done by Osgod Clapa; it is what we shall presently see done by Ælfgar the son of Leofric; it was in fact the natural resource of every man of those times who found himself outlawed by any sentence, just or unjust. If we judge Harold harshly in this matter, we are in fact doing him the highest honour. So to judge him is in fact instinctively to recognize that he has a right to be tried by a higher standard than the mass of his contemporaries. Judged by such a standard, his conduct must be distinctly condemned; but it should be noticed that, among the various charges, true and false, ealne bone winter." Vita Eadw. 404. "Hiemati sunt à Comite Baldwino in Flandriam."

&lt;sup>1</sup> The younger members of the family, Wulfnoth, Ælfgifu, Gunhild, and Hakon the son of Swegen, are not mentioned. They doubtless accompanied Godwine and are included among the "liberi" of the Biographer.

&lt;sup>2</sup> See above, p. 100.

were brought against Harold, we never find any case vii. se to this, which, according to our ideas, seems est action of his life. In company with his young He deter-Leofwine, he despised the peaceful shelter of mines to , and preferred to betake himself to a land where, from the all others, it would be easy to engage warlike Dance. rers in his cause. The eastern coast of Ireland, he numerous towns peopled by Danish settlers, mirably suited for their purpose. Thither then o brothers determined to make their way, with Harold and ed purpose of raising forces to effect their own go to Bris. and to avenge their father's wrongs. For the tol; growtheir departure they chose Bristol, a town in same of 's Earldom, unknown to fame in the earlier days history, but which was now rising into great, not very honourable, importance. The port on the the frontier stream of Wessex and Western Mercia, e natural mart for a large portion of both those s. Commanding, as it did, the whole navigation Channel to which it gives its name, Bristol was s now, the chief seat of communication between d and the South of Ireland. That is to say, it those days the chief seat of the Irish slave-trade. haven of Bristol Earl Swegen had, for what rold corl and Leofwine," says the Worcester Chronicle; the Bioas "Haroldus et Leofricus." See Appendix F. The Peterborough mentions Harold only.

re are not told, a ship made ready for himself.4

Eadw. 404. "Transfretaverant in Hiberniam, ut, inde adducta opia, patris ulciscerentur injuriam."

ol. i. p. 365. Compare also the passage about Bristol with which f Malmesbury winds up his panegyric on Gloucestershire (Gest. Scriptt. p. Bed. 161). "In eadern valle est vicus celeberrimus nomine in quo est navium portus ab Hibernia et Noregia et namarinis terris venientium receptaculum, ne scilicet genitalibus in forbinata regio peregrinarum opum fraudaretur commercio."

n. Wig. 1052. "Harold corl and Leofwine foran to Brycgstowe, ip be Swegen cori haside him silfum ar gegearcod and gemetaod."

Ealdred sent to overtake them.

CHAP. VII. The two brothers made the best of their way towards Bristol, in order to seize this ship for the purpose of their voyage to Ireland. Perhaps they had, wittingly or unwittingly, allowed their purpose of appealing to arms to become known. This would be the only excuse for an act on the King's part, which, in any other case, would be one of the most monstrous and unprovoked breaches of faith on record. It is not likely that the five days, which had been allowed the outlaws to leave the country, were yet passed. Harold and Leofwine would be sure to make better speed than that. Yet Bishop Ealdred, whose diocese of Worcester then took in the town of Bristol, was sent after them from London with a party to overtake them, if possible, before they got on ship-board. But the Bishop and his company were not zealous on an errand which had at least the appearance of shameless perfidy. They failed to overtake the fugitives; "they could not or they would not," says the Chronicler.1 Harold and Leofwine reached Bristol in safety. They went on board Swegen's ship; stress of weather kept them for a while at the mouth of the Avon, but a favourable wind presently carried them to Ireland.2 They were there favourably received by Dermot or Diarmid Mac Mael-na-mbo, King

They escape, reach Ireland, and are well received by King Diarmid.

of Dublin and Leinster.<sup>3</sup> He was a prince of native Irish

&lt;sup>1</sup> Chron. Wig. 1052. "And se cining sende Ealdred biscop of Lundene mid genge, and sceoldon hine ofridan ser he to scipe come. Ac hi ne milton offe hi noldon." Compare the unwillingness of the Earls under Harthacut to act against Worcester, vol. i. p. 581. According to the Biographer (403), Godwine was also pursued, through the devices of Archbishop Robert.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Chron. Wig. u. s.

* Vita Eadw. 404. "Hiemati sunt à Rege Dermodo in Hiberniam." These words at once explain the whole matter, and give us the true explanation of the otherwise difficult expression in the Peterborough Chronicle, "Harold eorl gewende west to Yrlande, and was beer calne bone winter, on bes canges gribe." Sir Francis Palgrave (Hist. Ang. Sax. 342) takes this King to be Eadward, and says, "Harold crossed to Ireland, and he was so far favoured as to be allowed to remain in that country descent, who had lately obtained possession of the Danish CHAP. VII. district round Dublin, and whose authority seems to have been recognized by the Danes as well as by the Irish.1 In such a state of things it would not be difficult to find bold spirits ready for any adventure, and a King whose position must have been somewhat precarious would doubtless welcome any chance of getting rid of some of them. Diarmid gave Harold and Leofwine as kind a reception at Dublin as the rest of the family had found from Baldwin at Bruges, and they stayed at his court through the whole winter, plotting schemes of vengeance.

1050.

One member only of the family of Godwine still remained The Lady to be disposed of. What had been the position or the sent to the feelings of Eadgyth during the scenes which have been Abbey of just described we have no means of knowing; but she too was doomed to have her share in the misfortunes of her father's house. The English Lady, the daughter of Godwine, could not be allowed to share the honours of royalty, now that all her kinsfolk were driven from the land,2 now that the reign of the Normans was about to set in. The language of one contemporary authority seems almost to under the king's protection. This fact should be noticed, because it seems to show that he was not considered as being out of the king's dominions; or, in other words, that the opposite coast of Ireland was part of Eadward's realm." This is rather slight evidence; even with the further support of a spurious charter (see vol. i. p. 66), to prove that Ireland, or its eastern coast, was part of the English Empire. Lappenberg (510; Mr. Thorpe's version, ii. 250, again does not represent the original) saw that, odd as the expression is, an Irish King must be meant, and now the Life of Eadward puts the matter beyond doubt. The "grib" of Diarmid answers to the "grib" of Baldwin

- <sup>1</sup> Diarmid conquered the Fine-gall or Danish district in 1052, accord ing to the Four Masters (ii. 860) and Dr. Todd (Wars of Gaedhil and Gaill, 291); in 1050, according to the Chronica Scotorum, 280. incidental evidence of the Biographer shows the earlier date to be the right one.
- <sup>2</sup> Will. Malms. ii. 199. "Ne scilicet omnibus suis parentibus patriam suspirantibus sola sterteret in pluma." This odd phrase sounds like a real succe of some contemporary Frenchman.

CHAP. VII. imply an actual divorce, of which Archbishop Robert was of course the main instigator.1 The lawfulness or possibility of divorce in such a case might form a curious subject of speculation for those who are learned in the Eadward consented, perhaps willingly, to Canon Law. the separation; he allowed the Lady to be deprived of all her goods, real and personal; but he interfered at least to save her from personal ignominy. Eadgyth was sent, with no lack of respect or royal attendance,3 to the royal monastery of Wherwell,4 and was there entrusted to the safe keeping of the Abbess. This Abbess was a sister of the King,<sup>5</sup> no doubt one of the daughters of Æthelred by his first wife. One of the widows of the slain and banished Earls, the relict of the traitor Eadric or of the hero Ulfcytel,6 had taken the veil in the holy house of Eadgar and Ælfthryth,7 and she could there confer with her guest on the uncertainty of human happiness and the emptiness of human greatness.

<sup>1</sup> Vita Eadw. 403. See above, p. 47. Florence says "repudiavit."

The Worcester Chronicle, Florence, and the Biographer do not mention the seizure of the Lady's property. The Peterborough Chronicle says, "pa forlet se cyng pa hlæfdian, seo was gehalgod him to cwene, and let niman of hire eall pat heo abte on lande and on golde and on seolfre." So William of Malmesbury; "Omnis regine substantia ad unum nummum emuncta."

Both the Chronicles are quite colourless on this head; it is simply "man gebrohte," "betsehte." So William of Malmesbury. But Florence says "cum una pedissequa ad Hwereweallam eam sine honore misit." In the Life of Eadward (403), on the other hand, we read, "Cum regio honore et imperiali comitatu, mærens tamen perducitur." The narrative, addressed to Eadgyth herself, is here the better authority.

&lt;sup>4</sup> Wherwell, according to all our authorities, except the Biographer. He says Wilton. As he could hardly be mistaken en such a point, and as the evidence for Wherwell seems conclusive, we must set down Wilton as a clerical error.

&lt;sup>5</sup> The Worcester Chronicle, Florence, and the Biographer do not mention the kindred of the Abbess with the King; it is assumed by the Peterborough Chronicle and by William of Malmesbury.

<sup>6</sup> On the daughters of Æthelred see vol. i. pp. 358, 363, 378, 458.

&lt;sup>7</sup> See vol. i. p. 341.

The whole of this history of the fall of Godwine is most CHAP. VII. remarkable; and it is singular that, though it is told General in great detail in three distinct accounts, so much still of the remains which is far from intelligible. The first point story; its which at once strikes us is the strength of Godwine in the Gemót of Gloucester and his weakness in the Gemót of London. Next year indeed we shall see the tide turn yet again; we shall behold Godwine return in triumph with the good will of all England. This is of course no difficulty; it would be no difficulty, even if popular feeling had been thoroughly against Godwine during the former year. Englishmen welcomed Godwine back again, because they had learned what it was to be without him. But the change of Godwine's position during that eventful September of which we have just gone through the history is certainly perplexing. At Beverstone and at Gloucester he appears at the head of the whole force of Wessex, East-Anglia, and part of Mercia. All are zealous in his cause, ready, if need be, to fight in his quarrel against the King himself. He is clearly not without well-wishers even in the ranks of the Northern A compromise is brought about in which Sudden his honour is carefully guarded, and in which his party the power and the King's are studiously put on equal terms. In of Godthe London Gemót, a few weeks later, all is changed. His followers gradually drop away from him; he does not venture to take his place in the Assembly which he had so often swayed at his pleasure; he is dealt with as an accused, almost as a convicted, criminal; he is subjected with impunity to every sort of unjust and irritating treatment; and he is at last driven to flee from the land, without a blow being struck, almost without a voice being raised, in his behalf. Such a falling away is difficult to understand; it is hard to see how Godwine could have given fresh offence to any one in the time between

J

CHAP. VII. the conference at Gloucester and his appearance at Southwark. Norman flatterers and talebearers may have fanned the King's prejudice against him into a still hotter flame; but there is at first sight nothing to account for the deser Position of tion of his own followers. As for the Northern Earls and the Northern Earls.

their followers, they had no ground of jealousy against Godwine in London which they had not equally at Gloucester; and at Gloucester they clearly were not disposed to push matters to extremities. Still it was clearly the number and strength of the following of Siward and Leofric in the London Gemót which decided the day against Godwine. The Earl of the West-Saxons was entrapped. He and his party came as to a peaceful assembly, and they found the King and his foreign followers bent on their destruction, and a powerful military force assembled to crush them. But why did even Siward lend himself to a scheme like this? Why, still more, did Leofric forsake the part, which he had so often and so worthily played, of mediator between extreme parties? Unless we are to suppose, which one would not willingly do, that Leofric was won by the bait of Harold's Earldom for his son, we can only suppose that a mistaken feeling of loyalty hindered him from opposing a project on which he saw that the King was fully bent. It is in his position and that of Siward that the main difficulty lies. When Godwine found himself face to face with all the strength of Northern England, the rest of the story becomes more intelligible. He had come expecting a fair discussion of all the questions at issue. But fair discussion was not to be had amid the clash of the axes of Siward's Danes and of the lances of Ralph's Frenchmen. Godwine had really no choice but to fight or to yield. Had he chosen to fight, the whole force of Wessex and East-Anglia would no doubt soon have been again at his command. But he shrank from a civil war; he saw that it was better policy to bide his time, to yield, even to certain that a revulsion of national feeling would CHAP. WILL n demand his recall. Such a course was doubtless and patriotic; but it was not one which would be the time either acceptable or intelligible to the mass us followers. If he meant to resist, he should doubtless e resisted at once; the hopes of an insurrection always in promptness and energy; every hour of delay only s to the strength of the other side. We can thus erstand how men began to fall off from a chief who, night be said, dared not meet his sovereign either arms or in council. Still, after all, there is something nge in the details of the story. There is something His comuzing in so sudden and so utter a fall, not only from suddenfall. general exaltation of himself and his family, but from proud and threatening position which he had so lately l at Beverstone and Gloucester. It is not wonderful Impression t Godwine's fall from such an unparalleled height tempogreatness made a deep impression on the minds of raries. men of his own age. The Biographer of Esdward, had before likened the children of Godwine to the ers of Paradise, now deems it a fitting occasion to upon his Muse to set forth the sufferings of the ocent, and to compare the outlawed Earl to Susanus, eph, and other ancient victims of alander.2 The plain glish of the Chronicler who is less strongly committed to lwine's cause speaks more directly to the heart; "That ild have seemed wonderful to ilk man that in Eng-I was, if any man ere that had said that so it should be. that ere that he was so upheaven, so that he wielded King and all England, and his sons were Earls and King's darlings, and his daughter to the King wedded l married." He fell from his high estate; but in Vita Eadw. 397. See Appendix F.

Explanation of Godwine's position and conduct.

Vita Eadw, 403. Twenty hexameters are devoted to the comparison. Chron. Wig. 1052. "Put wolds Syncan wunderlie seleum mes be on

J

Was not far distant. Another Gemót of London was soon to repeal the unrighteous vote of its predecessor; the champion of England was to return for a moment to his old honours and his old power, and then to hand them on to a son even more worthy of them than himself.

Complete temporary triumph of the Norman party. October 1051—September 1052.

But for the moment the overthrow of the patriotic leaders was complete. The dominion of the strangers over the mind of the feeble King was fully assured. The Norman Conquest, in short, might now seem to have more than begun. Honours and offices were of course divided among the foreigners and among those Englishmen who had stood on the King's side. Through the banishment of Godwine and his sons three great Earldoms were vacant. No one Earl of the West-Saxons seems to have been appointed. Probably, as in the early days of Cnut, the Imperial Kingdom, or at least its greater portion, was again put under the immediate government of the Crown. The anomalous Earldom of Swegen was dismembered. The King's nephew Ralph seems to have been again invested with the government of its Mercian portions.2 Of the two West-Saxon shires held by Swegen, Berkshire is not mentioned, but Somersetshire was joined with the other western parts of Wessex to form a new government under Odda, a kinsman of the King's.3 His Earldom took in the whole of the ancient Wealheyn, but it is now Cornwall only which is distinguished as Welsh. The policy of Æthelstan 4 had been effectual, and no part of the land of honours among the King's

Partition
friends.
Ralph;

Odda;

Englalande wæs, gif ænig man ær þam sæde þæt hit swa gewurþan sceolde. Forðam þe he wæs ær to þam swyce up ahafen, swyðe he weolde þæs cynges and ealles Englalandes, and his sunan wæron eorlas and þæs cynges dyrlingas, and his dohtor þæm cynge bewedded and beawnod."

&lt;sup>1</sup> See vol. i. pp. 448.

&lt;sup>2</sup> See Appendix G.

&lt;sup>3</sup> See Appendix G.

<sup>4</sup> See vol. i. p. 338.

of the Tamar is now recognized as a foreign land. OHAP. VII. la was a special favourite of the monks, and is spoken s a man of good and clean life, who in the end became onk himself.1 The third Earldom, that of East-Anglia, erto held by Harold, was bestowed on Ælfgar, the son Ælfgar. Leofric,2 of whom we hear for the first time during se commotions. He had himself, it would seem, played rominent part in them, and one would wish to believe t his promotion was the reward of acts of his own, er than of his father's seeming desertion of the patriotic se. Among churchmen, Spearhafoc, who had through- Spearhafoc the summer and autumn held the see of London with- deposed, consecration,4 had now to give up his doubtful posion. The Bishoprick was then given to a Norman and Wilned William, a chaplain of the King's. A man might Bishop of go from the Straits of Dover to the Humber, over London. itish, East-Saxon, and Danish ground, without once, in course of his journey, going out of the spiritual juristion of Norman Prelates. It is due however to Bishop liam to say that he bears a very different character in history from either his Metropolitan Robert or his fel--suffragan Ulf. Banished for a while, he was restored en the patriotic party was in the height of its power istinct witness in his favour, perhaps a witness against English competitor.6 William kept his Bishoprick for Chron. Wig. 1056. "Se was to munece gehaded ar his ende. god and cleme and swife secele." Cf. Chron. Ab. and Fl. Wig, in anno. ence seems to translate "cleme" by "virginitatis custos." He built present church of Dearhurst (see vol. i. p. 387), as an offering for the of his brother Ælfric. See Earle, p. 345.

Chron. Petrib. 1048. Will. Malms. ii. 199. "Comitatus ejus [Haroldi] butus Elgaro, Leofrici filio, viro industrio; quem ille suscipiens tunc t nobiliter, reverso restituit libenter."

The Biographer (401, 2) mentions his coming to Gloucester along with lather and Siward.

Chron, Wig. 1052. Petrib. 1048. Flor. Wig. 1051.

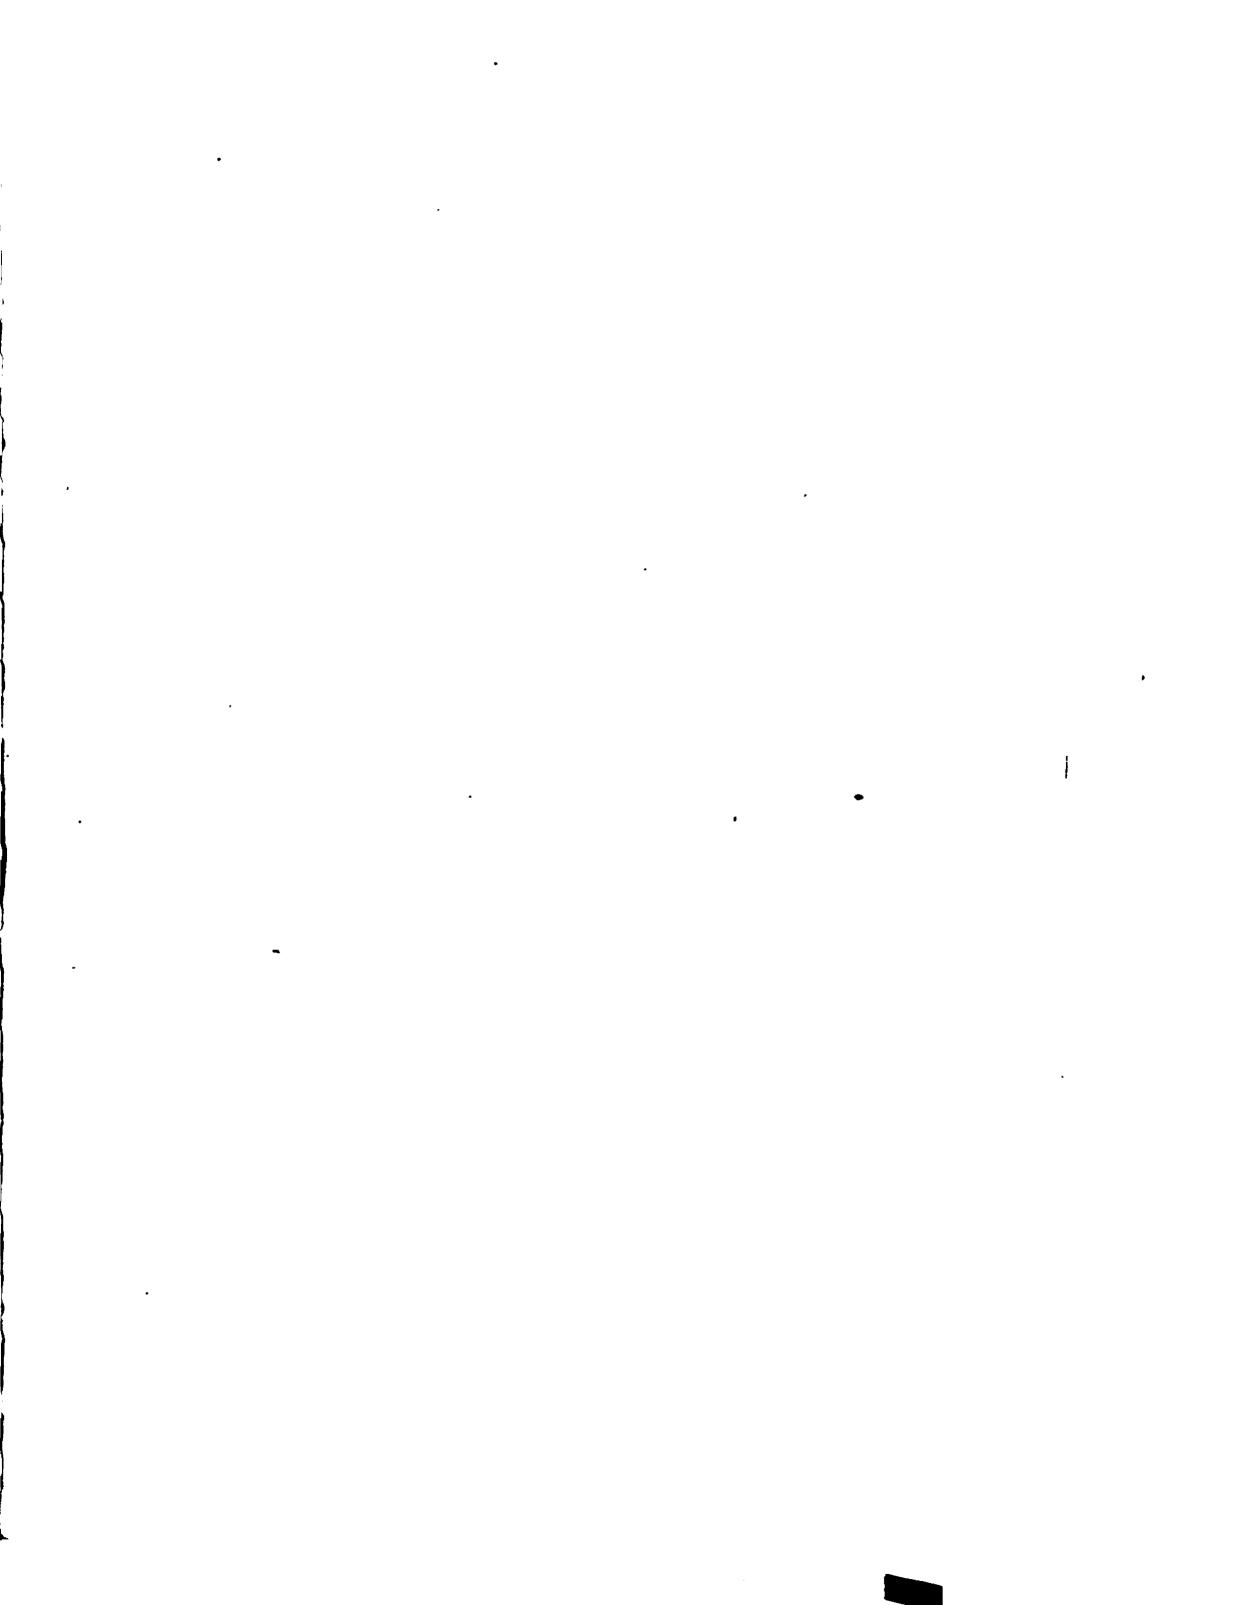

Flor. Wig. 1052.

ЮL. П.

prince to the throne of England. But he had not to wait for so distant an opportunity of displaying his new honours in the eyes of his natural sovereign. While Godwine dwelt Duke William to as an exile at Bruges, while Harold was planning schemes of vengeance in the friendly court of Dublin, William the Bastard first set foot on the shores of England.

We are thus at last brought face to face with the two great actors in our history. Harold has already appeared before us. We have seen him raised at an early age to the highest rank open to a subject; we have seen him, in the cause of his country, deprived of his honours and driven to take refuge in a foreign land. His great rival we have as yet heard of only at a distance; he now comes directly on the field. There can be no doubt that William's visit to England forms a stage, and a most important one, among the immediate causes of the Norman Conquest. I pause then, at this point, to take up the thread of Norman history, and to give a sketch of the birth, the childhood, the early reign, of the man who, in the year of Godwine's banishment, saw, for the first time, the land which, fifteen years later, he was to claim as his own.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Chron. Wig. 1052. Flor. Wig. 1051.

• t . ı • • • ÷ 47

CHAPTER VIII.

THE EARLY YEARS OF WILLIAM THE CONQUEROR, 1 A.D. 1028-1051.

§ 1. Birth, Character, and Accession of William.
A.D. 1028-1035.

VILLIAM, King of the English and Duke of the Character Normans, bears a name which must for ever stand ness of the among the foremost of mankind. No man that ever WILLIAM.

i

In this Chapter I have had of course mainly to depend on the Norman ters as my authorities. The Latin writers are to be found in the great setion of Duchèsae. The first place is of course due to William of tiers. His Gesta Guillelmi has every advantage which can belong to writings of a well-informed contemporary. But the work is disfigured his constant spirit of violent partizanship (see above, p. 4). He must efore be always followed with great caution, and in all purely English ters he is utterly untrustworthy. The beginning of his work is lost, so we have no account from him of his here's birth and childhood. William rulus, a monk of Jumièges, according to Orderic (Prol. ad Lib. iii, p. , abridged Dudo, and continued the History of Normandy, through reigns of Richard the Good, Richard the Third, Robert, and of Hiam himself down to the Battle of Senlac (Ord. Vit. 618 D), preting his work to William himself. This portion of the existing work s at lib. vii. c. 42. He seems afterwards to have added the account of liam's death (vii. 44), in which William of Poitiers and Guy of Amiens spoken of. An eighth book, together with many interpolations in the iar books, were added by a later hand, apparently by Robert of Torigny, oot of Saint Michael's Mount, commonly called Robert de Monte (see ts, v1. 475). William of Jumièges begins to be a contemporary writer Villiam's reign; with perhaps amaller opportunities of information than liam of Poitiers, he is less violently prejudiced, and his work is of great ie. His parrative forms the groundwork of the poetical history in the tan de Rou. Its author, Robert Wace, Canon of Bayeux in the time Ionry the Second, seems to have been a really honest and painstaking mrer, and I do not look on his work as being any the less trustworthy Lasting results of his career. A good side to his character.

CHAP. VIII. trod this earth was ever endowed with greater natural gifts; to no man was it ever granted to accomplish greater things. If we look only to the scale of a man's acts, without regard to their moral character, we must hail in the victor of Val-ès-dunes, of Varaville, and of Senlac, the restorer of Normandy, the Conqueror of England, one who may fairly claim his place in the first rank of the world's greatest men. No man ever did his work more effectually at the moment; no man ever left his work behind him as more truly an abiding possession for all time. And, when we consider all the circumstances of his life, when we judge him by the standard of his own age, above all, when we compare him with those who came after him in his own house, we shall perhaps be inclined to dwell on his great qualities, on his many undoubted virtues, rather than to put his no less undoubted crimes in their darkest light. As we cannot refuse to place him among the greatest of men, neither will a candid judgement incline us to place him among the worst of men. If we cannot give him a niche among pure patriots and heroes, he is quite as little entitled to a place among mere tyrants and destroyers. William of Normandy has no claim to a share in the pure glory of Timoleon, Ælfred, and Washington; he cannot even claim the more mingled fame of Alexander, Charles, > on account of its poetical shape. But of course, whenever he departs from contemporary authority, and merely sets down floating traditions nearly a hundred years after the latest events which he records, his statements need to be very carefully weighed. I have used M. Pluquet's edition (Rouen, 1827) and the English Translation of part of the work by Mr. Edgar Taylor, whose genealogical and topographical notes are of great The other rhyming chronicler, Benoît de Sainte-More, is of a far more romantic turn than Robert Wace, and is therefore of much smaller historical authority. Still he also preserves many curious traditions. Orderic Vital, whose work becomes afterwards of such preeminent importance, is just now beginning to be of use, but as yet his main value is for information about Norman families and Norman monasteries. But his constant repetitions and utter lack of arrangement make him still more difficult to read or consult than William of Malmesbury himself.

and Cnut; but he has even less in common with the CHAP. VIII. mere enemies of their species, with the Nabuchodonosors, the Swends, and the Buonapartes, whom God has from time to time sent as simple scourges of a guilty world. Happily there are few men in history of whom we have better materials for drawing the portrait. We see him English as he appeared to admiring followers of his own race; we and Norman porsee him also as he appeared to men of the conquered nation traits of who had looked on him and had lived in his household.1 We have to make allowance for flattery on the one side; we have not to make allowance for calumny on the other. The feeling with which the Normans looked on their conquering leader was undoubtedly one of awe rather than of love; and the feeling with which the vanquished English looked on their Conqueror was undoubtedly one of awe rather than of simple hatred. Assuredly William's English subjects did not love him; but they felt a sort of sullen reverence for the King who was richer and mightier than all the Kings that were before him. In speaking of him, the Chronicler writes as it were with downcast eyes and bated breath, as if he were hardly dealing with a man of like passions with himself, but was rather drawing the portrait of a being of another nature. Yet he holds the balance Justice fairly between the dark and the bright qualities of one so him by the far raised above the common lot of man. He does not con-English Chronicler. ceal his crimes and his oppressions; but he sets before us the merits of his government and the good peace that he made in this land; he judicially sums up what was good and what was evil in him; he warns men to follow the good and to avoid the evil, and he sends him out of the world with a charitable prayer for the repose of his soul. And, at the moment when he wrote, it was no marvel if <sup>1</sup> Chron. Petrib. 1087. "Gif hwa gewilniged to gewitane hu gedon mann he was, offe hwilche wurdscipe he hæfde, offe hu fela lande he were hlaford, bonne wille we be him awritan swa swa we hine ageaton, be him on locodan and obre hwile on his hirede wunedon."

1

CHAP. VIII. the Chronicler was inclined to dwell on the good rather than on the evil. The Crown of William passed to one who shared largely in his mere intellectual gifts, but who had no fellowship with the greater and nobler elements of his character. To appreciate William the Conqueror we have but to cast our glance onwards to William the Red. We shall then well understand how men writhing under the scorpions of the son might look back with regret to the whips of the father. We can understand how, under his godless rule, men might feel kindly towards the memory of one who never wholly cast away the thoughts of justice and mercy, and who, in his darkest hours, had still somewhat of the fear of God before his eyes.

Strength of will in William.

In estimating the character of William, one feature stands out preeminently above all others. Throughout his career, we admire in him the embodiment, in the highest degree that human nature will allow, of the fixed purpose and the unbending will. From time to time there have been men who seem to have come into the world to sway the course of events at their good pleasure, men who have made destiny itself their vassal, and whose decrees it seems in vain for lesser men to seek to withstand. Such was the man who, with the blood of thousands reeking on his hands, could lay down despotic power, could walk unattended to his house, and calmly offer to give an account for any of his actions; and such in might, though assuredly not such in crime, was our first Norman King. Whatever the will of William decreed, he found a means to bring it about. Whatever his hand found to do, he did it with all his might. As a warrior, as a general, it is needless to sound his praises. His warlike exploits set him among the foremost captains of history, but his warlike exploits are but the smallest part of his fame.

His military genius.

> <sup>1</sup> See the article "Lucius Cornelius Sulla" in the National Review, January, 1862.

Others beside him could have led the charge at Val-ès- CHAP. VIII. dunes; others beside him could have chosen the happy moment for the ambush at Varaville; others beside him could have endured the weariness of the long blockade beneath the donjon of Brionne. Others, it may even be, beside him could have cut their way through palisade and shield-wall and battle-axe to the royal Standard of England. But none in his own age, and few in any age, have shown His statesthemselves like him masters of every branch of the consummate craft of the statesman. Calm and clearsighted, he saw his object before him; he knew when to tarry and when to hasten; he knew when to strike and how to strike, and how to use alike the noblest and the vilest of men as his instruments. Utterly unscrupulous, though His unfar from unprincipled, taking no pleasure in wrong or ness as to oppression for its own sake, always keeping back his means. hands from needless bloodshed, he yet never shrank from force or fraud, from wrong or bloodshed or oppression, when they seemed to him the straightest paths to accomplish his purpose. His crimes admit of no denial; but, with one single exception, they never were wanton crimes. And when we come to see the school in which he was brought up, when we see the men whom he had to deal with from his childhood, our wonder really ought to be that his crimes were not infinitely blacker. His persosonal virtues were throughout life many and great. We hear much of his piety, and we see reason to believe that his piety was something more than the mere conventional piety of lavish gifts to monasteries. Punctual in every His reliexercise of devotion, paying respect and honour of every kind to religion and its ministers, William showed, in two ways most unusual among the princes of that age, that his zeal for holy things was neither hypocrisy, nor fanaticism, nor superstition. Like his illustrious contemporary on the Imperial throne, he appeared as a real eccleJ

* * . .

General excellence siastical appointments.

CHAP. VIII. siastical reformer, and he allowed the precepts of his religion to have a distinct influence on his private life. of his eccle- He was one of the few princes of that age whose hands were perfectly clean from the guilt of simony. His ecclesiastical appointments for the most part do him honour; the patron of Lanfranc and Anselm can never be spoken of without respect. In his personal conduct he practised at least one most unusual virtue; in a profligate age he was a model of conjugal fidelity. He was a good and faithful friend, an affectionate brother—we must perhaps add, too indulgent a father. And strong as was his sense of religion, deep as was his reverence for the Church, openhanded as was his bounty to her ministers, no prince that ever reigned was less disposed to yield to ecclesiastical usurpations. No prince ever knew better how to control the priesthood within his own dominions; none knew better both how to win the voice of Rome to abet his purposes, and how to bid defiance to her demands when they infringed on the rights of his Crown and the laws of his Kingdom. While all Europe rang with the great strife of Pope and Cæsar, England and Normandy remained at peace under the rule of one who knew how, firmly and calmly, to hold his own against Hildebrand himself.

Effects of his reign in Normandy, France, and England.

But to know what William was, no way is so clear as to see what William did in both the countries over which he was so strangely called to rule. We are too apt to look on him simply as the Conqueror of England. But so to do is to look at him only in his most splendid, but at the same time his least honourable, aspect. William learned to become the Conqueror of England only by first becoming the Conqueror of Normandy and the Conqueror of France. He found means to conquer Normandy by the help of France and to conquer France by the help of Normandy. He turned a jealous overlord into an effective ally against his rebellious subjects, and he turned those rebellious subjects into faithful supporters against CHAP. VIII. that jealous overlord. He came to his Duchy under every His early disadvantage. At once bastard and minor, with com- struggles. petitors for his coronet arising at every moment, with turbulent barons to hold in check and envious neighbours to guard against, he was, throughout the whole of his early life, beset by troubles, none of which were of his own making, and he came honourably out of all. The change which William wrought in Normandy was nothing Excellence less than a change from anarchy to good order. Instead of his rule in Norof a state, torn by internal feuds and open to the attacks mandy. of every enemy, his Duchy became, under his youthful rule, a loyal and well-governed land, respected by all its neighbours, and putting most of them to shame by its prosperity. In the face of every obstacle, the mighty genius of the once despised Bastard raised himself and his principality to a place in the eyes of Europe such as Normandy and its prince had never held before. And these great successes were gained with far less of cruelty or harshness than might have been looked for in so ruthless an age. He shared indeed in the fierce passions His geneof his race, and in one or two cases his wrath hurried ral forbearhim, or his policy beguiled him, into acts at which occasional humanity shudders. At all stages of his life, if he was debonair to those who would do his will, he was beyond measure stern to all who withstood it.1 Yet, when we think of all that he went through, of the treachery and . ingratitude which he met with on every side, how his most faithful friends were murdered beside him, how he himself had to flee for his life or to lurk in mean disguises,

&lt;sup>1</sup> Chron. Petrib. 1087. "He was milde þam godum mannum þe God lufedon, and ofer call gemett stearc bam mannum be wifcwædon his willan." The former clause is rather oddly altered in the version of Robert of Gloucester (p. 374);

&quot;To hem but wolde his wylle do, debonere he was and mylde, And to hem but hym wyb seyde strong tyrant and wylde."

If we turn from William Duke of the Normans to CHAP. VIII. We shall see that it is not without reason that his panegyrist praises his general forbearance and clemency. In short, the reign of William as Duke of the Normans was alike prosperous and honourable in the highest degree. Had he never stretched forth his hand to grasp the diadem which was another's, his fame would not have filled the world as now it does, but he would have gone down to his grave as one of the best, as well as one of the greatest, rulers of his time.

His reign in England.

William King of the English, we may indeed mourn that, in a moral sense, the fine gold has become dim, but our admiration for mere greatness, for the highest craft of the statesman and the soldier, will rise higher than No doubt he was highly favoured by fortune; nothing but an extraordinary combination of events could have made the Conquest of England possible. But then it is the true art of statesmanship, the art by which men like William carry the world before them, to know how to grasp every fortunate moment and to take advantage Difficulties of every auspicious turn of events. Doubtless William could never have conquered England except under peculiarly favourable circumstances; but then none but such a man as William could have conquered England under any circumstances at all. He conquered and retained a land far greater than his paternal Duchy, and a land in which he had not a single native partisan. Yet he contrived to put himself forward in the eyes of the world as a legal claimant, and not as an unprovoked invader. We must condemn the fraud, but we cannot help admiring the skill, by which he made men believe that he was the true heir of England, shut out from his inheritance by a perjured usurper. Never was a more subtle web of fallacy woven by the craft of man; never did diplomatic ingenuity more triumphantly obtain its end. He contrived of his undertaking.

Skill displayed in his claim on the English Crown; to make an utterly unjust aggression bear the aspect, not CHAP. VIII. only of righteous, but almost of holy, warfare. The wholesale spoiler of a Christian people contrived to win for himself something very like the position of a Crusader. And, landed on English ground, with no rights but those in his acof his own sword, with no supporters but his own foreign quisition of it; army, he yet contrived to win the English Crown with every circumstance of formal legality. He was elected, crowned, and anointed like his native predecessors, and he swore at the hands of an English Primate to observe the ancient laws of England. By force and by craft, but and in his with the outward pretext of law always put prominently govern. forward, he gradually obtained full possession of the whole ment. land; he deprived the nation one by one of its native leaders, and put in their places men of foreign birth and wholly dependent on himself. No prince ever more richly rewarded those to whom he owed his Crown, but no prince ever took more jealous care that they should never be able to bring his Crown into jeopardy. None but a man like him could have held down both conquerors and conquered, and have made his will the only law for Norman and Englishman alike. His consummate policy guarded against the dangers which he saw rife in every other country; he put the finishing stroke to the work of Ecgberht, and made England the most united Kingdom in Western Christendom. Normans and Englishmen conspired against him, and called the fleets and hosts of Denmark to their help. But William held his own alike against revolters at home and against invaders from abroad. Norman and English rebels were alike crushed; sometimes the Dane was bought off, sometimes he shrank from the firm array with which the land was guarded. All opposition was Severity of quelled by fire and sword; but when it was quelled, whenever and wherever William's rule was quietly accepted, his hand was heavy upon all smaller disturbers of the CHAR VIII. peace of the world. Life, property, female honour, stood indeed but a small chance while the process of Conquest was going on, but, when William's work was fully accomplished, they were safer under him than they had ever been under England's native Kings. As the stern avenger of crime, even the conquered learned to bless him, and to crown his good deeds with a tribute of praise hardly inferior to that which waits on the name of his illustrious rival.1

The worst features of his characout in England.

His false position gradually developed itself, and led him to oppression.

Here then was a career through which none but one of the greatest of mankind could have passed successfully. ter brought But it was a career which brought out into full play all those darker features of his character which found but little room for their developement during his earlier reign in his native Duchy. There is no reason to believe that William came into England with any fixed determination to rule otherwise in England than he had already ruled in Normandy. Cnut can hardly fail to have been his model, and William's earliest days in England were far more promising than the earliest days of Cnut. At no time of his life does William appear as one of those tyrants who actually delight in oppression, to whom the infliction of human suffering is really a source of morbid pleasure. But, if he took no pleasure in the infliction of suffering, it was at least a matter about which he was utterly reckless; he stuck at no injustice which was needed to carry out his purpose. His will was fixed, to win and to keep the Crown of England at all hazards. We may well believe that he would have been well pleased could he have won that Crown without bloodshed. But, rather than not CHAP. VIII. win it, he did not shrink from the guilt of carrying on a desolating war against a people who had never wronged him. We may well believe that, when he swore to govern his new subjects as well as they had been governed by their own Kings, it was his full purpose to keep his oath. That he acted on any settled scheme of uprooting the nationality, the laws, or the language of England is an exploded fable.1 But he could not govern England as he had governed Normandy; he could not govern England as Cnut had governed England; he could not himself be as Cnut, neither could his Normans be as Cnut's Danes. He gradually found that there was no way for him to govern England save by oppressions, exactions, and confiscations, by the bondage or the death of the noblest of the land. He made the discovery, and he shrank not from its practical consequences. A reign which had begun with as good hopes as the reign of a foreign conqueror could begin with gradually changed into one of the most tremendous tyrannies on record. Northumberland was hard to be kept in order, and Northumberland was made a desert. This was the dictate of a relentless policy; but when General William had once set forth on the downward course of the worse evil, he soon showed that he could do wrong when no in his policy commanded it, merely to supply means for his personal gratification. To lay waste Hampshire merely Formato make a hunting-ground was a blacker crime than to hew tion of the lay waste Northumberland to rid himself of a political Forest. He could still be merciful when mercy was not dangerous, but he had now learned to shed innocent blood without remorse, if its shedding seemed to add safety to his throne. The repeated revolts of Eadgar were for-

&lt;sup>1</sup> Chron. Petrib. 1087. "Betwyx ofrum bingum nis na to forgytane bæt gode frið þe he macode on þisan lande, swa þæt án man þe himsylf aht wære mihte faran ofer his rice mid his bosum full goldes ungederad." This last is of course the same traditional formula which is used to set forth the good government of Eadwine, Ælfred, and others. The writer carries out the panegyric on William's strict police at some length. All this is of course praise of exactly the same kind as that bestowed on Godwine and Harold. See above, pp. 34, 40, and the passages there referred to.

&lt;sup>1</sup> I conceive that this idea owes its prevalence mainly to the false Ingulf; still we have to account for the notion presenting itself to the mind of the forger.

1

;

1

Death of Waltheof.

misfortunes of his last years.

CHAP. VIII. given as often as they occurred; but Waltheof, caressed, flattered, promoted, was sent to the scaffold on the first convenient pretext. It is hardly superstitious to point out, alike with ancient and with modern authorities,1 that the New Forest became a spot fatal to William's house, and that, after the death of Waltheof, his old prosperity Crimes and forsook him. Nothing indeed occurred to loosen his hold on England; but his last years were spent in bickerings with his unworthy son, and in a petty border warfare, in which the Conqueror had, for the first time, to undergo defeat. At last he found his death-wound in an inglorious quarrel, in the personal commission of cruelties which aroused the indignation of his own age; and the mighty King and Conqueror, forsaken by his servants and children, had to owe his funeral rites to the voluntary charity of a loyal vassal, and within the walls of his own minster

William's surnames: the Great, the Conqueror, the Bastard.

Such was William the Great, a title which, in the mouths of his contemporaries, he shared with Alexander and with Charles, but which in later times has been displaced by the misunderstood description of Conqueror.2 But, before he had won any right to either of those lofty titles, William was already known by another surname drawn from the circumstances of his birth. Of all princely lines the ducal house of Normandy was that which paid least regard to the canonical laws of marriage or to the legitimacy. special claims of legitimate birth.3 The Duchy had been the Norman Dukes as to marriage and he could not find an undisputed grave.

Laxity of

&lt;sup>1</sup> See Palgrave, iii. 522.

&lt;sup>2</sup> On the surnames of William, see Appendix M.

<sup>2</sup> Rod. Glab. iv. 6. "Fuit enim usui a primo adventu ipsius gentis in Gallias, ut superitis pernotavimus, ex hujusmodi concubinarum commixtione illorum Principes exstitisse." He goes on, if not to justify, at least to palliate, the practice, by the examples of the patriarch Jacob and the Emperor Constantius. British patriotism would perhaps not have endured that the mother of Constantine should be dragged down to the level of the mother of William.

ruled by a whole succession of princes who either were CHAP. VIII. sprung from that irregular kind of union which was known as the Danish marriage,1 or else were the sons of concubines raised to the rank of wives after the birth of their But, among all this brood of spurious or irregular heirs, the greatest of the whole line was the one to whom the reproach, if reproach it was deemed, of illegitimate birth clave the most abidingly. William Special the son of Robert was emphatically William the Bastard, illegitiand the name clave to him through life, on the Im-William. perial throne of Britain no less than on the ducal chair of Normandy. For, of all the whole line, William was the one whose bastardy was the most undoubted, the least capable of being veiled under ambiguous and euphemistic phrases. The position of Popa and Sprota was a doubtful one; 2 it may, according to Danish ideas, have been perfectly honourable. The children of Richard and Gunnor were, according to the law recognized everywhere but in our own country, legitimated by the subsequent marriage of their parents. But we may doubt whether the notion of the Danish marriage survived as late as the days of Robert, and it is certain that no ecclesiastical sacrament ever gave William a right, according to the law of the Church, to rank as the lawful son of his father. The mother of William is never spoken of in the respectful terms which we find applied to the mother of Richard the Fearless. Throughout the whole of Duke Robert's life, she remained in the position of an acknowledged mistress, and her illustrious son came forth before the world with no other description than the Bastard.

The irregular birth of one so renowned naturally became Story of William's the subject of romance and legend. And the spot on birth. which William first saw the light is one which seems to associa-

&lt;sup>1</sup> See vol. i. p. 203.

&lt;sup>2</sup> See vol. i. p. 232.

Falaise.

Castle.

1453.

1175.

CHAP. VIII. call for the tribute of the legend-maker as its natural due. Position of The town of Falaise, in the Diocese of Seez, is one of the most famous spots both in the earlier and in the later history of Normandy, and none assuredly surpasses it in the striking character of its natural position. Lying on the edge of the great forest of Gouffer, the spot had its natural attractions for a line of princes renowned, even above others of their time, for their devotion to the sports of the field. The town itself lies in a sort of valley between two eminences. The great Abbey, a foundation of a later date than the times which we are concerned with, has utterly vanished; but two stately parish churches, one of them dating from the days of Norman independence, bear witness to the ecclesiastical splendour of the place. Passing by them, the traveller gradually ascends to the gate of Historical tions of the the Castle, renowned alike in the wars of the twelfth, the fifteenth, and the sixteenth centuries. A tall round tower still bears the name of the great Talbot, the guardian of 1417-1450 the castle in the great English war, and who afterwards won a still higher fame as the last champion of the ancient freedom of Aquitaine against the encroachments of the Kings of Paris. But this witness of comparatively recent strife is but an excrescence on the original structure. It is the addition made by an English King to one of the noblest works of his Norman forefathers. The Castle where legend fixes the birth of William of Normandy, and where history fixes the famous homage of William of Scotland, is a vast donjon of the eleventh or twelfth century.2 One of

<sup>1</sup> For the sieges of Falaise in 1417 and 1450, see Monstrelet, i. 263 and iii. 30 b (ed. Paris 1595). Talbot was not actually present during the defence against the French King.

&lt;sup>2</sup> More probably, I think, of the twelfth than of the eleventh. Not that I at all think the building of such a castle to have been impossible in the eleventh century, but because it seems likely that Falaise was one of the castles which were destroyed and rebuilt in the wars of William and his successors. This point is well put by M. Ruprich-Robert, the architect the grandest of those massive square keeps which I have CHAP. VIII. already spoken of as distinguishing the earliest military architecture of Normandy, crowns the summit of a precipitous rock, fronted by another mass of rock wilder still, on which the cannon of England were planted during Henry's siege. To these rocks, these felsen, the spot owes The rocks its name of Falaise,1 one of the many spots in Normandy give its where the good old Teutonic speech still lingers in local the town. nomenclature, though in this case the Teutonic name has also preserved its permanent being in the general vocabulary of the Romance speech. Between these two rugged heights lies a narrow dell, through which runs a small beck, a tributary of the neighbouring river Ante. The dell is crowded with mills and tanneries, but the mills and tanneries of Falaise have their share in the historic interest of the place. The mills play no inconsiderable part in the records of the Norman Exchequer,2 and the tanneries at The Tanonce suggest the name of the greatest son of Normandy. Falaise. In every form which the story has taken in history or legend, the mother of the Conqueror appears as the daughter of a tanner of Falaise, plying his unsavoury craft William on the spot where it has continued to be plied through a Tanner's so many ages. The conquered English indeed strove to daughter. claim the Norman Duke as their own, by representing his mother as a descendant of their own royal house.3 But, even in this version, the traditional trade of her father employed by the powers which at present bear rule over Falaise and all Normandy in the "restoration"—that is, of course, the destruction—of this venerable keep. See his "Rapport," 1864, p. 27.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Will. Brit. Philipp. lib. viii. Duchesne, Hist. Franc. Scriptt. v. 183; "Vicus erat scabra circumdatus undique rupe, Ipsius asperitate loci Falesa vocatus, Normannæ in medio regionis, cujus in alta Turres rupe sedent et mœnia, sic ut ad illam Jactus nemo putet aliquos contingere posse."

&lt;sup>2</sup> Stapleton, Roll of the Norman Exchequer, i. xcvi.; ii. cix.

&lt;sup>3</sup> See Appendix N. On the Birth of William.

English

legend of

William.

OHAP. VIII. is not forgotten. The daughter of the hero Eadmund disgraced herself by a marriage or an intrigue with her father's the birth of tanner, to whom in process of time she bore three daugh-The pair were banished from England, and took refuge on the opposite coast. In the course of their wanderings they came to beg alms at the gate of Duke Richard the Good. The Prince discovered the lofty birth of the mother, and took the whole family into his favour. The youngest daughter became the mistress of his son Robert, and of them sprang the mighty William, greatgrandson of Eadmund Ironside no less than of Richard the Fearless.

> Such a tale is of course valuable only as illustrating the universal tendency of conquered nations to try to alleviate the shame and grief of conquest by striving to believe that their tyrants are at least their countrymen. The story of William's English origin clearly comes from the same mint as the story in which Egyptian vanity gave out that Kambysês was Egyptian by his maternal origin, as the story which saw in Alexander himself a scion of the royal house of Persia.2 It seems however to preserve one grain of truth in the midst of so much that is mythical. It represents the connexion between Robert and his mistress as having begun before he ascended the ducal throne. There can be little doubt that this was the case, though the story is generally told as if Robert had been already Duke of the Normans. But it is more likely that Robert was as yet only Count of the Hiesmois, and, as such, Lord of Falaise, when his eye was first caught by the beauty of Arlette, or rather Herleva, the daughter of Fulbert the Some say he first saw her engaged in the dance,3 others when she was busied in the more homely work of washing linen in the beck which flows by her father's CHAP. VIII. tannery at the foot of the castle.1 The prince himself, a mere stripling, saw and loved her. He sought her of her father, who, after some reluctance, gave up his child to his lord, by the advice, according to one account, of a holy hermit his brother.2 She was led the same evening to the castle; the poetical chroniclers are rich in details of her behaviour.3 She became the cherished mistress of Robert, and her empire over his heart was, we are told, not disturbed by another connexion, lawful or unlawful.4 After the example of former princes, Robert in after Advancetimes raised the kinsfolk of his mistress to high honours. family. Half the nobility of Normandy had sprung from the brothers and sisters of Gunnor, so now Fulbert the Tanner, the father of Herleva, was raised to the post of ducal chamberlain,5 and her brother Walter was placed in some office which, in after times, gave him close access to the person of his princely nephew.6 After Robert's death, Herleva obtained an honourable marriage, and became, by Her marher husband Herlwin of Conteville,7 the mother of two riage with sons who will fill no small space in our history. But her Conteville. union with the Duke produced but one son, perhaps but one child.8 That child however was one whose future Legends of greatness was, so we are told, prefigured by omens and omens. prodigies from the moment of his birth, and even from the moment of his conception. On the night of her first visit to the castle, Herleva dreamed that a tree arose from her Benoît de Ste. More, 31216 et seqq. (vol. ii. p. 555), who becomes rapturous in his description of her beauty. He makes Robert see her on his return from hunting. Local tradition, endowing Robert with a singular power of discerning beauty at a distance, makes him see her from a window of the castle.

Story of Herleva.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Malcolm's History of Persia, i. 70. <sup>1</sup> Herod. iii. 2.

&lt;sup>3</sup> Will. Malms. iii. 229. R. Wend. i. 469. Cf. Chron. Alberici, 1035 (ap. Leibnitz, Accessiones, ii. 66), and Appendix N.

2 Benoît, 31276.

<sup>8</sup> Roman de Rou, 7998. Bromton, 910. Benoît, 31441 et seqq.

&lt;sup>4</sup> See Appendix N.

&lt;sup>5</sup> Will. Gem. vii. 3. "Willelmus ex concubina Roberti Ducis, nomine Herleva, Fulberti cubicularii Ducis filia, natus." Ord. Vit. 656 D.

&lt;sup>7</sup> Will. Gem. vii. 3. See Appendix N.

&lt;sup>8</sup> See Appendix N.

At the moment of his birth, the babe seized the straw on the chamber floor with so vigorous a grasp that all who saw the sight knew that he would become a mighty conqueror, who would never let go anything that he had once laid birth of his hand upon. Leaving tales like these apart, it is William.

1027-1028. certain that William, the bastard son of Robert and Herleva, was born at Falaise, perhaps in the year in which the great Cnut made his famous pilgrimage to the threshold of the Apostles.

Before Robert undertook so perilous an enterprise, it Question of the succession: state was clearly needful for him to regulate the succession to of the the Duchy. The reigning prince had neither brother nor Ducal family. legitimate child. The heir, according to modern notions of heirship, was a churchman, Robert, Archbishop of This Prelate we have already seen in rebellion Robert Archbishop against his namesake the Duke,4 probably on account of of Rouen. 989-1037. this very claim to the succession. He was one of the children of Richard the Fearless, legitimated and made capable of ecclesiastical honours by the late marriage of his parents. Indeed, according to one account, the marriage of Richard and Gunnor was contracted expressly to take away the canonical objections which were raised against the appointment of a bastard to the metropolitan see.<sup>5</sup> Archbishop Robert was thus an uncle of Duke Robert and a great-uncle of the child William. Besides his Archbishoprick, he held the County of Evreux as a lay fee. Like the more famous Odo of Bayeux, he drew a marked distinction between his ecclesiastical and his temporal character. As Count of Evreux, he had a wife, Herleva

&lt;sup>1</sup> Roman de Rou, 8021. Will. Malms. iii. 229.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Ib. 8037. Will. Malms. iii. 229.

&lt;sup>2</sup> See Appendix N.

&lt;sup>5</sup> Will. Gem. viii. 36.

&lt;sup>4</sup> See vol. i. p. 479.

by name, and was the father of children of whom we CHAP. VIII. shall hear again in our history. In his latter days, his spiritual character became more prominent; he repented of his misdeeds, gave great alms to the poor, and began the rebuilding of the metropolitan church. There were also two princes whose connexion with the ducal house was by legitimate, though only female, descent. One was Guy of Guy of Burgundy, a nephew of Duke Robert, being Burgundy; grandson of Richard the Good through his daughter Adeliza.3 The other was Robert's cousin, Count Alan of Alan of Britanny, the son of Hadwisa daughter of Richard the Fearless.<sup>4</sup> Nearer in blood, but of more doubtful legitimacy, were Robert's own half-brothers, the sons of Richard the Good by Papia. These were the churchman Malger, Malger; who afterwards succeeded Archbishop Robert in the see of Rouen,5 and William, who held the County and William of castle of Arques near Dieppe.6 There was also the monk Nicholas. Nicholas, the young, and no doubt illegitimate, son of Richard the Third.7 None of these were promising candi- No candidates for the ducal crown. Robert, the lineal heir, might from objec-

&lt;sup>1</sup> Ord. Vit. 566 B. "Conjugem nomine Herlevam ut Comes habuit, ex qua tres filios Ricardum, Radulfum, et Guillelmum genuit, quibus Ebroicensem comitatum et alios honores amplissimos secundum jus sæculi distribuit."

Ord. Vit. 566 C. This church was finished by Maurilius in 1063. Ib. 568 B. See Pommeraye, Concilia Ecclesise Rotomagensis, p. 73. Bessin, Concilia, p. 49. No part of the building remains. The account of the Archbishops of Rouen in Mabillon (Vet. Anal. ii. 438), written while Robert's church was standing ("Ecclesiam prasentem miro opere et magnitudine sedificare coepit"), gives him much the same character. "Ante obitum suum, gratif Dei præveniente, vitam suam correxit. Feminam enim reliquit, et de hoc ceterisque pravis actibus suis poenitentiam egit, et sic bono fine, in quantum humana fragilitas capere potest, quievit."

&lt;sup>3</sup> See vol. i. p. 514. <sup>4</sup> See vol. i. p. 508. <sup>5</sup> Will. Gem. vii. 7.

Will. Gem. u. s. Will. Malms. iii. 232. William of Malmesbury says "patruus ejus, sed nothus," but William of Jumièges distinctly calls Papia the wife of Richard; "aliam uxorem nomine Papiam duxit." So Chron. Fontanellense, ap. D'Achery, iii. 289; "Papia matrimonio Richardi potita."

&lt;sup>7</sup> See vol. i. p. 518.

CHAP. VIII. be looked on as disqualified by his profession; Alan and Guy were strangers, and could claim only through females; the nearer kinsmen were of spurious or doubtful birth, and some of them were liable also to the same objection as Had any strong opposition existed, William of Arques would probably have been found the best card to play; but there was no candidate whose claims were absolutely without cavil; there was none round whom national feeling could instinctively centre; there was none who was clearly marked out, either by birth or by merit, as the natural leader of the Norman people. This state of things must be borne in mind, in order to understand the fact, otherwise so extraordinary, that Robert was able to secure the succession to a son who was at once bastard and minor. There were strong objections against young William; but there were objections equally strong against every other possible candidate. Under these circumstances it was possible for William to succeed; but it followed, almost as a matter of course, that the early years of his reign were disturbed by constant rebellions. William's succession was deeply offensive to many of his subjects, especially to that large portion of the Norman nobility who had any kind of connexion with the ducal house. the time of the child's birth, there can be little doubt that his father's intentions in his favour were at least suspected, and the suspicion may well have given rise to some of the rebellions by which Robert's reign was disturbed.1

larity of William's succession.

Unpopu-

The great houses; their connexion with English history.

At this stage of our narrative it becomes necessary to form some clear conception of the personality and the ancestry of some of the great Norman nobles. of them belonged to houses whose fame has not been confined to Normandy. We are now dealing with the fathers of the men, in some cases with the men themselves, who fought round William at Senlac, and among whom he divided the honours and the lands of England. These CHAP. VIII. men became the ancestors of the new nobility of England, and, as their forefathers had changed in Gaul from Northmen into Normans, so now, by a happier application of the same law, they gradually changed from Normans into Englishmen. Many a name famous in English history, many a name whose sound is as familiar to us as any word of our own Teutonic speech, many a name which has long ceased to suggest any thought of foreign origin, is but the name of some Norman village, whose lord, or perhaps some lowlier inhabitant, followed his Duke to the Conquest of England and shared in the plunder of the conquered. But the names which are most familiar to us as names of English lords and gentlemen of Norman descent belong, for the most part, to a sort of second crop, which first grew up to importance on English The great Norman houses whose acts—for the most part whose crimes—become of paramount importance at the time with which we are now dealing, were mostly worn out in a few generations, and they have left but few direct representatives on either side of the sea.

High among these great houses, the third in rank Greatness among the original Norman nobility, stood the house of of Belesme, whose present head was William, surnamed Belesme. Talvas.2 The domains held by his family, partly of the Crown of France, partly of the Duchy of Normandy, might almost put him on a level with princes rather than with ordinary nobles. The possession from which the family took its name lay within the French territory, and was a fief of the French Crown. But, within the Norman Duchy, the Lords of Belesme were masters of the valley bounded by the hills from which the Orne flows in one

&lt;sup>1</sup> See Palgrave, ii. 536.

&lt;sup>3</sup> "Willame Talevaz," according to the Roman de Rou, 8061. "Willelmus Talvacius," Will. Gem. vi. 7.

CHAP. VIII. direction and the Sarthe in another. Close on the French frontier, they held the strong fortress of Alençon, the key of Normandy on that side. They are called Lords of the city of Seez, and, at the time of which we are speaking, a member of their house filled its episcopal throne.2 Their domains stretched to Vinoz, a few miles south-east of Falaise, and separated from the town by the forest of Gouffer. Ivo, the first founder of this mighty house, had been one of the faithful guardians of the childhood of Richard the Fearless, and had been enriched by him as the reward of his true service in evil days.3 But with Ivo the virtue of his race seems to have died out, and his descendants appear in Norman and English history as monsters of cruelty and perfidy, whose deeds aroused the horror even of that not over scrupulous age. Open robbery and treacherous assassination seem to have been their daily occupations. The second of the line, William of Belesme, had rebelled against Duke Robert, and had defended his fortress of Alençon against him.4 His eldest son Warren murdered a harmless and unsuspecting friend, and was for this crime, so the men of his age said, openly seized and strangled by the fiend. Of his other sons,

Their supposed hereditary wickedness.

Roman de Rou, 8062. "Ki tint Sez, Belesme, è Vinaz."

Fulk, presuming to ravage the ducal territory, was killed in battle, Robert was taken prisoner by the men of Le

Ivo, son of the elder William, a Prelate of whom Orderic draws a very favourable picture (469 D), did not scruple to attack and burn his own church, when it had been turned into a fortress by certain turbulent nobles. He tried to repair it, and reconsecrated it; but the walls, being damaged by the fire, fell down. He was then charged with sacrilege at the Council of Rheims, and defended himself by the necessity of the case. He was bidden by Pope Leo, as a penance, to rebuild the church. He went as far as Apulia, and even as Constantinople, collecting contributions and relics, and he began the work on such a scale that, forty years later, the efforts of his three successors had not enabled them to finish it. Will. Gem. vii. 13-15. No part of his building now remains.

&lt;sup>3</sup> Will. Gem. viii. 35. See Palgrave, ii. 313, 536.

<sup>4</sup> Will. Gem. vi. 4. See vol. i. p. 518.

Mans and beheaded by way of reprisals for a murder CHAP. VIII. committed by his followers. The surviving heir of the possessions and of the wickedness of his race was his one remaining son William Talvas.1 This man, we are told, William being displeased by the piety and good manners of his his crimes. first wife Hildeburgis, hired ruffians to murder her on her way to church.2 At his second wedding-feast he put out the eyes, and cut off the nose and ears, of an unsuspecting guest.3 This was William the son of Geroy, one of a house whose name we shall often meet again in connexion with the famous Abbeys of Bec and Saint Evroul. A local war ensued, in which William Talvas suffered an inadequate punishment for his crimes in the constant devastation of his lands. At last a more appropriate avenger arose from his own house. The hereditary wickedness of his line passed on to his daughter Mabel and his son Arnulf. Mabel, the wife of Roger of Montgomery, will be a prominent character in our story for many years. Arnulf rebelled against his father, and left him to die wretchedly in exile. An act of wanton rapacity was presently punished by a supernatural avenger; Arnulf, like his uncle Warren, was strangled by a dæmon in his bed.4

&lt;sup>1</sup> Will. Gem. vi. 7. "Ipse cunctis fratribus suis in omnibus flagitiis deterior fuit, et in ejus seminis hæredibus immoderata nequitia usque hodie viguit." So vii. 10. "Hic à parentum suorum perfidia nequaquam sua retorsit vestigia."

&lt;sup>3</sup> Ib. vii. 10.

Ib. Orderic (460 D) adds, "amputatis genitalibus." These stories of the extreme wickedness of the house of Belesme are doubtless not without foundation, but one cannot help suspecting exaggeration, especially when we remember that Orderic writes in the interest of the hostile house of Geroy. This particular outrage of William Talvas can hardly be an invention; but it must surely have had some motive which does not appear in our authorities.

&lt;sup>4</sup> Ib. 12. The tale is that he one day went out with his followers (clientes) to rob, and seized on the pig of a certain nun ("inter reliqua porcum cujusdam sanctimonialis rapuit"). The holy woman pleaded earnestly for the restoration of her favourite ("gemens eum insecuta est, ac, ut porcellus quem nutrierat, sibi pro Deo redderetur, obnixè deprecata est'),

CHAP. VIII. Such was the character of the family whose chief, first in power and in crime among the nobility of Normandy, stood forth, as the story goes, as the mouthpiece of that nobility, to express the feelings with which the descendants of the comrades of Rolf, the descendants of Richard the Fearless, even the descendants of the brothers and sisters of Gunnor, looked on the possible promotion of the Tanner's grandson to be their lord.

William Talvas curses young William.

William Talvas, says the tale, in the days of his prosperity, was one day in the streets of Falaise, a town where the close neighbourhood of his possessions doubtless made him well known. The babe William, the son of the Duke and Herleva, was being nursed in the house of his maternal grandfather. A burgher, meeting the baron, bade him step in and see the son of his lord. William Talvas entered the house and looked on the babe. He then cursed him, saying that, by that child and his descendants, himself and his descendants would be brought to shame. A curse from the mouth of William Talvas might almost be looked on as a blessing, and the form of the prediction was such as to come very near to the nature of a panegyric. It is indeed the highest praise of the babe who then lay in his cradle, that he did something to bring to shame, something to bring under the restraints of law and justice, men like the hoary sinner who instinctively saw in him but all was in vain; the oppressor killed the pig and ate him for supper. The same night he was strangled in his bed. In those times no alternative was thought of except a supernatural intervention, and an assassination by Arnulf's brother Oliver. But our historian altogether rejects this last view, as inconsistent with the high character of Oliver, who passed many years as a brave and honourable knight, and at last died in the odour of sanctity as a monk of Bec.

This story contains nothing absolutely incredible; yet one is tempted to see in it a slightly ludicrous version of Nathan's parable, assuming a form impossible under the elder dispensation. Arnulf too does not seem to have had even the poor excuse of the presence of a wayfaring man.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Roman de Rou, 8059 et seqq. Palgrave, iii. 149.

the destined enemy of his kind. But the words, when CHAP. VIII. uttered, would be meant and understood simply as a protest against the insult which was preparing for the aristocratic pride of the great Norman houses. Possibly indeed the tale, like other tales of the kind, may have been devised after the event; still it would mark none the less truly the feelings with which a man like William Talvas, boasting of a descent from the original conquerors of the land, looked on the unworthy sovereign whom destiny seemed to be providing for them.

Duke Robert however was bent on his purpose. gathered an assembly of the great men of his Duchy, his intenamong whom the presence of Archbishop Robert, perhaps tion of pilgrimage. as being a possible competitor for the succession, is specially 1034-5. mentioned.1 The Duke set forth his intention of visiting the Holy Sepulchre, and told his hearers, that, aware of the dangers of such a journey, he wished to settle the succession to the Duchy before he set out. The voice of the Assembly bade him stay at home and continue to discharge the duties of government in person, especially at a time when there was no one successor or representative to whom they could be entrusted with any chance of the general good will. It was of course desirable to stave off the question. Robert might yet have legitimate heirs; or, in the failure of that hope, the Norman chiefs might gradually come to an agreement in favour of some other Let the Duke stay at home and guard candidate. his Duchy against the pretensions of the Breton and the Burgundian.2 But Robert would brook no delay in the accomplishment of his pious purpose; he would go at

&lt;sup>1</sup> Will. Gem. vi. 12. "Robertum ergo archiepiscopum cum optimatibus sui Ducatûs accersivit." This looks as if Robert were the only churchman present. See vol. i. p. 197. Wace (8081) gathers together Bishops, Abbots, and Barons, but perhaps only in conformity with the custom of his own time.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Roman de Rou, 8091 et seqq.

He pro-D0868 William as his successor.

CHAP. VIII. once to the Holy Land; he would settle the succession before he went. He brought forward the young William, and acknowledged him as his son. He was little, he told them, but he would grow; he was one of their own stock, brought up among them. His overlord the King of the French had engaged to acknowledge and protect him.2 He called on them to accept, to choose—the never-ceasing mixture of elective and hereditary claims appears here as everywhere—the child as their future Lord, as his successor in the Duchy, should he never return from the distant land to which he was bound.3 The Normans were in a manner entrapped. There can be no doubt that nothing could be further from the wishes of the majority of the Assembly than to agree to the Duke's proposal; but there was nothing else to be done. If Robert could not be prevailed on to stay at home, some settlement must be made; and, little as any of them liked the prospect of the rule of the young Bastard, there was no other candidate in whose favour all parties could come to an agreement on the spot. Unwillingly then the Norman nobility consented; they accepted the only proposal which was before them; they swore the usual oaths, and did homage to the son of Herleva as their future sovereign.4 The William's succession accepted.

<sup>1</sup> Roman de Rou, 8107 et seqq.

"Il est peti, mais il creistra, E se Deu plaist amendera.

Cil est de vostre norreture."

<sup>2</sup> Ib. 8105.

"Par li cunseil el Rei de France, Ki l'maintiendra o sa poessance."

3 Will. Gem. vi. 12. "Exponens autem eis Willelmum filium suum, quem unicum apud Falesiam genuerat, ab eis attentissime exigebat, ut hunc sibi loco sui dominum eligerent, et militiæ suæ principem præficerent." A good precedent for the congé d'élire and letter missive.

4 Will. Gem. u. s. "Juxta decretum Ducis protinus eum prompta vivacitate suum collaudavere principem ac dominum, pangentes illi fidelitatem non violandis sacramentis." Cf. Roman de Rou, 8117 et seqq. The kinsmen of Gunnor, the descendants of the comrades of CHAP. VIII. Rolf, became the men of the Tanner's grandson, and he himself was received as the man of King Henry at Paris.1 As far as forms went, no form was wanting which could. make William's succession indisputably lawful. Duke Robert then set forth on the pilgrimage from which he never returned. Within a few months, his short life and reign came to an end at Nikaia.2 Thus, in the same year William which beheld the great Empire of Cnut parted among his father his sons, did William, the seven years old grandson of in the the Tanner Fulbert, find himself on the seat of Rolf and 1035. Richard the Fearless, charged with the mission to keep down, as his infant hands best might, the turbulent spirits who had been unwillingly beguiled into acknowledging him as their sovereign.

Anarchy at once broke forth; all the evils which attend Necessary a minority in a rude age were at once poured forth upon minority. the unhappy Duchy. We see the wisdom with which the custom of our own and of most contemporary lands provided that the government of men should be entrusted to those events which followed make one doubt as to the genuineness of the "prompta vivacitas."

<sup>1</sup> Roman de Rou, 8125.

"Li Dus por la chose afermer, E por fere lunges durer, Al Rei de France l'ad mené, E par li puing li a livré; Sun home le fist devenir E de Normendie seisir."

There is nothing however to imply that William stayed longer at Paris than was needed for the ceremony. It is an exaggeration when we read in the Winchester Annals (p. 19 Luard), "Willelmo filio Roberti Ducis juvenculo morante cum Rege Francorum in Galliis." Rudolf Glaber (iv. 6) describes the accession of William in much the same way as the national writers; "Cui [Willelmo] antequam proficisceretur, universos sui ducaminis principes militaribus adstrinxit sacramentis, qualiter illum in Principem pro se, <sup>si</sup> non rediret, eligerent. Quod etiam statim ex consensu Regis Francorum Henrici unanimiter postmodum firmaverunt." Does the phrase "militaribus sacramentis" mean "on their knightly honour," or is it merely a pedantic reference to the Roman military oath?

<sup>2</sup> See vol. i. p. 529.

CHAP. VIII. only who had themselves at least reached man's estate. In England the exceptional minorities of the sons of Eadmund and of Eadgar had been calamitous, but they were nothing to compare to the minority of William of Normandy. In England the custom of regular national assemblies, the habit of submitting all matters to a fair vote, the recognition of the Law as supreme over every man, hindered the state from falling into utter dissolution, even in those perilous times. The personal reign of Æthelred proved far weaker than the administration which Dunstan carried on in his name in his early years. But in Normandy, where constitutional ideas had found so imperfect a developement as compared with England, there was nothing of this kind to fall back upon. Nothing but the personal genius of a determined and vigorous Prince could keep that fierce nobility in any measure of order. With the accession of an infant there at once ceased to be any power to protect or to punish. "Woe Childhood to the land whose King is a child" is the apt quotation of an historian of the next age.1 The development of the young Duke both in mind and body was undoubtedly precocious; but his early maturity was mainly owing to the stern discipline of that terrible childhood. It was in those years that he learned the arts which made Normandy, France, and England bow before him; but, at the age of seven years, William himself was no more capable than Æthelred of personally wielding the rod The child had good and faithful guardians, guardians perhaps no less well disposed to fulfil their trust towards him than Dunstan had been towards the chil-But there was no one man in Normandy dren of Eadgar. to whom every Norman could look up as every English-

> <sup>1</sup> Will. Malms. iii. 230. "Clarissima olim patria, intestinis dissensionibus exulcerata, pro latronum libito dividebatur, ut merito posset querimoniam facere, 'Væ terræ cujus Rex puer est.'" See Ecclesiastes x. 16. The same text is used by R. Glaber, iv. 5, with a more general application.

of William.

man had looked up to the mighty Primate, and the bowl CHAP. VIII. and the dagger soon deprived the young Prince of the support of his wisest and truest counsellors. The minority of William was truly a time when every man did that which was right in his own eyes. And what seemed right in the eyes of the nobles of Normandy was commonly rebellion against their sovereign, ruthless oppression Utter of those beneath them, and endless deadly feuds with anarchy of those one another. We have already seen some specimens of their crimes in the doings of the house of Belesme. That house is indeed always spoken of as exceptionally wicked; but a state of things in which such deeds could be done, and could go unpunished, must have come very nearly to a complete break-up of society. The general pictures which we find given us of the time are fearful beyond expression. Through the withdrawal of all controlling power, every land-owner became a petty sovereign, and began to exercise all the sovereign rights of slaughter and de-The land soon bristled with castles. vastation. mound crowned with the square donjon rose as the defence or the terror of every lordship.1 This castle-building as strong as that with which it was spoken of in England, when, a few years after this time, the practice was introduced into England by the Norman favourites of Eadward. But there is a characteristic difference in the tone of the two complaints. The English complaint always is that the Frenchmen built castles and oppressed the poor folk,2 or that they did all possible evil and shame to their English neighbours.3 The Norman complaint, though not wholly silent as to the oppression of the humbler ranks,4 yet dwells mainly on the castle-building as a sign of rebellion against the authority of the Prince, and as an occasion of warfare between baron and baron. And it would have been well for the reputation of the Norman nobles of that age if they had confined themselves to open warfare with one another and open rebellion against their sovereign. But they sank below the common morality of their own age; private murder was as familiar to them as open war.

The Building of

<sup>1</sup> William of Jumièges (vii. 1) distinctly makes the building of these castles one of the main signs and causes of the general disorder of the country. "Sub ejus ineunte setate, Normannorum plurimi aberrantes ab ejus fidelitate, plura per loca aggeres erexerunt, et tutissimas sibi munitiones construxerunt. Quarum dum auderent fisi munimine, protinùs inter eos diversi motus exoriuntur, seditiones concitantur, ac sæva patriæ incendia ubique perpetrantur," &c. So William of Malmesbury (iii. 230); "Mox quisque sua munire oppida, turres agere, frumenta comportare, caussas aucupari quibus quamprimum à puero dissidia meditarentur." The "agger" is the "mote" or mound on which the Norman castles were so often built. The word came almost to be used for the castle itself. the Roman de Rou, 8847, a knight is described as standing at his gate "Entre li mostier è sa mote," that is, between the church and his own castle. According to Mr. Clark, the "agger" or "mote" was commonly an earlier earthwork made use of by the builders of the eleventh and twelfth centuries (Old London, p. 16). Yet the rebellious nobles are here clearly described as throwing up "aggeres" for the express purpose of building their castles, and we can hardly believe that the "tutissimse munitiones" were of wood.

CHAP. VIII. is now spoken of in Normandy with a condemnation nearly castles.

Frequency of assassinations.

The house of Belesme had a bad preeminence in this as in other crimes; but, if they had a preeminence, they were far from having a monopoly. Probably no period of the same length in the history of Christendom contains the record of so many foul deeds of slaughter and mutilation as the early years of the reign of William. And they were constantly practised, not only against avowed and armed enemies, but against unarmed and unsuspecting guests. Some of the tales may be inventions or exaggerations; but the days in which such tales could even be invented must

&lt;sup>1</sup> See above, p. 138.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Chron. Wig. 1066. "And Oda biscop and Wyllelm eorl belifen her sefter, and worhton castelas wide geond bas beode, and earm folc swencte, and a sybban hit yflade swibe." Chron. Petrib. 1087. "Castelas he lét wyrcean, and earme men swide swencean." The famous description of the castle-building in the year 1137 is familiar to readers even of the commonest English histories.

&lt;sup>3</sup> See above, p. 140.

&lt;sup>4</sup> See the story quoted in p. 185.

have been full of deeds of horror. Isolated cases of similar CHAP. VIII. crimes may doubtless be found in any age; but this period is remarkable alike for the abundance of crimes, for the rank of the criminals, and for the impunity which they enjoyed. To control these men was the duty laid upon the almost infant years of William, a duty with which nothing short of his own full and matured powers might seem fit to grapple. Yet over all these difficulties the genius of the great Duke was at last triumphant. His hand brought Effects of order out of the chaos, and changed a land wasted by governrebellion and intestine warfare into one of the most pros- ment in Normandy. perous regions of Europe, a land flourishing as no Norman ruler had seen it flourish before. When we think of the days in which William spent his youth, of the men against whom his early years were destined to be one continued struggle, we shall be less inclined to lift up our hands in horror at his later crimes than to dwell with admiration on the large share of higher and better qualities which, among all his evil deeds, clave to him to his dying day.

§ 2. From the Accession of William to the Battle of Val-ès-dunes. 1035–1047.

We have seen among what kind of men the young Duke Guardians of the Normans had to pass the first years of his life and sovereignty. But his father, in leaving his one lamb among so many wolves, had at least provided him with trustworthy guardians. Alan of Britanny, a possible competitor Alan of Britanny. For the Duchy, a neighbouring prince with whom Duke Robert had so lately been at war, was disarmed when his overlord committed his son to his faith as kinsman and vassal, and even invested him with some measure of

&lt;sup>1</sup> See vol. i. p. 526.

CHAP. VIII. authority in Normandy itself. The immediate care of the young Duke's person was given to one Thurcytel or Thorold, names which point to a genuine Scandinavian descent in their bearer, and which would make us look to the Bessin as the probable place of his birth.2 Other guardians of high rank were the Seneschal Osbern, and Osbern. Count Gilbert, both of them connected in the usual way with the ducal family. Osbern was the son of Herfast, a brother of the Duchess Gunnor; he was also married to a daughter of Rudolf of Ivry, the son of Asperleng and Sprota, the savage suppressor of the great peasant revolt.3 Gilbert's connexion was still closer. Gilbert. He was illustrious alike in his forefathers and in his descendants. He sprang of the ducal blood of Normandy, and of his blood sprang the great houses of Clare and Pembroke in England. His father Godfrey was one of those natural children of Richard the Fearless who did not share the promotion of the offspring of Gunnor.4 He was lord of the border fortress of Eu, renowned in Norman history as early as the days of Rolf; 5 he was lord too of the pleasant valley of the Risle, separated only by one wooded hill from the more memorable valley which is hallowed by the names of Herlwin, Lanfranc, and Anselm.

"A Alain qui esteit sis huem, Par l'Archeveske de Ruem, Livra sa terre à cumandise, Cum à senescal è justise."

&lt;sup>1</sup> Roman de Rou, 8131;

&lt;sup>2</sup> The "Turoldus" of William of Jumièges (vii. 2), and the "Turchetillus" of Orderic (656 C), certainly seem to be the same person.

&lt;sup>3</sup> See vol. i. p. 284.

&lt;sup>4</sup> Will. Gem. viii. 37. "Gislebertus fuerat filius Godefridi Comitis Aucensis, naturalis videlicet filii primi Richardi Ducis Normannorum." See vol. i. p. 279.

See vol. i. p. 198. Gilbert is called "Comes Ocensis" by William of Jumièges (vii. 2), and the same writer (iv. 18) also says, "Licet Comes Gislebertus filius Godefridi Comitis ipsum comitatum parumper tenuerit, antequam occideretur." But see Stapleton, i. lvi.

Roger of Montgomery and his five sons.

The younger Roger.

His wife Mabel. daughter of William Talvas.

CHAP. VIII. any other. I have just before mentioned Count Alan's siege of the castle of Montgomery. The name of that castle, a hill fortress in the diocese of Lisieux, enjoys a peculiar privilege above all others in Norman geography. Other spots in Normandy have given their names to Norman houses, and those Norman houses have transferred those names to English castles and English towns and villages. But there is only one shire in Great Britain which has had the name of a Norman house impressed upon it for ever. Roger, the present Lord of Montgomery, was, at the time of Duke Robert's death, in banishment at Paris. His five sons remained in Normandy, and were among the foremost disturbers of the peace of the country.2 But one of the five, Hugh, had a son, named, like his grandfather, Roger, who bore a better character and was destined to a higher fate. He had, through his mother, a connexion of the usual kind with the ducal house. Weva, a sister of Gunnor, was the wife of Thorulf of Pont-Audemer, the son of Torf,<sup>3</sup> and her daughter Joscelina was the wife of Hugh of Montgomery, and the mother of the younger Roger. 4 On this Roger, William Talvas, in his old age, bestowed the hand of his daughter Mabel, who transferred the name, the honours, and the hereditary wickedness of the house of Belesme to her sons of the house of Montgomery.<sup>5</sup> Mabel, small in stature, talkative, and cruel, guilty of fearful crimes and destined to a fearful doom,6 fills a place

&lt;sup>1</sup> Will. Gem. vii. 2.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Ib. "In Normannia summoperè inserviebant diris facinoribus."

Ib. viii. 37. 4 Ib. viii. 35.

&lt;sup>5</sup> Ib. vii. 16. See above, p. 185. William gives the daughters of Roger and Mabel a good character. Of the sons he says, "Illi ferales et cupidi, et inopum rabidi oppressores exstiterunt. Quam callidi, vel militares, seu perfidi fuerint, aut quantum super vicinos paresque suos excreverint, iterumque sub eis pro facinoribus suis decederint, non est nostrum in hoc loco enarrare."

&lt;sup>6</sup> Ib. "Præfata mulier erat corpore parva, multumque loquax, ad malum satis prompta, et sagax atque faceta, nimitmque crudelis et audax." Above, vii. 10, she is "Mabilia, crudelissimæ sobolis mater." So Ord. Vit.

in history fully equal to that filled by her husband. Of him CHAP. VIII. we shall hear again as literally the foremost among the conquerors of England; we shall see him enriched with English estates and honours, bearing the lofty titles of Earl of Arundel and Shrewsbury, and, once at least, adorned with the loftier title which had been borne by Æthelred and Leofric. Once, and that while engaged in rebellion against 1087. his prince, he flits before us for a moment as Roger Earl of the Mercians. A munificent friend of monks both in England and in Normandy, he has left behind him a different reputation from that of either his father, his wife, or his sons. In one of those sons we shall see the name of his maternal ancestors revive, and, with their name, a double portion of their wickedness.

But we have as yet to deal with the house of Montgomery only in its least honourable aspect. William, son Attempt of of the elder, and uncle of the younger, Roger, stands Montcharged with an attempt, aimed no longer at guardians gomery on Duke Wilor tutors, but at the person of the young Duke himself. liam at William was staying with his guardian Osbern at Vaudreuil, a castle on an island in the Eure, said to have been the place of captivity of the famous Fredegunda in Merowingian times.<sup>2</sup> Thorold, it would seem, had been already murdered, but his assassins are spoken of only in general terms.3 But Osbern still watched over his young lord day and night. While at Vaudreuil he was butchered by Murder of William of Montgomery in the very bedchamber of the escape of Duke, and the young prince owed his own safety on this, the Duke. and on many other occasions, to the zealous care of his maternal uncle Walter. Many a time did this faithful

<sup>470</sup> A; "Præfata Mabilia multum erat potens et sæcularis, callida et loquax, nimiumque crudelis."

&lt;sup>1</sup> Ord. Vit. 667 B. "Rogerius Merciorum Comes."

&lt;sup>2</sup> Will. Gem. vii. 2. See Palgrave, iii. 198. Stapleton, i. exxvi.

Will. Gem. ib. "Deinde [after the death of Gilbert] Turoldus teneri Ducis pedagogus perimitur à perfidis patrize desertoribus."

CHAP. VIII. kinsman carry him from palace and castle to find a lurkingplace from those who sought his life in the cottages of the poor. The blood of Osbern was soon avenged; a faithful servant of the murdered Seneschal presently did to William of Montgomery as William of Montgomery had done to Osbern.<sup>2</sup> In the state of things in Normandy at that moment crime could be punished only by crime. remembrance of the faithful Osbern lived also in the memory of the Prince whose childhood he had so well Friendship guarded. His son William grew up from his youth as the of the Duke with familiar friend and counsellor of his namesake the Duke. William This is that famous William Fitz-Osbern who lived to be, Fitznext to the Duke himself, the prime agent in the Conquest Osbern. of England, who won, far more than the Duke himself, the hatred of the conquered people, and who at last perished in a mad enterprise after a crown and a wife in Flanders.

The next enemy was Roger of Toesny, whom we have

<sup>1</sup> This is the way in which I read the story in William of Jumièges (vii. 2), compared with that put into Duke William's own mouth by Orderic (656 C). Sir Francis Palgrave seems to make Thorold and Osbern be murdered at once (199). But William of Junièges seems to make these murders two distinct events. After the passage just quoted he goes on, "Osbernus quoque . . quâdam nocte, dum in cubiculo Ducis cum ipeo in Valle Rodoili securus soporatur, repente in stratu suo à Willelmo Rogerii de Monte-gumeri filio jugulatus." Orderic puts the murders of Gilbert, Thorold (or Thurcytel), and Osbern together in general terms; "Turchetillum nutricium meum et Osbernum Herfasti filium, Normanniæ dapiferum, Comitemque Gislebertum patrem patriæ, cum multis aliis reipublicæ necessariis fraudulenter interfecerunt." The murder of Osbern can hardly fail to have been one of the occasions so pathetically referred to in Orderic; "Noctibus multotiens cognatorum timore meorum à Gualterio avunculo meo de camera principali furtim exportatus sum, ac ad domicilia latebrasque pauperum, ne à perfidis, qui ad mortem me quærebant, invenirer, translatus sum."

Will. Gem. vii. 2. "Barno quippe de Glotis, præpositus Osberni, injustam necem domini sui cupiens ulcisci, nocte quadam expeditos pugiles congregavit, et domum, ubi Willelmus et complices sui dormiebant, adiit, ac omnes simul, sicut meruerant, statim trucidavit."

already heard of as a premature Crusader, the savage foe CHAP. VIII. of the Infidels of Spain. Disappointed in his dream of a Rebellion and death Kingdom in the Iberian peninsula, he returned to his of Roger of Toesny. native land to find it under the sway of the son of the Tanner's daughter. The proud soul of the descendant of Malahule scorned submission to such a lord; "A bastard is not fit to rule over me and the other Normans."2 He refused all allegiance, and began to ravage the lands of his The one who suffered most was Humfrey de Vetulis, a son of Thorulf of Pont-Audemer, and of Weva the sister of Gunnor. He sent his son Roger of Beaumont against the aggressor. A battle followed, in which Roger of Toesny and his two sons were killed, and Robert of Grantmesnil received a mortal wound.3 This fight was fought rather in defence of private property than in the assertion of any public principle. But the country gained by the destruction of so inveterate an enemy of peace as Roger of Toesny. And here, as at every step of this stage of our narrative, we become acquainted with men whose names are to figure in the later portion of our history. Robert of Grantmesnil was the father of Houses of Hugh of Grantmesnil, who had no small share in the nil and conquest of England and the division of its spoil. Roger Beaumont. of Beaumont became the patriarch of the first house of the Earls of Leicester. One of his descendants played an honourable part in the great struggle between King and Primate in the latter half of the twelfth century; 4 and his

&lt;sup>1</sup> See vol. i. p. 514

&lt;sup>2</sup> Will. Gem. vii. 3. "Comperiens autem quod Willelmus puer in Ducatu patri successerit, vehementer indignatus est, et tumidè despexit illi servire, dicens quod nothus non deberet sibi aliisque Normannis imperare."

&lt;sup>2</sup> See Will. Gem. vii. 3; viii. 37. Ord. Vit. 460 C.

<sup>4</sup> Garnier, Vie de S. Thomas, 1830 (p. 66 ed. Hippeau); "E cil [quens] de Leicestre, ke mut par est senez." So William Fitz-Stephen (i. 235 Giles); "Comes Legecestrize Robertus, qui maturitate zetatis et morum who made the title of Earl of Leicester the most glorious in the whole peerage of England.

Ralph of Wacey chosen as the Duke's guardian.

By this time William was getting beyond the years of childhood, and he was beginning to display those extraordinary powers of mind and body with which nature had endowed him. He could now in some measure exercise a will of his own. He still needed a guardian, but, according to the principles of Roman Law, he had a right to a voice in determining who that guardian should be. He summoned the chief men of his Duchy, and, by their advice, he chose as his own tutor and as Captain-General of the armies of Normandy,<sup>2</sup> Ralph the son of Archbishop Robert. The choice seems a strange one, as Ralph was no other than the murderer of William's former guardian Count Gilbert.3 But it may have been thought politic for the young Duke to strengthen his hands by an alliance with a former enemy, and to make, as in the case of Count Alan of Britanny, a practical appeal to the honour of a possible rival. The appointment of Ralph seems in fact to have had that effect. A time of comparative internal quiet now followed. But there still were traitors in the land. Many, we are told, of the Norman nobles, even of those who professed the firmest fidelity to the Duke, and were loaded by him with the highest honours, still continued to plot against him in secret.4 For a while they no longer aliis prominebat;" and Herbert of Bosham (i. 147 Giles); "Nobilis vir Robertus, tunc Leicestræ Comes, inter honoratos honoratior."

&lt;sup>1</sup> Amicia, daughter of Robert, third Earl of Leicester, married Simon the Third, Lord of Montfort. She was the mother of Simon the leader of the Crusade against the Albigenses, and the grandmother of our own Simon the Righteous. See Pauli, Simon von Montfort, 19, 20.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Will. Gem. vii. 4. "Rodulphum de Wacceio ex consultu majorum sibi tutorem eligit, et principem militiæ Normannorum constituit."

&lt;sup>3</sup> See above, p. 195.

&lt;sup>4</sup> The expressions of William of Jumièges (vii. 4) are remarkable;
<sup>6</sup> Henricum igitur Regem Francorum adeunt, et titiones ejus per Normanrevolted openly on their own account; but there was a CHAP. VIII. potentate hard by whose ear was ever open to their suggestions, and who was ever ready to help them in any plots against their sovereign and their country.

From this point a new chapter opens in the relations Relations between Normandy and France. We have seen that, ever Normandy since the Commendation made by Richard the Fearless to Hugh the Great, the relations between the Norman Princes hitherto and the Dukes and Kings of Paris had been invariably It was to Norman help that the Parisian friendly.2 dynasty in a great measure owed its rise to royalty;3 it was to Norman help that the reigning King of the French owed his restoration to his throne.4 Henry of Paris, made King by the help of Robert, had received Robert's son as his vassal,5 and had promised to afford him the protection due from a righteous overlord to a faithful vassal. But we now, from the accession of William, begin to see signs of Return to something like a return on the French side to the old state from the of feeling in the days when the Normans were still looked accession of William. on as heathen intruders, and their Duke was held to be Duke only of the Pirates.<sup>6</sup> We find the French applying contemptuous epithets to the Norman people,7 and we find the King of the French ready to seize every opportunity between friendly.

945.

987.

1031.

nicos limites hac illacque spargunt. Quos nominatim litteris exprimerem, si inexorabilia eorum odia declinare nollem. Attamen non alii exstiterunt. vobis in aure loquor circumstantibus, quam hi qui fideliores se profitentur et quos nunc majoribus Dux cumulavit honoribus."

<sup>1</sup> See vol. i. p. 247.

<sup>2</sup> Vol. i. p. 272.

<sup>3</sup> Vol. i. pp. 250, 269.

4 Vol. i. p. 519.

<sup>5</sup> See above, p. 189.

- <sup>6</sup> See vol. i. pp. 187, 216.
- 7 Roman de Rou, 9907 et seqq. The great offence was calling the Normans "bigoz è draschiers." The first name has given cause to much controversy; the second is said to mean drinkers of ale, a wholesome witness of their Teutonic descent. But cf. Æsch. Suppl. 930;

άλλ άρσενάς τοι τήςδε γής οἰκήτορας ευρήσετ', οὐ πίνοντας ἐκ κριθῶν μέθυ. Duke.

Causes of this change of feeling.

It is not easy at first sight to explain this return to a state of things which seemed to have passed away for more than a generation. Still we must not forget that any prince reigning at Paris could hardly fail to look with a grudging eye on the practically independent power which cut him off from the mouth of his own river. The great feudatory at Rouen seemed, in a way in which no other feudatory seemed, to shut up his overlord in a kind of prison. The wealth and greatness and prosperity of Normandy might seem, both historically and geographically, to be something actually taken away from the possessions of France. This feeling would apply to Normandy in a way in which it did not apply to the other great fiefs of Flanders and Aquitaine. And the feeling would on every ground be stronger in the mind of a King reigning at Paris than in that of a King reigning at Laôn. To a French King at Paris the Normans were the nearest and the most powerful of all neighbours, those whose presence must have made itself far more constantly felt than that of any other power in Gaul. Hitherto this inherent feeling of jealousy had been kept in check by the close hereditary connexion between the two states. The league established between Richard and Hugh had hitherto been kept unbroken by their descendants. But the main original object of that league, mutual support against the Carolingian King at Laon, had ceased to exist when the Parisian Duke assumed the royal dignity. Since that time, the league could have rested on little more than an hereditary sentiment between the Norman and French princes, which probably was never very deeply shared by their subjects on either side. And now that sentiment was giving way to the earlier and more instinctive feeling which pointed out the Rouen Duchy as the natural enemy of the Parisian Kingdom. It had once been convenient to CHAP. VIII. forget, it was now equally convenient to remember, that the original grant to Rolf had been made at the immediate expense, not of the King of Laôn but of the Duke of Paris.1 Under these changed circumstances, the old feeling, dormant for a time, seems to have again awakened in all its strength. And now that Normandy held out temptations to every aggressor, now that Norman nobles did not scruple to invite aid from any quarter against a prince whose years were the best witness of his innocence, every Ingratifeeling of justice and generosity seems to have vanished tude of King from the mind of King Henry. The King who owed his Henry. Crown to the unbought fidelity of Duke Robert did not scruple to despoil the helpless boy whom his benefactor had entrusted to his protection. The border-fortress of Til-Dispute lières formed the first pretext. That famous creation of Tillières. Richard the Good had been raised as a bulwark, not against the King, but against the troublesome Count of Chartres.2 But Odo had found it convenient to surrender the disputed territory of Dreux to the Crown; 3 the Arve therefore now became the boundary between Normandy and the royal domain. Tillières was accordingly declared to be a standing menace to Paris, whose retention was inconsistent with any friendly relations between King and Duke.4 The loyal party in Normandy thought it better to yield

"Sovent les unt medlé al Rei, Sovent dient : Sire, por kei Ne tollez la terre as bigoz ! A vos ancessors e as nos La tolirent lor ancessor, Ki par mer vindrent robéor."

The feeling is thus represented as mainly a popular one.

&lt;sup>1</sup> See vol. i. p. 189. The whole feeling between France and Normandy is best summed up in the passage from Wace referred to in p. 201, especially the lines,

* See vol. i. pp. 509-511.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Art de verifier les Dates, ii. 670.

* Will. Gem. vii. 5. "Duxit se placabilem ei nullo modo fore, quamdin Tegulense castrum videret in pristino statu persistere."

Gilbert Crispin Tillières.

CHAP. VIII. than to expose their young Duke to fresh jeopardy.1 the actual commander of the fortress was of another mind. Tillières had been entrusted by Duke Robert to Gilbert besieged in Crispin, the ancestor of a race by whom, after its restoration to Normandy, the border fortress was held for several generations.2 He scorned to agree to a surrender which he looked on as dangerous and disgraceful; 3 he shut himself up in the castle with a strong force, and there endured a siege at the hands of the King. Besides his own subjects, Henry had a large body of Normans in the besieging host.4 It is not clear whether these were Normans of the disaffected party, or whether the Duke's own adherents, when they had once pledged themselves to surrender the castle, deemed it expedient to display this excess of zeal against a comrade who had carried his loyalty to the extreme of disobedience. It is certain that it was only in deference to orders given in the Duke's name, and which seem to imply the Duke's personal presence,5 that the gallant Gilbert at last surrendered his trust. The fortress of which Normandy had been so proud was handed over to the French King, and was at once given to the flames, to the sorrow of every true Norman heart.6 The King pledged Tillières surrendered and burned.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Will. Gem. vii. 5. "Cujus fraudes animi ob salutem pueri vitare cupientes, in fide stantes Normanni decreverunt fieri quod egisse postmodum pænituit."

&lt;sup>2</sup> On the family of Crispin or of Tillières see Stapleton, i. cxx.; ii. xliv. There is a special treatise, "De nobili Crispinorum Genere," which will be found in Giles' Lanfranc, i. 340. This Gilbert must not be confounded with Count Gilbert of Brionne, who seems also to be called Crispin. See Prevost, note on Roman de Rou, il. 5.

<sup>3</sup> Will. Gem. vii. 5. "Mox ut molestissimum agnovit decretum."

&quot;Exercitibus tam Francorum quam Normannorum contractia."

&quot;Gislebertus tandem, precibus Ducis victus, mærens castrum reddidit."

&lt;sup>6</sup> Ib. "Quod [castrum] sub oculis omnium sub maximo dolore cordis confestim igne concremari perspexit." The speedy restoration of the fortress, of which we shall hear directly, shows what is really meant by this burning. That the castle was wholly of wood is inconceivable. But all

himself, as one of the conditions of the surrender, not CHAP. VIII. to restore the fortress for four years.1 But, if the Norman writers may be trusted, he grossly belied his faith. His somewhat unreasonable demand had been granted, and no further provocation seems to have been given on the Norman side. But, now that the protecting fortress was dismantled, Henry ventured on an actual invasion. Henry in-He retired for a while; but he soon returned and crossed Normandy the border. He passed through the County of Hiesmes, and rethe old appanage of Duke Robert; from the valley of the lières. Dive he passed into the valley of the Orne, and burned the Duke's own town of Argentan. He then returned laden with booty, and, on his way back, in defiance of his engagements, he restored and garrisoned the dismantled fortress of Tillières.2 The border fortress, so long the cherished defence of Normandy, now became the sharpest thorn in her side. It is impossible to doubt that this devastation of the County of Hiesmes was made by special agreement with the man who was most bound to defend it. The commander of the district was Thurstan surnamed Goz, the son of Ansfrid the Dane.<sup>3</sup> In this description, so long after the first occupation of the country, we must recognize a son of a follower of Harold Blaatand,4 not a son of an original companion of Rolf. And a son of a follower of Harold Blaatand must have been by this time a man advanced in life. But neither his age and office, nor his Scandinavian the wooden appendages, all the roofs, floors, and fittings of the main building, were burned. The principal tower would thus remain dismantled, blackened, perhaps a little damaged in its masonry, but quite fit to be made available again in a short time.

- <sup>1</sup> Will. Gem. vii. 5. "Sacramenta quæ Duci juraverat ne à quoquam suo in quatuor annis reficerentur, irrita fecit."
- <sup>3</sup> Ib. vii. 6. "Turstenus cognomento Goz, Ansfridi Dani filius, qui tunc preses Oximensis erat."
- <sup>4</sup> See vol. i. pp. 211, 216, 243, 262. Without trusting all Dudo's details, there can be no doubt as to the general fact of these later settlements.

Thurstan Goz. He garrisons Falaise Castle against the Duke.

CHAP. VIII. descent and name, hindered Thurstan from playing into Treason of the hands of the French invaders. Seeing that the Duke had been thus compelled to yield to the King, Thurstan looked upon the moment as one propitious for revolt. He took some of the King's soldiers into his pay, and with besieged and taken by the Duke and Ralph of Wacey.

their help he garrisoned the castle of Falaise against the Duke. Young William's indignation was naturally great. To select that particular spot as a centre of rebellion was not only a flagrant act of disloyalty, but the grossest of personal insults. Acting under the guidance of his guardian Ralph of Wacey, he summoned all loyal Normans to his standard, and advanced to the siege of his The castle birthplace. The castle was attacked by storm, a fact which shows that the town was loyal, proud as it well might be of numbering among its sons not only a sovereign, but a sovereign who was beginning to be renowned even in his boyhood. It was only on the side of the town that the castle could be assaulted in this way. William himself could hardly have swarmed up the steep cliffs which looked down upon the dwelling of his grandfather, nor could he, like the English invader four centuries later, command the fortress by artillery planted on the opposite heights. By dint of sheer personal strength and courage, the gallant Normans assaulted the massive walls of the Norman fortress, in the heart of the Norman land, which French hirelings, in the pay of a Norman traitor, were defending against the prince to whom that fortress owes a renown which can never pass away. Their attacks rate in its external defences; night alone, we are told, put an end to the combat, and saved Thurstan and his party from all the horrors of a storm. But the rebel chief now saw that his hopes were vain; he sought a parley with the Duke, and was allowed to go away unhurt on condition of perpetual banishment from Normandy. Thurstan's son, Richard, Viscount of Avranches, proved a Thurstan's loyal servant to William, and in the end procured the anta, the pardon of his father. The son of the loyal Richard, the Rarls of Chester. grandson of the rebel Thurstan, finds a place in English history by the name of Hugh the Wolf, the first of the mighty but short-lived line of the Counts Palatine of Chester.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Will. Gem. vii. 6. "Zelo succensus infidelitatis, regales milites stippendiis conduxit, quos complices ad municudum Falesiæ castellum, ne inde Duci serviret, sibi adscivit." The presence of the French soldiers is thus plain enough, and their presence seems to imply the complicity of the French King; but there seems to be no sufficient authority for bringing in a second devastating invasion of the County of Hiesmes by Henry in person, as we find described in the Roman de Rou, 8526, where I do not understand Prevost's note.

The young Duke's great qualities were now fast dispersion playing themselves. At the earliest age which the rules william's of chivalry allowed, he received the ensigns of knighthood from King Henry, and his subjects now began, not without reason, to look forward to a season of peace and order under his rule. We hardly need the exaggerated talk of his extravagant panegyrist to feel sufe that William, at an unusually early age, taught men to see in him the born ruler. We hear, not only of his grace and skill in every warlike exercise, not only of his wisdom in the choice of his counsellors, but of his personally practising every virtue that becomes a man and a prince. William, we are told, was fervent in his devotions, righteous in his judgements, and he dealt out a justice as strict as that of Godwine or

Will. Gem. vii. 6. He founded St. Gabriel's Priory near Bayeux, the small remains of which are among the finest Romanesque work in Normandy. See De Caumont, Statistique Monumental du Calvados, i. 306.

&lt;sup>2</sup> See Will. Gem. viii. 38. Ord. Vit. 488 B, 522 A, B.

Will. Malms. iii. 240. "At ille, ubi primum per setatem potuit, nilitis insignia à Rege Francorum accipiens, provinciales in spem quietis erexit."

CHAP. VIII. Harold upon all disturbers of the public peace. All this we can well believe. Of all these virtues he retained many traces to the last. A long career of ambition, craft, and despotic rule, never utterly seared his conscience, never brought him down to the level of those tyrants who neither fear God nor regard man. And in the fresh and generous days of youth, we can well believe that one so highly gifted, and who as yet had so little temptation to abuse his gifts, must have shone forth before all men as the very model of every princely virtue. In one important point however, the public acts of William, or of those who acted in his name, hardly bear out the language of his panegyrists. His first ecclesiastical appointments were pointments quite unworthy of the prince who was, somewhat later in life, to learn to appreciate and to reward the virtues of Lanfranc and Anselm. The two greatest preferments of the Norman Church fell vacant during this period, and the way in which they were filled illustrates a not uncommon practice of the Norman princes which had few or no parallels in England. There have been few instances in England in any age of great spiritual preferments being perverted into means of maintenance for cadets or bastards of the royal house. In Normandy, at least since the days of Richard the Fearless, the practice had been shamefully common, and in the early days of William the scandal still continued.

It must be remembered that the Prelates of Normandy,

<sup>1</sup> See above, p. 172. William of Poitiers (Giles, Scriptt. Will. Conq. 80; Duchème, 179 B) gives him, as might be expected, a splendid panegyric. Among other virtues we read, "Summo studio coepit ecclesiis Dei patrocinari, caussas impotentium tutari, jura imponere que non gravarent, judicia facere que nequaquam ab sequitate vel temperantia deviarent. Imprimis prohibere cædes, incendia, rapinas. Rebus enim illicitis nimia ubique, ut suprà docuimus, licentia fuit." See also the later panegyrics on his administration of justice, p. 88, and on his piety in 113, to which I shall have again to refer.

Ecclesiastical apabused by the Norman Dukes.

CHAP. VIII. a son and a grandson, after whom the County of Evreux passed by an heiress to the house of Montfort, giving the Count-Primate the honour of being, through female descendants, a forefather of the great Simon. The vacancy of the Archbishoprick placed the greatest spiritual preferment in the Duchy at the disposal of the young Duke. The choice of the new Primate was as little directed by considerations of ecclesiastical merit as that of his predecessor, and it proved in every way unfortunate. At the Malger, head of the Norman Church William's counsellors placed Archhis uncle Malger, one of the sons of Richard the Good by bishop of Rouen. Papia.<sup>2</sup> We shall presently find him displaying no very 1037-1055. priestly qualities, and the only act of his life which could be attributed to Christian or ecclesiastical zeal was one which wounded the Duke himself in the tenderest point. So too, when, some years later, the great see of Bayeux Opo, Bishop of fell vacant, William bestowed it on his half-brother Odo, Bayeux, 1048-1098. the son of Herleva by her husband Herlwin of Conteville.3

<sup>1</sup> Robert was succeeded at Evreux by his son Richard and his grandson William. On the death of William his inheritance passed to his sister Agnes, wife of Simon the Second of Montfort, ancestor of the great Simon. See the pedigrees in Duchèsne, pp. 1084, 1092, and Pauli, 19.

Odo, like Hugh of Rheims in earlier times,4 must have been a mere boy at the time of his appointment; but he Will. Gem. vii. 7. Ord. Vit. 566 D. The verses on him in the series of Archbishops are,

"Malgerius juvenis sedem suscepit honoris, Natali clarus, sed nullo nobilis actu."

See, for a fearful description of his misdeeds, Will. Pict. 116 ed. Giles. Amongst other things, he never received the pallium. The list of Archbishops in Mabillon (Vet. An. ii. 439) says, "Non electione meriti, sed carnali parentum [parents in the French sense] amore et adulatorum suffragio in pueritia sedem adeptus est pontificalem; omni destitutus tutela, potius adquievit carni et sanguini quam divinis mandatis."

Will. Pict. 118 Giles. Will. Gem. vii. 3, 17. Ord. Vit. 660 B. See Appendix N. See vol. i. p. 230.

&lt;sup>5</sup> A son of Herlwin and Herleva could not be born before 1036; Odo therefore, at the time of his appointment, could not have been above twelve years old.

held the see of Bayeux for fifty years,1 and, during most char. viii. part of that time, his name was famous and terrible on both sides of the Channel. The character which he left behind him was a singularly contradictory one.2 In Eng-His chaland he was remembered only as the foremost among the England, conquerors and oppressors of the land, the man who gained for himself a larger share of English hatred than William himself, the man whose career of wrong was at last cut short by his royal brother, who, stern and unscrupulous as he was, at least took no pleasure in deeds of wanton oppression. Of Odo's boundless ambition and love of enterprise there is no doubt. The one quality led him to aspire to the Papal throne; the other led him first to forsake his diocese to rule as an Earl in England, and then to forsake it again to follow his nephew Duke Robert to the first Crusade. That he was no strict observer of ecclesiastical rules in his own person is shown by the fact that he left behind him a son, on whom however he at least bestowed the ecclesiastical name of John.4 Still Norman ecclesiastical history sets Odo before us in a somewhat and in fairer light than that in which we see him in English Normandy. secular history. He at least possessed the episcopal virtue of munificence, and, whatever were the defects of his own conduct, he seems to have been an encourager of learning and good conversation in others. He was bountiful to all,

1086

&lt;sup>1</sup> Will. Gem. vii. 17. Ord. Vit. 664 D.

&lt;sup>2</sup> See especially the portrait of him in Orderic, u. s. William of Poitiers (118 Giles) ventures to say, "Odonem ab annis puerilibus optimorum numero consona presconia optimorum inseruerunt. Fertur hic in longinquas regiones celeberrima fama; sed ipsius liberalissimi atque humillimi multa et industria et bonitas amplius meretur."

* Ord. Vit. 646 D. Here Odo is "presumptor episcopus, cui principatus Albionis et Neustrise non sufficiebat."

<sup>4</sup> Ib. 665 A. Up to this time scriptural names seem to have been hardly more usual in Normandy than in England. The sons of Archbishop Robert bore names of the usual Teutonic cast, but his successor Malger called his son Michael. Ib. 566 D.

at Bayeux. Cathedral consecrated, 1077.

CHAP. VIII. specially to those of his own spiritual household. His works rebuilt his own church at Bayeux, where parts of his still remain. The lower part of the lofty towers of western front, the dim and solemn crypt beneath choir, of that stately and varied cathedral, are relica the church reared by its most famous Bishop. Th precious fragments, severe but far from rude in style, fo a striking contrast to the gorgeous arcades which in next century supplanted Odo's nave, and to the soari choir and apse raised by a still later age. Besides rene ing the fabric, he increased the number of the clergy his church, and founded or enriched a monastery in tl outskirts of the city, in honour of Saint Vigor, a canonize predecessor in the see of Bayeux.1 The name of Odo i one which will be constantly recurring in this history from the day when his Bishop's staff and warrior's mace were so successfully wielded against the defenders of England, till the day when he went forth to wield the same weapons against the misbelievers of the East, and found on his road a tomb, far from the heavy pillars and massive arches of his own Bayeux, among the light and gorgeous enrichments with which the art of the conquered Saracen knew how to adorn the palaces and churches of the Nor-

> But, though the appointments of Malger and Odo might bode but little good for the cause of ecclesiastical reforma-

On these works of Odo see Will. Gem. vii. 17. Ord. Vit. 665 A. Orderic's words might seem to assert a more complete rebuilding of the Orderio's words might be cathedral than those of William. Orderic says, "Ecclesiam sanctæ Dei genitricis Marise à fundamentis ocepit, eleganter consummavit." has only, "Pontificalem ecclesiam in honorem sanctee Dei genitricis Marise Perhaps this means that he rebuilt it on a larger scale. It was consecrated, like many other Norman Churches, in 1077. Ord. Vit. 548 D. Compare the many dedications of English churches in <sup>2</sup> Ord. Vit. 765 C.

tion, it is certain that a great movement was at this time CHAP. VIII. going on in the interior of the Norman Church. middle of the eleventh century was, in Normandy, the ment inmost fruitful æra of the foundation of monasteries. movement in that direction, which had begun under of monas-Richard the Fearless, had continued under Richard the Good, and it seems to have reached its height under Robert and William. A Norman noble of that age thought that his estate lacked its chief ornament, if he failed to plant a colony of monks in some corner of his possessions.1 No doubt the fashion of founding monasteries became, in this case, as in other cases earlier and later, little more than a mere fashion. Many a man must have founded a religious house, not from any special devotion or any special liberality, but simply because it was the regular thing for a man in his position to do.<sup>2</sup> And, as an age of founding monasteries must also be an age in which men are unusually eager to enter the monastic profession, we may infer that many men took that profession on them out of mere imitation or prevalent impulse, without any real personal call to the monastic life. Still, though move-Character ments of this sort may end in becoming a mere fashion, nastic rethey never are a mere fashion at their beginning. Norman Benedictine movement in the eleventh century, ages. the English Cistercian movement in the twelfth century,

The Ecclesias-tical move-Normandy: The foundation

&lt;sup>1</sup> Ord. Vit. 460 A. "Quisque potentum se derisione dignum judicabat, si clericos aut monachos in sua possessione ad Dei militiam rebus necessariis non sustentabat." So also Will. Gem. vii. 22. "Unusquisque optimatum certabat in prædio suo ecclesias fabricare, et monachos qui pro se Deum rogarent rebus suis locupletare." Each adds a long list of the foundations of the time. The expressions "clerici" and "ecclesias fabricare" would seem to apply to parish churches also. But few parish churches of so early a date exist in Normandy. The great mass seem to have been built or rebuilt in the next century.

&lt;sup>2</sup> This seems recognized by William of Jumièges (vii. 22). Roger of Montgomery founded monasteries, "indignans videri in aliquo inferior suis comparibus."

CHAP. VIII. the still greater movement of the Friars in the thirteenth century—we may add the revulsion in favour of the Seculars in the fourteenth century, and the great Jesuit movement in the sixteenth—all alike point to times when all classes of men were dissatisfied with the existing state of the Church, and were filled with a general desire for its reformation. The evil in every case was that the monastic reformations were never more than temporary. Some new foundations were created, perhaps even some old ones were reformed; the newly kindled fire burned with great fervour for a generation or two; a crop of saints arose, with their due supply of legends and miracles. But presently love again waxed cold; the new foundations fell away like the elder ones, and the next age saw its new order arise, to run the same course of primitive poverty and primitive holiness, degenerating into wealth, indolence, and corruption. Still there is a peculiar charm in contemplating the early years, the infant struggles, the simple and fervent devotion, of one of these religious brotherhoods in the days of its first purity. And, among the countless monasteries which arose in Normandy at this time, there are two which claim some special notice at the hands of an historian whose chief aim is to connect the history of Normandy with that of England. The famous Abbey of Bec became the most renowned school of the learning of the time, and, among the other famous men whom it sent forth, it gave three Primates to the throne of Augustine. Thence came Lanfranc, the right hand man of the LANFRANC, Conqueror—the scholar whose learning drew hearers from all Christendom, and before whose logic the heretic stood. abashed—the courtier who could win the favour of Kings without stooping to any base compliance with their willthe ruler whose crozier completed the conquest which the ducal sword only began, and who knew how to win the love of the conquered, even while rivetting their fetters.

Two monasteries claiming special notice. Bec and Saint Evroul. Three Archbishops of Canterbury from Bec;

Thence too came also the man of simple faith and holiness, CHAP. VIII. the man who, a stranger in a strange land, could feel his ANSELM, 1093-1109. heart beat for the poor and the oppressed, the man who braved the wrath of the most terrible of Kings in the cause at once of ecclesiastical discipline and of moral righteousness. Such are the truest claims of Anselm to the reverence of later ages, but it must not be forgotten that, if Bec sent forth in Lanfranc the great reformer of ecclesiastical discipline, it sent forth also in his successor the father of the whole dogmatic theology of later times. The third Metropolitan who found his way from Bec to Theobald, Canterbury cannot compete with the fame of either of his 1139-1161. great predecessors; yet Theobald lives in history as the first to discern the native powers of one whose renown presently came to outshine the renown of Lanfranc and Anselm. The early patron of Thomas the burgher's son of London may fairly claim some reflected share of the glory which surrounds the name of Thomas the Chancellor of England, the Primate and the Martyr of Canterbury. By the side of the house which sent forth men like these Ouche or the name of the other Norman monastery of which I speak Evroul. may seem comparatively obscure. Yet the Abbey of Ouche or Saint Evroul has its own claim on our respect. It was the spot which beheld the composition of the record from which we draw our main knowledge of the times following those with which we have immediately to deal; it was The home the home of the man in whom, perhaps more than in any of Orderic Vital. other, the characters of Norman and Englishman were inseparably mingled. There the historian wrote, who, though the son of a French father, the denizen of a Norman monastery, still clave to England as his country and gloried in his English birth 1—the historian who could at

&lt;sup>1</sup> Ord. Vit. 547 C. "Ego de extremis Merciorum finibus decennis Angligena huc advectus, barbarusque et ignotus advena callentibus indigenis admixtus, inspirante Deo Normannorum gesta et eventus Normannis with the wrongs of his victims, who, amid all the conventional reviling which Norman loyalty prescribed, could still see and acknowledge with genuine admiration the virtues and the greatness even of the perjured Harold. To have merely produced a chronicler may seem faint praise beside the fame of producing men whose career has had a lasting influence on the human mind; yet, even beside the long bead-roll of the worthies of Bec, some thought may well be extended to the house where Orderic recorded the minutest details of the lives alike of the saints and of the warriors of his time.

Early history of Bec.

The tale of the early days of Bec is one of the most captivating in the whole range of monastic history or monastic legend. It has a character of its own. The origin of Bec differs from that of those earlier monasteries which gradually grew up around the dwelling-place or the burial-place of some revered Bishop or saintly hermit. It differs again from the origin of those monasteries of its own age which were the creation of some one external founder. Or rather it united the two characters in one. It gradually rose to greatness from very small beginnings; but, gradual as the process was, it took place within the lifetime of one man. And that man was at once its founder and its first ruler. The part of Cuthberht at Lindisfarne, the parts of William and of Lanfranc at Caen, were all united in Herlwin, Knight, Founder, and Abbot. This famous man passed thirty-seven years of his life as a man of the world, a Norman gentleman and soldier. His father Ansgod boasted of a descent from the first

Herlwin, founder of Bec, born 994

promere scripto sum conatus." So 548 A; "De Anglià in Normanniam tenellus exsul, ut æterno Regi militarem, destinatus sum." See also pp. 579-581. His father Odelerius was a priest of Orleans. Of the importance of these passages I shall have to speak again.

&lt;sup>1</sup> See Orderic 492 B, and Appendix D.

Danes who occupied Neustria, that is to say, from the CHAP. VIII. original companions of Rolf as distinguished from the Hisdescent later settlers under Harold Blaatand.2 And this descent agrees with the geographical position of his estates, which lay, though on the left bank of the Seine, yet on the right bank of the Dive, within the limits of the original grant of Charles the Simple.<sup>3</sup> On the spindle side he boasted of a still higher ancestry; his mother Heloise is said, on what authority it is not very clear, to have been a near kinswoman of the reigning house of Flanders.4 He was and early a vassal of Count Gilbert of Brionne, the faithful guardian of William, in the neighbourhood of whose castle his own estates lay. He had proved his faithfulness to his immediate lord by many services of various kinds, and he had won the favour, not only of Count Gilbert but of their common sovereign Duke Robert. On one occasion, an injury received from the Count had caused him to forsake his service. But presently the Count was engaged His virin a more dangerous warfare with Ingelram, Count of tues. Herlwin with his followers came at a critical Ponthieu. moment to Gilbert's help, and the Count restored all, and more than all, that he had taken away from one who so well knew how to return good for evil.5 At another time

Will. Gem. vi. 9. "A Danis igitur qui Normanniam primi obtinuere pater ejus originem duxit." So Milo Crispin, Vitæ Abb. Becc. (Giles, Lanfranc, i. 261), who copies William. Both give the name Ansgotus. I know not why pedigree-makers (see one quoted by Taylor, Wace 209, and another in Sir A. Malet's Wace 269) identify this Ansgod with "Crispinus of Bec."

&lt;sup>2</sup> See above, p. 205.

* See vol. i. pp. 191, 192.

Will. Gem. vi. 9. "Mater proximam Ducum Morinorum, quos moderni Flandros cognominant, consanguinitatem attigit." Milo is satisfied with the description of "Ducum Flandrise," without the flourish about the Morini. Herlwin may thus have been, in the female line, a descendant of our Ælfred.

Milo, ap. Giles, i. 262. Orderic, 460 B. Herlwin, hard pressed in the battle, vows that, if he survives, he will serve God only—"nulli ulterius nisi soli Deo militaret."

CHAP. VIII. Gilbert sent Herlwin to the ducal court on an errand of which his conscience disapproved; 1 he failed to execute the unjust commission; in revenge the Count ravaged the lands of Herlwin and did great damage to their poor occupiers.2 Herlwin went to the Count, and made light of his own injury, but prayed that in any case the losses of the poor might be made good to them. Such a man was already a saint in practice, if not in profession; and we have no right to assume that, in this carrying out of Christian principles into daily life, Herlwin stood alone among the gallant gentlemen of Normandy. But the misfortune always was that men like Herlwin, who were designed to leaven the world by their virtues, were in that age open to so many temptations to forsake the world altogether. Herlwin began to feel himself out of place in the secular world of Normandy, full, as it was in those retirement. days, of strife and bloodshed, where every man sought to win justice for himself by his own sword. But he was hardly more out of place in the Norman ecclesiastical world, where priests not only married freely, but bore arms and lived the life of heathen Danes,3 and where even monks used their fists in a way which would hardly have been becoming in laymen.4 The faith of Herlwin nearly

He contemplates monastic

<sup>1</sup> Milo, i. 264. The Count was seeking the destruction of some neighbour; "de cujusdam compatriotæ sui damno agens, quod in illius vergebat perniciem."

&lt;sup>2</sup> Ib. "Continuò abripiuntur omnia sua, nec curat, vastantur quoque pauperes sui, unde non parva sollicitatur cura."

&lt;sup>3</sup> See the description in Orderic, 574 D et seqq. His words are remarkable. After describing the marriage or concubinage of the clergy and even of the Bishops, he goes on (575 A); "Hujusmodi mos inolevit tempore neophytorum, qui cum Rollone baptizati sunt, et desolatam regionem non litteris sed armis instructi violenter invaserunt. Deinde presbyteri de stirpe Dacorum litteris tenuiter edocti parochias tenebant, et arma ferentes laicalem feudum militari famulatu defendebant."

&quot;Quidam monachus monachum pugno repercussum <sup>4</sup> Milo, i. 266. avertit, ac impulsum supinis dentibus demisit ad solum; adhuc enim, ut dictum est, omnes omnium per Normanniam mores barbari erant."

CHAP. VIII. About the same time he for the first time learned to read, and that to such good purpose that he gradually became mighty in the Scriptures, and that without ever neglecting the daily toil which his austere discipline imposed upon himself. His mother Heloise also, struck by the example of her son, gave up her dower-lands, and became a sort of serving sister to the brotherhood, washing their clothes, and doing for them other menial services.2 But after a while it was found that the site of Burneville was unsuited for a religious establishment; it seems not to have been well supplied with the two great monastic necessities of wood and water.3 Herlwin therefore determined to remove his He removes the infant colony to a spot better suited to his purpose, a spot monastery to Bec. to which his own name has ever since been inseparably attached. A wooded hill divides the valley of the Risle, with the town and castle of Brionne, from another valley watered by a small stream, or, in the old Teutonic speech

Present condition of the spot. flows, through rich meadows and under trees planted by

of the Normans, a beck.4 That stream gave its name to the most famous of Norman religious houses, and to this day the name of Bec is never uttered to denote that spot without the distinguishing addition of the name of Herl-win. The hills are still thickly wooded; the beck still

&lt;sup>1</sup> Will. Gem. vi. q. Milo, i. 265.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Milo, i. 268. "Simili se inibi propter Deum servituti nobilis mater ejus addixit, et concessis Deo prædiis, quæ habebat, ancillæ fungebatur officio."

&lt;sup>3</sup> Chron. Becc. ap. Giles, i. 194. "Quia campestris et inaquosus est locus." On the necessity of wood and water for monks, we have the witness of Orderic (461 A) in the case of his own house. "Locus iste," says William the son of Geroy, "ubi coepistis sedificare, habitationi monachorum aptus non est, quia ibi aqua deest et nemus longè est. Certum est quod absque his duobus elementis monachi esse non possunt." description of Bec in William of Jumièges enlarges on the advantages of the spot. It is "omni opportunitate humano usui commodus. Propter densitatem ac rivi recreationem, ferarum illic multus erat accursus."

<sup>4</sup> Will. Gem. u. s. "Locus, qui à rivo illic mananti Beccus appellatur." So Chron. Becc. ap. Giles, i. 194; "Locus qui dicitur Beccus, et ita vocitatus à rivulo ibi decurrente, qui adhuc hodiernis temporibus decurrit juxta muros prati."

the water-side, by the walls of what once was the renowned OHAP. VIII. monastery to which it gave its name. But of the days of Herlwin no trace remains besides these imperishable works of nature. A tall tower, of rich and fanciful design, one of the latest works of mediæval skill, still attracts the traveller from a distance; but of the mighty minster itself all traces, save a few small fragments, have perished. The monastic buildings, like those of so many other monasteries in Normandy and elsewhere in Gaul, had been rebuilt in the worst days of art, and they are now applied to the degrading purposes of a receptacle of French cavalry. The gateway also remains, but it is, like the rest of the buildings, of a date far-later than the days of Herlwin. The truest memorial of that illustrious Abbey is now to be found in the parish church of the neighbouring village. In that lowly shelter is still preserved the effigy with which after times had marked the resting-place of the Founder. Such are all the traces which now remain of the house which once owned Lanfranc and Anselm as its inmates.

In this valley it was that Herlwin finally fixed his infant Herlwin's settlement, devoting to it his own small possessions in the government as valley itself, and obtaining from Count Gilbert a grant of the Abbot. adjoining wood, one of the most precious possessions of the lordship of Brionne.2 There Herlwin built his first church, and added a wooden cloister, which he afterwards exchanged for one of stone.3 There he ruled his house in peace and wisdom, his knowledge of the outer world, and especially

<sup>1</sup> It must be remembered that Herlwin's first church at Bec was on different site from the existing remains, which represent his second building.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Milo, i. 268. "Comes Gilbertus nil usquam eo saltu pretiosius possidebat." The only human habitations in the valley were three mills, in two of which Herlwin had the right of a third part. Partly by gift, partly by purchase, he obtained possession of the whole valley. For his own gifts at Burneville and elsewhere, see his Charter in Neustria Pia, 437.

&lt;sup>3</sup> Will. Gem. vi. 9. Milo, i. 269. "Consecrata, paucis exstructa annis, non parva ecclesia, columnis ex ligneis claustrum construxit." The church then was of stone.

,

CHAP. VIII. his familiarity with the laws of Normandy, standing him, we are told, in good stead. Bec seemed destined to the ordinary lot of a monastic house—to a short succession of men of primitive zeal and primitive virtue, followed by a period of worldly prosperity, leading to its usual results of coldness and laxity. And such doubtless would have been

Effects of the admission of Lanfranc.

Herlwin's death. 1078. consecrated by Lanfranc. 1077.

its fate, the glory of Bec would have been as transitory as that of other monastic houses, but for the appearance of one illustrious man, who came to be enrolled as a private member of the brotherhood, and who gave Bec for a while a special and honourable character with which hardly any other monastery in Christendom could compare. Herlwin survived his first conversion forty-four years;2 his first humble church was pulled down and rebuilt, and The church the new fabric was hallowed in his presence by one whom he had himself received to the monastic order, one who had made Bec the light of the world, and who then returned to his old home in all the greatness of the Patriarch of the nations beyond the sea.3 If the first origin of the house was owing to the simple devotion of its founder and Abbot Herlwin, its lasting fame and splendour were no less owing to the varied learning and soaring genius of its renowned Prior Lanfranc.

Origin and character of Lanfranc.

The future Primate of England was one of the most illustrious witnesses to that feature in the Norman character which made the men of that race welcome strangers from every quarter, and which led to the settlement of so many eminent men of various nations, both in Normandy itself and in the conquered lands of Britain and

&lt;sup>1</sup> Milo, i. 270. "Abbas peritus erat in dirimendis caussarum secularium controversiis, prudens in iis quæ ad exteriora pertinent, . . . legum patrize scientissimus."

&lt;sup>2</sup> Will. Gem. vi. 9. Ord. Vit. 549 A.

<sup>3</sup> Will. Gem. u.s. "Gentium transmarinarum summus Pontifex." Milo, i. 275. "Gentium transmarinarum Apostolicus." Ib. 272. "Summus antistes et in ecclesiis transmarinis vices apostolicas gerens." See vol. i. pp. 146, 627.

Sicily. In the days of Richard the Good, monks and priests CHAP. VIII. had flocked into Normandy, even from such distant lands as Greece and Armenia, and the Norman Duke had kept up a close intercourse even with the monks of Mount Sinai.2 The first great teacher of Bec came from a nearer, though still a distant, region. Lanfranc, Prior of Bec, Abbot of His birth Saint Stephen's, Archbishop of Canterbury, was a native of at Pavia. the Lombard city of Pavia, and was born of a family which, though perhaps not technically noble, was at any rate eminent and honourable.3 He was full of all the secular His learnlearning of the time, and his range of study seems to have ing; taken in the unusual accomplishment of a knowledge of Greek.4 A knowledge of that tongue was then probably less rare than it became somewhat later, and it is an accomplishment which might be looked for in Italy, even in the northern part of the peninsula, more naturally than

- <sup>1</sup> Will. Malms. iii. 246. "Omnium gentium benignissimi advenas sequali secum honore colunt."
  - <sup>2</sup> Chron. Fontanellense (Saint Wandrille), ap. D'Achery, iii. 286.
- Papise urbis Italiae civibus, ab annis infantise in scholis liberalium artium studuit, et secularium legum peritiam ad patrise sum morem intentione laica fervidus edidicit." Gervase (X Scriptt. 1652), from whom we get the names of his parents, says, "natus in urbe Papiensi civibus egregiis et honesta conditione; pater ipsius Hanbaldus, mater Roza vocabatur." William of Malmesbury (Gest. Pont. 116 b) says only, "non adeò abjecta et obscura progenie oriundus erat." Milo's description (i. 281) points to a sort of nobility of the robe; "Parentes illius, ejusdem urbis cives, magni et honorabiles habebantur inter suos concives. Nam, ut fertur, pater ejus de ordine illorum qui jura et leges civitatis asservabant fuit." Dr. Hook (Archbishops, ii. 74) refers to his letter to Queen Margaret of Scotland (Giles, i. 59), in which he calls himself "hominem extraneum, vilem, ignobilem." A sort of civic nobility seems to reconcile the different descriptions.
- by William of Jumièges (vi. 9); "Ortus Italia quidam vir erat, quem Latinitas, in antiquum ab eo restituta scientiæ statum, tota supremum debito cum amore et honore agnoscit, nomine Lanfrancus. Ipsa quoque in liberalibus studiis gentium magistra Græcia discipulos illius libenter audiebat, et admirabatur." The odd expression of "Latinitas" occurs also in the passage in the Saint Wandrille Chronicle just referred to. "Potestas secundi Richardi, velut amore diluculi, in toto Latinitatis orbe serena refulsit." I suppose it takes in all nations of Romance speech.

his knowledge of Greek,

CHAP. VIII. in any country north of the Alps. At the time of Lanfranc's birth and youth, a large part of Southern Italy was still subject to the Eastern Emperors, and the use of the Greek language survived, both in Sicily and on the main land, long after the establishment of the Norman dynasty. A knowledge of that tongue must therefore have been highly expedient for those who were likely to have any intercourse, diplomatic or commercial, with the parts of Italy where it was spoken; still we cannot suppose that its acquirement formed any part of the ordinary course of study of a Lombard scholar. But the great object of Lanfranc's study was one specially adapted to the Imperialist city where he was born, the study of the Civil Law. It was an hereditary calling in his family; his father Hanbald had been a lawyer of distinction, and his son more than maintained the credit of his house. As a pleader, he was eminently successful; the veterans of the courts could not resist the eloquence and the learning with which he spoke, and his legal opinions were accepted as decisive by the magistrates of his native city.2 His father died while Lanfranc was still young, and his honours and offices were offered to his son.3 Why a man who had such fair prospects at home should have forsaken that home for the distant and > barbarous Normandy, it is not easy to guess.4 We are told only that he heard that Normandy was a land which

> <sup>1</sup> See the quotation from Orderic just above, and Dr. Hook's (ii. 75) discussion as to his exact position.

and of Civil Law.

<sup>2</sup> Ord. Vit. 519 A. "Adolescentulus orator veteranos adversantes in actionibus causearum frequenter præcipitavit, torrente facundia apposite dicendo senes superavit. In ipså ætate sententias promere statuit quas gratanter juris periti aut judices aut prætores civitatis acceptabant."

&lt;sup>3</sup> Milo, i. 282. "In primævå ætate patre orbatus, quum ei in honorem et dignitatem succedere deberet." Was Hanbald's post, whatever it was, hereditary !

&lt;sup>4</sup> Dr. Hook (ii. 76, 80) discusses the question at length. I cannot infer from the use of the word "exsilium" by Orderic (519 A), that Lanfrance was driven from Pavia by any political revolution, any more than Orderic himself, when "tenellus exmi" in Normandy. See above, p. 216.

lacked learning, and that its young Duke was disposed to CHAP. VIII. give encouragement to learned men.1 At all events, early He opens in the period of anarchy which formed the early years of a school at Avranches. the reign of William, Lanfranc came into Normandy with 1039. following of scholars, and opened a school in the episcopal city of Avranches.2 The cathedral church of that city beheld in after times the penance by which the greatest 1172. successor of William atoned for his share in the death of the most renowned among the successors of Lanfranc. But the glory of Avranches has passed away. From it, alone among the seven episcopal towns of Normandy, minster and Bishoprick have wholly vanished.3 But, for those few years of the life of Lanfranc, Avranches must have been an intellectual centre without a rival on this side of the Alps. The fame of the great teacher was spread abroad, and scholars flocked to him from all quarters. But as yet his learning was wholly secular; his pursuits were peaceful, but he thought perhaps less of divine things than Herlwin had thought when he rode after Count Gilbert to battle. At last divine grace touched his heart; a sudden conversion made him resolve to embrace the monastic profession. He left Avranches suddenly, without He begiving any notice to his friends and scholars, and set forth monk at to seek for the poorest and most lowly monastery that Bec. 1042. could be found, for one which his own fame had never reached.4 A happy accident led him to Bec, which then

&lt;sup>1</sup> Chron. Becc. i. 195. Hook, ii. 77.

&lt;sup>2</sup> The sojourn at Avranches comes from Milo, i. 282. The other accounts seem to bring him to Bec at once.

&lt;sup>3</sup> The Bishoprick of Avranches is now merged in that of Coutances, and the cathedral is destroyed; Lisieux is also merged in Bayeux, but the cathedral remains.

* Will. Gem. vi. 9. "Beccum itaque adiit, quo nullum usquam pauperius æstimabatur vel abjectius cœnobium." Ord. Vit. 519 B. "Cœnobiolum Beccense loci situ et paupertate elegit." Milo, i. 282, 283. "Locum adire nolebat, ubi litterati qui eum honori ac reverentize haberent.... Rogavit sanè ut vilius et pauperius conobium quod in regione nossent

CHAP. VIII. fully answered his ideal. Received as a monk by Abbot Herlwin, he strove to hide himself from the world; he even at one time thought of leaving the monastery, and leading a life of utter solitude in the wilderness.2 But the Abbot required him on his obedience to remain, and he was advanced to the dignity of Prior.3 He had already proved his fitness to command by his readiness to obey. His predecessor in the Priorship, an unlearned man, had bidden him, when reading in the refectory, to shorten the second syllable of docere. The great scholar did as he was bid, deeming holy obedience to be something higher than the rules of Donatus. But such necessity was not long laid upon him; such a light as his could not long be hid under a bushel; his fame was again spread abroad, and, with it, the fame of the house in which he sojourned. Clerks and scholars, men of noble birth, even sons of princes, flocked to profit by the instruction of the learned Prior, and enriched the Abbey with costly gifts for his sake.5

He becomes Prior. 1045.

sibi demonstrarent." Will. Malm. Gest. Pont. 116 b. "Multis diu locis circumspectis, ex omni abbatiarum copia Beccum apud Normanniam potissimum elegit, paupertate loci et monachorum religione captus."

- <sup>1</sup> The legend is found in a simpler form in Milo, i. 282, 283, and in a fuller shape in the Chronicon Beccense, i. 195, 196, followed by Hook, i. 81, 82. I do not see the chronological difference spoken of by the Dean, except that the Chronicler, like most of the other writers, leaves out the sojourn at Avranches. The two versions are worth comparing, as illustrating the growth of a legend, which is not the less plainly a legend because it contains nothing miraculous. The earlier form is the more consistent with the general story, as it represents Lanfranc as ignorant of Scripture and divine things. The meeting between Lanfranc and Herlwin is well conceived and well told. <sup>2</sup> Milo, i. 285.
- <sup>3</sup> Milo, i. 286. "Lanfrancum Priorem constituit, et quidquid ditioni monasterii subjacebat, interiùs et exteriùs ipsius curæ commisit."
- "Vir sapiens sciens magis obedientiam Christo debere quam Donato, dimisit quod bene pronunciaverat, et dixit quod non rectè dicere jubebatur. Nam producere brevem vel longam corripere syllabam non capitale noverat crimen; verum jubenti ex parte Dei non parere culpam non levem esse sciebat."
- <sup>5</sup> Will. Gem. vi. 9. "Accurrunt clerici, Ducum filii [one would like to know their names], nominatissimi scholarum Latinitatis magistri, laici e society increased so fast that the buildings were found OMAP. VIII. be too small, and the site not healthy enough for so at a multitude. By the persuasion of Lanfranc, Herlwas induced to change his abode once more, and raise a third house, larger and more stately than either its predecessors, but still within the same valley and n the banks of the same beck. At last the name of His favour Prior of Bec reached the ears of Duke William himself. Ham. afranc became his trusted counsellor, and we shall sently find him acting zealously and successfully on sovereign's behalf, in pursuit of the object which, next the Crown of England, was nearest to William's heart. e fame of Lanfranc soon spread beyond the bounds He appears Normandy; he appeared, as we have already seen, Synoda of succession of synods, as the champion of the received Rome and trine of the Church.4 The theological position of 1049, 1050. afranc I leave to be discussed by others; it is enough say that, summoned before Pope and Council as a susted heretic, he came away from Rome and Vercelli with reputation of the most profound and most orthodox mtes, altă nobilitate viri. Multi pro iprius amore multas eidem mise terras contulere."

tor of his time.

Will. Gem. vi. 9. "Adunatam etenim illie fratrum multitudinem domorum spaciositas jam capere non valebat, et quia situs loci degenincolumitati contrarius exsistebat."

William of Jumièges (u. s.) describes the work, and says that "post mii completionem, solă necdam completă basilică," Lanfranc became ot of Saint Stephen's. This last appointment did not happen till 1066 l. Vit. 494 B). Did the rebuilding not begin till 1063 !

I reserve the account of Lanfranc's connexion with William till I come te history of the Duke's marriage.

See above, p. 116. * See Hook, ii. 89.

Orderio (519 D) describes the work of Lanfranc against Berengar as lucido venustoque stilo libellum, sacris auctoritatibus ponderosum, et molubiliter constantem consequentiis rationum, verm intelligentim ructione de Eucharistia copiesum, facundo sermone luculentum, nec itritate tadiosum." One could wish that the excellent Orderic had, in last respect, imitated the work which he so much admired,

The same

OHAP. VIII.
The monastery of Ouche or Saint Evroul.

The monastery of Ouche or Saint Evroul had, as far as the eleventh century was concerned, an origin of a different kind from that of Bec; but its story is really little more than that of Bec carried back into an earlier age. That is to say, while Bec was altogether a new foundation, Saint Evroul was, like many other religious houses both in England and Normandy, a restoration of an earlier one. In both countries the Scandinavian invaders had destroyed or pillaged countless churches and monasteries. Many of these last, sometimes after complete destruction, sometimes after dragging on a feeble existence during the intermediate time, rose again, like Crowland and Jumièges, in more than their former great-But the case of Saint Evroul was a peculiar one. Its temporary fall was owing, not to the devastations of heathen Northmen, but to the wars between Christian Normandy and Christian France. The history of its founder, Ebrulf or Evroul, a saint of the sixth century, is, in many respects, a forestalling of the history of Herlwin of Bec. 1 Of noble birth in the city of Bayeux, perhaps therefore of Saxon, rather than of either Frankish or Gaulish, blood,—high in favour at the court of Hlothar the son of Hlodwig, he lived, even as a layman, the life of a saint.2 At last he forsook the world; his wife and himself both took monastic vows; but Ebrulf, as Lanfranc had wished to do, presently forsook his monastery for a deeper seclusion. With three companions only, he sought out a lonely spot by the river Charenton, close by the forest of Ouche, on the borders of the dioceses of Lisieux, Evreux,

Story of Ebrulf or Evroul. 575.

&lt;sup>1</sup> The whole early history of his house is given by Orderic at great length, 609 et seqq. So also Will. Gem. vii. 23.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Ord. 609 C. "Degens adhuc sub laicali habitu vitam instituerat ut nihil ab his discrepare videretur, quos imperium regulare coercebat." His piety however was not wholly after the type of Eadward the Confessor, for we read (609 D), "conjugem, ut patris nomen haberet, acceperat."

d Seez. There he lived a hermit's life, adorned, as we CHAP. VIII. told, by many miracles, and his cell, like the cell of thlac at Crowland, became the small beginning of a nous monastery. The secluded site of the house saved Monastery from the ravages of the Northmen, and the votaries of Evroul; int Evroul, with almost unique good luck, remained the Danish disturbed, while Hasting and Rolf were overthrowing ravages: many holy places of their brethren elsewhere.2 But, ring the troubled minority of Richard the Fearless, ien King Lewis of Laôn and Duke Hugh of Paris were vading the defenceless Duchy,3 the monks of Saint roul received two seemingly honourable, but, as it rned out, highly dangerous, guests. These were Herlwin, but is bot of Saint Peter's at Orleans, the Chancellor of Hugh Hugh the e Great, and Ralph of Drangy his Chamberlain. Both, Great. e are told, were men of great piety, but they showed eir piety in a strange fashion. Soon after their visit, ake Hugh gave orders for the ravage of that part of ormandy. His devout officers either despised or scrupled plunder of a more vulgar kind; they remembered the

One legend of Saint Ebrulf (61: C) is the same as the well known story Ælfred and his last loaf.

Ord. Vit. 623 C. "Olim dum Daci, qui adhue pagani erant, cum stingo Neustriam vastaverunt, et rursus Rollone cum suis assviente, res ecclesies cum urbibus et oppidis desclates sunt ; nos, suffragante e, in silvestri sterilique rure latuimus, et debacchantium gladice, licht timore nimio et egestate, sospites evasimus." This must have been gotten when it is said in Neustria Pia, p. 90, that Saint Evroul was raged by the Danes.

See vol. i. pp. 237, 238. Orderic gives his version of these events in 619. He calls Hugh "Hugo Magnus Aurelianorum Dux," and Lewis eives his surname of "Ultramarinus," which we do not find in conaporary writers. Most names of the kind were doubtless used in mmon discourse during the lifetime of the princes designated by them, t they did not find their way into written history till later.

Ord. Vit. 619 D, 622 D.

To. 621 B. "Rusticorum pecudes sive supellectilem non curaverunt; l Uticensis hospitisi memores, illuc reversi sunt, et ex insperato cum suis oznobium irrugrunt." Then follow the details of the plunder.

CHAP. VIII. hospitality of the monks of Saint Evroul, and requited it by carrying off all the ornaments of their church, including, what they most valued, the relics of their founder and other saints. The holy spoil was duly shared among various churches of the Duchy of France,1 and a large body of the monks of Saint Evroul followed the objects of The monastery their veneration. A few however remained behind, and forsaken. the brotherhood still dragged on a feeble existence for some time. At last the house of Saint Evroul was utterly forsaken and forgotten, and miracles were needed to point The church out the spot where it had stood. A pious priest<sup>2</sup> from restored by Beauvais, Restold by name, moved by a divine vision, came and dwelt on the spot, and found benefactors willing to repair the ruined church.3 At last one special benefactor Geroy and arose. Geroy, a man of great valour and piety, was lord his family. of Escalfoy by the forest of Ouche, and of Montreuil near the Dive.4 Of mingled French and Breton extraction, he had been attached to the fortunes of the elder William of Belesme, probably as a vassal of some of the estates held by him under the Crown of France. In a c. 1015. fight against Count Herbert of Maine, when William and all the rest of his followers had fled, Geroy regained the day by his single valour.<sup>5</sup> In return for this exploit, William introduced him at the court of Richard the Good, by whom he was allowed to succeed to the lordships already

<sup>1</sup> Ord Vit. 622 D.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Ib. 624 C. This holy man, like Orderic's own father, was married. "Uticum perrexit, ibique cum conjuge et Ilberto filio suo primus habitavit." (625 A.) He afterwards had a companion named Ingram. (461 A.)

&lt;sup>3</sup> Ib. 625 C, D.

&lt;sup>4</sup> He is described as "Ernaldi Grossi de Corte Sedaldi Abonii Britonis filii filius." (Ord. Vit. 463 A.) He goes on to say that he "ex magnă nobilitate Francorum et Britonum processit, mirăque probitate et audaciă temporibus Hugonis Magni [clearly a mistake for Hugh Capet] et Roberti Regum Francorum nobiliter viguit."

&lt;sup>8</sup> Ib. 463 A.

poken of. They had been the property of Helgo, a GHAP. VIII. Norman noble, to whose daughter Geroy had been berothed, but the marriage was hindered by the premature eath of the bride.* By another wife he had a numerous amily, many of whom were distinguished in Norman istory.3 He was himself succeeded by his second son william Villiam, who, like his father, was attached to the house of Geroy. selesme, and also distinguished himself in the war with Maine.4 He had however to contend for the possession f his estates against the violence of Count Gilbert of Brionne, a man who, on this as on some other occasions, sems to have failed to carry into his private relations hose principles of honourable conduct which in so marked way distinguished his administration of public affairs. Villiam was a brave soldier and a faithful vassal, ready o undergo any personal loss on behalf of his lord or of Orderic (464 A, B) tells a curious story about these lordships. When sey were granted to Geroy, they were, by what accident does not appear, of included in the diocese of any Bishop. Geroy's conscience was troubled a state of things so contrary to all ecclesiastical rule. He accordingly equired which of the neighbouring Bishops was the most worthy, and, saring much of the virtues of Roger, Bishop of Lisieux (990–1024), he mexed his lands to that diocese. He procured however certain privileges of the clergy of his lordships, especially an exemption from the oppressive triediction of the Archdescons; "Ut clerici terms sum non irent ad lacitandum extra potentatem ecrum, non opprimerentur injustis circumsentionibus Archidisconorum." He might well make this stipulation, if the Archdescons of his time were like those described by John of Salisbury one generations later (Ep. clavi, ap. Giles, i. 260).

In Mr. Stapleton's map Escalby is marked in the diocese of Linieux, but Iontrouil in that of Sees.

William of Jumièges (vii. 11.) makes him receive these lordships from take Richard, "Richardi Ducis, cujus dono in Normannia duo municipia biinuit," but it seems from Orderic (463 B) that the ducal grant was only confirmation of the will of Helgo; "Liberalis Dux agnită virtute ejus onoravit, sique totam terram Helgonis hareditario jure concessit."

* Will. Gem. u. s. "Ex his filiorum et nepotum militaris turms proagata est, que barbaris in Anglia vel Apulia seu Trachia vel Syria imio terrori vica est."

<sup>4</sup> Ib. vi. 7.

&lt;sup>3</sup> Compare his dealings with Herlwin, above, pp. 217, 218,

THAP. VIII. his friend. He was also bountiful to the Church, though he strictly maintained the ecclesiastical privileges of his own lordships.2 Twice he made the pilgrimage to Jerusalem, once during the height of his prosperity, and once after the great misfortune which clouded his later days. For Blinded by he it was whom the fierce Talvas, in defiance of every tie William of gratitude, of hospitality, and of feudal honour, blinded Talvas. and mutilated when he came as a guest to his bridal.3 The daughter of Talvas too, the cruel Mabel, pursued the house of Geroy throughout life with unrelenting hatred.4 In his old age he became a monk at Bec, a house to which He grants Saint he had already been a benefactor. He had given to Herl-Evroul to Bec. win and his monks the lands of Saint Evroul and the church lately restored by Restold. It now became a cell to the Abbey, inhabited by a small body of monks

> <sup>1</sup> He held lands of Count Geoffrey of Mantes, who was taken prisoner by William Talvas, who required the destruction of the castle of Montacute as his ransom. This castle belonged to William the son of Geroy, who at once destroyed it to bring about the liberation of his lord. Ord. Vit. 464 C.

> with Lanfranc at their head.6 But presently William's nephews, Hugh and Robert of Grantmesnil,7 were designing the foundation of a monastery near the lordship on the Oudon from which they took their name.

4 578 A.

Ord. Vit. 464 A. "Episcopales consuetudines Monasterioli et Escalfoii fundo habebat, nec ullus Archidiaconorum ibidem presbyteros ejusdem honoris circumvenire audebat."

&lt;sup>3</sup> See above, p. 185.

&lt;sup>5</sup> According to William of Jumièges (vii. 23), he died at Gaeta on his return from a mission of some sort (pro quibusdam rationalibus caussis) to Apulia.

Ord. Vit. 461 A. Chron. Becc. i. 195. This is doubtless the grange which Lanfranc found greatly troubled by rats. His biographer (i. 284, 285) cites it as a proof of his humility that he personally carried a cat to make war upon them.

They were the sons of Robert of Grantmesnil (see above, p. 199) and Hadwisa, daughter of Geroy (Orderic, 465 B). After Robert's death Hadwisa married William, son of Archbishop Robert. Their daughter Judith, having taken the veil, afterwards married Roger, Count of Sicily (484 B), but, as a punishment for her sacrilege, remained childless.

Of these two brothers, Robert became a monk of Saint CHAP. VIII. Evroul; of Hugh we shall hear again in the history both of Normandy and of England. Their pious uncle ap-Restoraproved of the design, but pointed out that the site which Saint they had chosen was lacking in the two great monastic Evroul. necessaries of wood and water.1 Let them rather join with him in restoring to its ancient splendour the fallen house of Saint Evroul, placed on a spot suited for every monastic want.2 Uncle and nephews joined their energies and their purses; the rights of Bec over the church and lands were exchanged for another estate, and the new Saint Evroul arose with the full licence of Duke William, of Archbishop Malger, and of the other Prelates of Normandy. Monks were brought from Jumièges, and a brother of that house, Theodoric by name, became the first Abbot of the new foundation.3 But the house seems to have been far less fortunate than Bec in its rulers. Theodoric after a while laid aside his office, driven to resignation, it is said, by the cabals of the co-founder Robert of Grantmesnil, who, having made his profession in the house, had obtained the rank of Prior.4 Robert was chosen to the Abbotship, but, a few years after, he was himself deposed, 1050.

1058.

1059.

&lt;sup>1</sup> See above, p. 220.

&lt;sup>2</sup> William of Jumièges (vii. 23) puts into his mouth a long historical discourse, in which, I am sorry to say, he speaks of Charles the Simple as "filius Ludovici cognomine Nihil-fecit."

* Ord. Vit. 461 C et seqq., 625 D. Will. Gem. vii. 23. He was the only monk for whom the cruel Mabel had any reverence. Ord. Vit. 470 A.

&lt;sup>4</sup> See his character, Ord. Vit. 467 D; his intrigues, 474 C et seqq.; his election, 477 A. He began a new church, but did not finish it, 480 C. He also gave to the house (468 B) an illuminated psalter—doubtless of English work—which the Lady Emma had given to her brother Archbishop Robert. His son William seemingly stole it from his father, and gave it to his wife Hadwisa, mother of Robert of Grantmesnil; "de camera patris sui familiariter sustulerat, dilectæque suæ conjugi Hadwisæ omnimodis placere volens detulerat." On Abbot Robert see also Will. Gem. vii. 26.

THAP. VIII. his friend. He was also bountiful to the Church, though he strictly maintained the ecclesiastical privileges of his own lordships.2 Twice he made the pilgrimage to Jerusalem, once during the height of his prosperity, and once after the great misfortune which clouded his later days. For Blinded by he it was whom the fierce Talvas, in defiance of every tie William of gratitude, of hospitality, and of feudal honour, blinded Talvas. and mutilated when he came as a guest to his bridal.3 The daughter of Talvas too, the cruel Mabel, pursued the house of Geroy throughout life with unrelenting hatred.4 In his old age he became a monk at Bec, a house to which He grants Saint he had already been a benefactor.5 He had given to Herl-Evroul to Bec. win and his monks the lands of Saint Evroul and the church lately restored by Restold. It now became a cell to the Abbey, inhabited by a small body of monks with Lanfranc at their head.6 But presently William's nephews, Hugh and Robert of Grantmesnil, were designing the foundation of a monastery near the lordship on the Oudon from which they took their name.

&lt;sup>1</sup> He held lands of Count Geoffrey of Mantes, who was taken prisoner by William Talvas, who required the destruction of the castle of Montacute as his ransom. This castle belonged to William the son of Geroy, who at once destroyed it to bring about the liberation of his lord. Ord. Vit. 464 C.

Ord. Vit. 464 A. "Episcopales consuetudines Monasterioli et Escalfoii fundo habebat, nec ullus Archidiaconorum ibidem presbyteros ejusdem honoris circumvenire audebat."

&lt;sup>3</sup> See above, p. 185. <sup>4</sup> 578 A.

&lt;sup>8</sup> According to William of Jumièges (vii. 23), he died at Gaeta on his return from a mission of some sort (pro quibusdam rationalibus caussis) to Apulia.

&lt;sup>6</sup> Ord. Vit. 461 A. Chron. Becc. i. 195. This is doubtless the grange which Lanfranc found greatly troubled by rats. His biographer (i. 284, 285) cites it as a proof of his humility that he personally carried a cat to make war upon them.

They were the sons of Robert of Grantmesnil (see above, p. 199) and Hadwisa, daughter of Geroy (Orderic, 465 B). After Robert's death Hadwisa married William, son of Archbishop Robert. Their daughter Judith, having taken the veil, afterwards married Roger, Count of Sicily (484 B), but, as a punishment for her sacrilege, remained childless.

Of these two brothers, Robert became a monk of Saint CHAP. VIII. Evroul; of Hugh we shall hear again in the history both of Normandy and of England. Their pious uncle ap-Restoraproved of the design, but pointed out that the site which Saint they had chosen was lacking in the two great monastic Evroul. necessaries of wood and water.1 Let them rather join with him in restoring to its ancient splendour the fallen house of Saint Evroul, placed on a spot suited for every monastic want.2 Uncle and nephews joined their energies and their purses; the rights of Bec over the church and lands were exchanged for another estate, and the new Saint Evroul arose with the full licence of Duke William, of Archbishop Malger, and of the other Prelates of Normandy. Monks were brought from Jumièges, and a brother of that house, Theodoric by name, became the first Abbot of the new foundation.3 But the house seems to have been far less fortunate than Bec in its rulers. Theodoric after a while laid aside his office, driven to resignation, it is said, by the cabals of the co-founder Robert of Grantmesnil, who, having made his profession in the house, had obtained the rank of Prior.4 Robert was chosen to the Abbotship, but, a few years after, he was himself deposed, 1058.

1059.

1063.

<sup>1</sup> See above, p. 220.

&lt;sup>2</sup> William of Jumièges (vii. 23) puts into his mouth a long historical discourse, in which, I am sorry to say, he speaks of Charles the Simple as "filius Ludovici cognomine Nihil-fecit."

&lt;sup>2</sup> Ord. Vit. 461 C et seqq., 625 D. Will. Gem. vii. 23. He was the only monk for whom the cruel Mabel had any reverence. Ord. Vit. 470 A.

&lt;sup>4</sup> See his character, Ord. Vit. 467 D; his intrigues, 474 C et seqq.; his election, 477 A. He began a new church, but did not finish it, 480 C. He also gave to the house (468 B) an illuminated psalter—doubtless of English work—which the Lady Emma had given to her brother Archbishop Robert. His son William seemingly stole it from his father, and gave it to his wife Hadwisa, mother of Robert of Grantmesnil; "de camera patris sui familiariter sustulerat, dilectæque suæ conjugi Hadwisæ omnimodis placere volens detulerat." On Abbot Robert see also Will. Gem. vii. 26.

THAP. VIII. his friend. He was also bountiful to the Church, though he strictly maintained the ecclesiastical privileges of his own lordships.2 Twice he made the pilgrimage to Jerusalem, once during the height of his prosperity, and once after the great misfortune which clouded his later days. For Blinded by he it was whom the fierce Talvas, in defiance of every tie William of gratitude, of hospitality, and of feudal honour, blinded Talvas. and mutilated when he came as a guest to his bridal.3 The daughter of Talvas too, the cruel Mabel, pursued the house of Geroy throughout life with unrelenting hatred.4 In his old age he became a monk at Bec, a house to which He grants Saint he had already been a benefactor. He had given to Herl-Evroul to Bec. win and his monks the lands of Saint Evroul and the church lately restored by Restold. It now became a cell to the Abbey, inhabited by a small body of monks with Lanfranc at their head.6 But presently William's nephews, Hugh and Robert of Grantmesnil, were designing the foundation of a monastery near the lordship on the Oudon from which they took their name.

&lt;sup>1</sup> He held lands of Count Geoffrey of Mantes, who was taken prisoner by William Talvas, who required the destruction of the castle of Montacute as his ransom. This castle belonged to William the son of Geroy, who at once destroyed it to bring about the liberation of his lord. Ord. Vit. 464 C.

Ord. Vit. 464 A. "Episcopales consuetudines Monasterioli et Escalfoii fundo habebat, nec ullus Archidiaconorum ibidem presbyteros ejusdem honoris circumvenire audebat."

&lt;sup>3</sup> See above, p. 185.

<sup>4 578</sup> A.

&lt;sup>5</sup> According to William of Jumièges (vii. 23), he died at Gaeta on his return from a mission of some sort (pro quibusdam rationalibus caussis) to Apulia.

&lt;sup>6</sup> Ord. Vit. 461 A. Chron. Becc. i. 195. This is doubtless the grange which Lanfranc found greatly troubled by rats. His biographer (i. 284, 285) cites it as a proof of his humility that he personally carried a cat to make war upon them.

They were the sons of Robert of Grantmesnil (see above, p. 199) and Hadwisa, daughter of Geroy (Orderic, 465 B). After Robert's death Hadwisa married William, son of Archbishop Robert. Their daughter Judith, having taken the veil, afterwards married Roger, Count of Sicily (484 B), but, as a punishment for her sacrilege, remained childless.

Of these two brothers, Robert became a monk of Saint CHAP. VIII. Evroul; of Hugh we shall hear again in the history both of Normandy and of England. Their pious uncle ap-Restoraproved of the design, but pointed out that the site which Saint they had chosen was lacking in the two great monastic Evroul. necessaries of wood and water.1 Let them rather join with him in restoring to its ancient splendour the fallen house of Saint Evroul, placed on a spot suited for every monastic want.2 Uncle and nephews joined their energies and their purses; the rights of Bec over the church and lands were exchanged for another estate, and the new Saint Evroul arose with the full licence of Duke William, of Archbishop Malger, and of the other Prelates of Normandy. Monks were brought from Jumièges, and a brother of that house, Theodoric by name, became the first Abbot of the new foundation.3 But the house seems to have been far less fortunate than Bec in its rulers. Theodoric after a while laid aside his office, driven to resignation, it is said, by the cabals of the co-founder Robert of Grantmesnil, who, having made his profession in the house, had obtained the rank of Prior.4 Robert was chosen to the Abbotship, but, a few years after, he was himself deposed, 1050.

1058.

1059.

1063.

ì

&lt;sup>1</sup> See above, p. 220.

&lt;sup>2</sup> William of Jumièges (vii. 23) puts into his mouth a long historical discourse, in which, I am sorry to say, he speaks of Charles the Simple as "filius Ludovici cognomine Nihil-fecit."

&lt;sup>2</sup> Ord. Vit. 461 C et seqq., 625 D. Will. Gem. vii. 23. He was the only monk for whom the cruel Mabel had any reverence. Ord. Vit. 470 A.

&lt;sup>4</sup> See his character, Ord. Vit. 467 D; his intrigues, 474 C et seqq.; his election, 477 A. He began a new church, but did not finish it, 480 C. He also gave to the house (468 B) an illuminated pealter—doubtless of English work—which the Lady Emma had given to her brother Archbishop Robert. His son William seemingly stole it from his father, and gave it to his wife Hadwisa, mother of Robert of Grantmesnil; "de camera patris sui familiariter sustulerat, dilectæque suæ conjugi Hadwisæ omnimodis placere volens detulerat." On Abbot Robert see also Will. Gem. vii. 26.

•

GHAP. VIII. his friend. He was also bountiful to the Church, though he strictly maintained the ecclesiastical privileges of his own lordships.2 Twice he made the pilgrimage to Jerusalem, once during the height of his prosperity, and once after the great misfortune which clouded his later days. For Blinded by he it was whom the fierce Talvas, in defiance of every tie William of gratitude, of hospitality, and of feudal honour, blinded Talvas. and mutilated when he came as a guest to his bridal.3 The daughter of Talvas too, the cruel Mabel, pursued the house of Geroy throughout life with unrelenting hatred.4 In his old age he became a monk at Bec, a house to which He grants Saint he had already been a benefactor. He had given to Herl-Evroul to Bec. win and his monks the lands of Saint Evroul and the church lately restored by Restold. It now became a cell to the Abbey, inhabited by a small body of monks with Lanfranc at their head.6 But presently William's nephews, Hugh and Robert of Grantmesnil, were designing the foundation of a monastery near the lordship on the Oudon from which they took their name.

&lt;sup>1</sup> He held lands of Count Geoffrey of Mantes, who was taken prisoner by William Talvas, who required the destruction of the castle of Montacute as his ransom. This castle belonged to William the son of Geroy, who at once destroyed it to bring about the liberation of his lord. Ord. Vit. 464 C.

Ord. Vit. 464 A. "Episcopales consuetudines Monasterioli et Escalfoii fundo habebat, nec ullus Archidiaconorum ibidem presbyteros ejusdem honoris circumvenire audebat."

&lt;sup>3</sup> See above, p. 185.

&lt;sup>5</sup> According to William of Jumièges (vii. 23), he died at Gaeta on his return from a mission of some sort (pro quibusdam rationalibus caussis) to Apulia.

&lt;sup>6</sup> Ord. Vit. 461 A. Chron. Becc. i. 195. This is doubtless the grange which Lanfranc found greatly troubled by rats. His biographer (i. 284, 285) cites it as a proof of his humility that he personally carried a cat to make war upon them.

They were the sons of Robert of Grantmesnil (see above, p. 199) and Hadwisa, daughter of Geroy (Orderic, 465 B). After Robert's death Hadwisa married William, son of Archbishop Robert. Their daughter Judith, having taken the veil, afterwards married Roger, Count of Sicily (484 B), but, as a punishment for her sacrilege, remained childless.

Of these two brothers, Robert became a monk of Saint CHAP. VIII. Evroul; of Hugh we shall hear again in the history both of Normandy and of England. Their pious uncle ap-Restoraproved of the design, but pointed out that the site which Saint they had chosen was lacking in the two great monastic Evroul. necessaries of wood and water.1 Let them rather join with him in restoring to its ancient splendour the fallen house of Saint Evroul, placed on a spot suited for every monastic want.2 Uncle and nephews joined their energies and their purses; the rights of Bec over the church and lands were exchanged for another estate, and the new Saint Evroul arose with the full licence of Duke William, of Archbishop Malger, and of the other Prelates of Normandy. Monks were brought from Jumièges, and a brother of that house, Theodoric by name, became the first Abbot of the new foundation.<sup>3</sup> But the house seems to have been far less fortunate than Bec in its rulers. Theodoric after a while laid aside his office, driven to resignation, it is said, by the cabals of the co-founder Robert of Grantmesnil, who, having made his profession in the house, had obtained the rank of Prior.4 Robert was chosen to the Abbotship, but, a few years after, he was himself deposed, 1050.

1058.

1059.

1063.

&lt;sup>1</sup> See above, p. 220.

&lt;sup>2</sup> William of Jumièges (vii. 23) puts into his mouth a long historical discourse, in which, I am sorry to say, he speaks of Charles the Simple as "filius Ludovici cognomine Nihil-fecit."

&lt;sup>2</sup> Ord. Vit. 461 C et seqq., 625 D. Will. Gem. vii. 23. He was the only monk for whom the cruel Mabel had any reverence. Ord. Vit. 470 A.

&lt;sup>4</sup> See his character, Ord. Vit. 467 D; his intrigues, 474 C et seqq.; his election, 477 A. He began a new church, but did not finish it, 480 C. He also gave to the house (468 B) an illuminated pealter—doubtless of English work—which the Lady Emma had given to her brother Archbishop Robert. His son William seemingly stole it from his father, and gave it to his wife Hadwisa, mother of Robert of Grantmesnil; "de camera patris sui familiariter sustulerat, dilectæque suæ conjugi Hadwisæ omnimodis placere volens detulerat." On Abbot Robert see also Will. Gem. vii. 26.

GHAP. VIII. his friend. He was also bountiful to the Church, though he strictly maintained the ecclesiastical privileges of his own lordships.2 Twice he made the pilgrimage to Jerusalem, once during the height of his prosperity, and once after the great misfortune which clouded his later days. For Blinded by he it was whom the fierce Talvas, in defiance of every tie William of gratitude, of hospitality, and of feudal honour, blinded Talvas. and mutilated when he came as a guest to his bridal.3 The daughter of Talvas too, the cruel Mabel, pursued the house of Geroy throughout life with unrelenting hatred.4 In his old age he became a monk at Bec, a house to which He grants Saint he had already been a benefactor. He had given to Herl-Evroul to Bec. win and his monks the lands of Saint Evroul and the church lately restored by Restold. It now became a cell to the Abbey, inhabited by a small body of monks with Lanfranc at their head.6 But presently William's nephews, Hugh and Robert of Grantmesnil, were designing the foundation of a monastery near the lordship on the Oudon from which they took their name.

&lt;sup>1</sup> He held lands of Count Geoffrey of Mantes, who was taken prisoner by William Talvas, who required the destruction of the castle of Montacute as his ransom. This castle belonged to William the son of Geroy, who at once destroyed it to bring about the liberation of his lord. Ord. Vit. 464 C.

Ord. Vit. 464 A. "Episcopales consuetudines Monasterioli et Escalfoii fundo habebat, nec ullus Archidiaconorum ibidem presbyteros ejusdem honoris circumvenire audebat."

&lt;sup>3</sup> See above, p. 185.

<sup>4 578</sup> A.

&lt;sup>5</sup> According to William of Jumièges (vii. 23), he died at Gaeta on his return from a mission of some sort (pro quibusdam rationalibus caussis) to Apulia.

<sup>6</sup> Ord. Vit. 461 A. Chron. Becc. i. 195. This is doubtless the grange which Lanfranc found greatly troubled by rats. His biographer (i. 284, 285) cites it as a proof of his humility that he personally carried a cat to make war upon them.

They were the sons of Robert of Grantmesnil (see above, p. 199) and Hadwisa, daughter of Geroy (Orderic, 465 B). After Robert's death Hadwisa married William, son of Archbishop Robert. Their daughter Judith, having taken the veil, afterwards married Roger, Count of Sicily (484 B), but, as a punishment for her sacrilege, remained childless.

Of these two brothers, Robert became a monk of Saint CHAP. VIII. Evroul; of Hugh we shall hear again in the history both of Normandy and of England. Their pious uncle ap-Restoraproved of the design, but pointed out that the site which Saint they had chosen was lacking in the two great monastic Evroul. necessaries of wood and water.1 Let them rather join with him in restoring to its ancient splendour the fallen house of Saint Evroul, placed on a spot suited for every monastic want.2 Uncle and nephews joined their energies and their purses; the rights of Bec over the church and lands were exchanged for another estate, and the new Saint Evroul arose with the full licence of Duke William, of Archbishop Malger, and of the other Prelates of Normandy. Monks were brought from Jumièges, and a brother of that house, Theodoric by name, became the first Abbot of the new foundation.<sup>3</sup> But the house seems to have been far less fortunate than Bec in its rulers. Theodoric after a while laid aside his office, driven to resignation, it is said, by the cabals of the co-founder Robert of Grantmesnil, who, having made his profession in the house, had obtained the rank of Prior.4 Robert was chosen to the Abbotship, but, a few years after, he was himself deposed, 1063.

1058.

1059.

<sup>1</sup> See above, p. 220.

&lt;sup>2</sup> William of Jumièges (vii. 23) puts into his mouth a long historical discourse, in which, I am sorry to say, he speaks of Charles the Simple as "filius Ludovici cognomine Nihil-fecit."

&lt;sup>2</sup> Ord. Vit. 461 C et seqq., 625 D. Will. Gem. vii. 23. He was the only monk for whom the cruel Mabel had any reverence. Ord. Vit. 470 A.

&lt;sup>4</sup> See his character, Ord. Vit. 467 D; his intrigues, 474 C et seqq.; his election, 477 A. He began a new church, but did not finish it, 480 C. He also gave to the house (468 B) an illuminated pealter—doubtless of English work—which the Lady Emma had given to her brother Archbishop Robert. His son William seemingly stole it from his father, and gave it to his wife Hadwisa, mother of Robert of Grantmesnil; "de camera patris sui familiariter sustulerat, dilectæque suæ conjugi Hadwisæ omnimodis placere volens detulerat." On Abbot Robert see also Will. Gem. vii. 26.

GHAP. VIII. his friend. He was also bountiful to the Church, though he strictly maintained the ecclesiastical privileges of his own lordships.2 Twice he made the pilgrimage to Jerusalem, once during the height of his prosperity, and once after the great misfortune which clouded his later days. For Blinded by he it was whom the fierce Talvas, in defiance of every tie William of gratitude, of hospitality, and of feudal honour, blinded Talvas. and mutilated when he came as a guest to his bridal.<sup>3</sup> The daughter of Talvas too, the cruel Mabel, pursued the house of Geroy throughout life with unrelenting hatred.4 In his old age he became a monk at Bec, a house to which He grants Saint he had already been a benefactor. He had given to Herl-Evroul to Bec. win and his monks the lands of Saint Evroul and the church lately restored by Restold. It now became a cell to the Abbey, inhabited by a small body of monks with Lanfranc at their head.6 But presently William's nephews, Hugh and Robert of Grantmesnil,7 were designing the foundation of a monastery near the lordship on the Oudon from which they took their name.

&lt;sup>1</sup> He held lands of Count Geoffrey of Mantes, who was taken prisoner by William Talvas, who required the destruction of the castle of Montacute as his ransom. This castle belonged to William the son of Geroy, who at once destroyed it to bring about the liberation of his lord. Ord. Vit. 464 C.

Ord. Vit. 464 A. "Episcopales consuetudines Monasterioli et Escalfoii fundo habebat, nec ullus Archidiaconorum ibidem presbyteros ejusdem honoris circumvenire audebat."

&lt;sup>3</sup> See above, p. 185.

<sup>4 578</sup> A. <sup>5</sup> According to William of Jumièges (vii. 23), he died at Gaeta on his return from a mission of some sort (pro quibusdam rationalibus caussis) to Apulia.

<sup>6</sup> Ord. Vit. 461 A. Chron. Becc. i. 195. This is doubtless the grange which Lanfranc found greatly troubled by rats. His biographer (i. 284, 285) cites it as a proof of his humility that he personally carried a cat to make war upon them.

&lt;sup>7</sup> They were the sons of Robert of Grantmesnil (see above, p. 199) and Hadwisa, daughter of Geroy (Orderic, 465 B). After Robert's death Hadwisa married William, son of Archbishop Robert. Their daughter Judith, having taken the veil, afterwards married Roger, Count of Sicily (484 B), but, as a punishment for her sacrilege, remained childless.

Of these two brothers, Robert became a monk of Saint CHAP. VIII. Evroul; of Hugh we shall hear again in the history both of Normandy and of England. Their pious uncle ap-Restorsproved of the design, but pointed out that the site which Saint they had chosen was lacking in the two great monastic Evroul. necessaries of wood and water.1 Let them rather join with him in restoring to its ancient splendour the fallen house of Saint Evroul, placed on a spot suited for every monastic want.2 Uncle and nephews joined their energies and their purses; the rights of Bec over the church and lands were exchanged for another estate, and the new Saint Evroul arose with the full licence of Duke William, of Archbishop Malger, and of the other Prelates of Normandy. Monks were brought from Jumièges, and a brother of that house, Theodoric by name, became the first Abbot of the new foundation.3 But the house seems to have been far less fortunate than Bec in its rulers. Theodoric after a while laid aside his office, driven to resignation, it is said, by the cabals of the co-founder Robert of Grantmesnil, who, having made his profession in the house, had obtained the rank of Prior.4 Robert was chosen to the Abbotship, but, a few years after, he was himself deposed, 1063.

1050.

1058.

1059.

<sup>1</sup> See above, p. 220.

&lt;sup>2</sup> William of Jumièges (vii. 23) puts into his mouth a long historical discourse, in which, I am sorry to say, he speaks of Charles the Simple as "filius Ludovici cognomine Nihil-fecit."

&lt;sup>2</sup> Ord. Vit. 461 C et seqq., 625 D. Will. Gem. vii. 23. He was the only monk for whom the cruel Mabel had any reverence. Ord. Vit. 470 A.

&lt;sup>4</sup> See his character, Ord. Vit. 467 D; his intrigues, 474 C et seqq.; his election, 477 A. He began a new church, but did not finish it, 480 C. He also gave to the house (468 B) an illuminated pealter—doubtless of English work—which the Lady Emma had given to her brother Archbishop Robert. His son William seemingly stole it from his father, and gave it to his wife Hadwisa, mother of Robert of Grantmesnil; "de camera patris sui familiariter sustulerat, dilectæque suæ conjugi Hadwisæ omnimodis placere voiens detulerat." On Abbot Robert see also Will. Gem. vii. 26.

CHAP. VIII. or driven to resignation, by Duke William, and long controversies followed between him and his successor Osbern.<sup>2</sup> of the religious movement in Normandy with the Conquest

I have given a sketch of the origin of these two famous monasteries, partly because their stories bring before us so many members of the leading Norman families, but mainly Connexion as illustrating the great religious movement which was then at work in Normandy, and which was not without its share in bringing about the Conquest of England. When we come to a later stage in our history, we shall see with what art William, and his trusty counsellor of England. Lanfranc, contrived to appeal to the religious feelings of the Normans, to represent the English King as a sinner against the local saints of Normandy, and to represent the Conquest of England as a holy war undertaken to chastise the ungodly. Such a vein of sentiment could hardly have been safely appealed to except at a time when there was a great religious stir in the national mind. One side of this movement is shown in the foundation of so many monasteries, in the zeal with which men gave of their substance for their erection, in the eagerness with which men, often the same men, pressed to become members of the holy brotherhoods. But a still more honourable fruit of the religious mind of Normandy, one however which Normandy only shared with many other parts of Europe, is to be found in the acceptance during this period of the famous Truce of God.

The Truce of God.

This extraordinary institution is the most speaking witness, at once to the ferocity of the times, and also to the deep counter feeling which underlaid men's minds. CHAP. VIII. Clergy and laity alike felt that the state of things which they saw daily before their eyes was a standing sin against God and man, repugnant alike to natural humanity and to the precepts of the Christian religion. States were everywhere so subdivided, governments were everywhere so weak, that, in most parts of Europe, every man who had the needful force at his command simply did that which was right in his own eyes. We cannot doubt that in those parts of Britain where the authority of the English Kings was really established, the evil was smaller than it was in any part of Gaul. 1 Neither can we doubt that in Normandy, during the minority of William, the evil was even greater than it was in other parts of Gaul. But the extreme disorder of that minority was simply an exaggerated form of what might be called the normal state of things throughout the greater part of Western Europe. Every man claimed the right of private war Private against every other man who was not bound to him by war. any special tie as his lord or his vassal. And the distinction between private war and mere robbery and murder was not always very sharply drawn. It is clear that, in such a state of things, an utterly unscrupulous man, to whom warfare, however unjust, was a mere trifle, had a decided advantage over his more peaceable neighbours. A few such men as William Talvas might throw a whole province into disorder; and men who were in no way naturally disposed to wrong or violence were necessarily driven to constant warfare in sheer self-defence. The poor and the weak were of course the chief victims; when one gentleman harried the lands of another, the immediate tillers of the earth must have suffered far more severely &lt;sup>1</sup> Was the Truce of God ever preached, or ever needed, in England? I am not aware of any mention of it, unless the so-called Laws of Eadward, c. 2 (Schmid, 492), at all refer to it. See below, p. 238.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Ord. Vit. 481 B.

&lt;sup>2</sup> The whole story is given at some length in Neustria Pia, pp. 104-110. But remark the expression of William of Jumièges (vii. 23), "multos labores postea in procuratione servorum Dei perpessus est." There were probably two sides to his story, as to most others.

Undercurrent against the violence of the time.

CHAP. VIII. than their master. It was the tenants of Herlwin, rather than Herlwin himself, who had most bitterly to complain of the ravages of Count Gilbert. The lower classes then had especial reason to curse the lawlessness of the times; yet we can well believe that there were many men of higher rank, who were dragged into these wretched contests against their own will, and who would have been well pleased to keep their swords sheathed, save when the lawful command of their sovereign required them to be drawn. These two contending feelings can always be traced side by side. Every attempt to put any kind of check on the violence of the times was always received with general good will; and yet the practical result of so many praiseworthy attempts was, after all, something extremely small. The men who were ready to keep the peace, and to observe the rules made to preserve it, were left in a manner at the mercy of those who refused to obey any rule whatsoever. Whatever laws were made to preserve the peace, the peaceable man was still, as before, driven to fight in his own defence. Still the movement in favour of law and order was a very remarkable and a very general one. The call to observe peace towards Christians at home was a call, quite as general, though much more gradual, than the call to wage war against the Infidels in other lands. But the call to the Crusade fell in with every side of the temper of the times; the proclamation of the Truce of God fell in with only one, and that its least powerful, side. Good and bad men alike were led by widely different motives to rush to the Holy The men who endeavoured to obey the Truce of God must often have found themselves the helpless victims of those who despised it.

Comparison between the Truce of God and the Crusades.

A movement on behalf of peace and good will towards

&lt;sup>1</sup> See above, p. 218. .

men could not fail in those days to assume an ecclesiastical CHAP. VIII. form. As of old the Amphiktyonic Council, the great The form taken by religious synod of Greece, strove to put some bounds to the movethe horrors of war as waged between Greek and Greek, cessarily so now, in the same spirit, a series of Christian synods ecclesiasstrove, by means of ecclesiastical decrees and ecclesiastical censures, to put some bounds to the horrors of war as waged between Christian and Christian. And at both Moderatimes the spiritual power showed its wisdom in not at-tion of the tempting too much. War was not wholly forbidden in tempted. either case, for such a precept would have been hopelessly impossible to carry out. But certain extreme measures were to be avoided, certain classes of persons were to be respected, certain holy seasons were to be kept altogether free from warfare. Such at least was the form in which the Truce of God was preached in Normandy. But Normandy was one of the last countries to receive the Truce, and it seems not to have appeared there in its earliest shape. It would rather seem as if the first attempts at its establishment had tried to compass too much, and as if later preachers of peace had been driven to content themselves with a much less close approach to universal brotherhood. The movement began in Aqui-The Truce taine, and the vague and rhetorical language of our autho-preached rity would seem to imply that all war, at any rate all in Aquiprivate war, was forbidden under pain of ecclesiastical 1034. censures.2 It must not be forgotten that, in that age, it

&lt;sup>1</sup> See History of Federal Government, i. 128.

&lt;sup>2</sup> The account is in R. Glaber, iv. 5. "Tunc ergo primiths coepere in Aquitaniæ partibus ab Episcopis et Abbatibus, ceterisque viris sacræ religionis devotis ex universa plebe, coadunati conciliorum conventus." He goes on to give a summary of their legislation; "In quibus potissimum erat de inviolabili pace conservanda, ut scilicet viri utriusque conditionis, cujuscumque antea fuissent rei obnoxii, absque formidine procederent armis vacui Prædo namque aut invasor alterius facultatis, legum districtione arctatus, vel donis facultatum seu pœnis corporis acerrime mulctaretur. Locis nihilominus sacris omnium ecclesiarum honor et reverentia talis

Difficulty of defining private war.

CHAP. VIII. must have been exceedingly difficult to draw the distinction between public and private war. In England indeed, public and where an efficient constitutional system existed, the distinction was plain. Except when sudden invasion required the immediate action of the local power, no war could be lawful which was not decreed by the King and his Witan. There might be rebellions and civil wars, but there was no recognized private warfare in the continental sense. But in Gaul it would have been impossible to deny the right of war and peace to the great vassals of the Crown, to the sovereigns of Normandy and Aquitaine. And, if the vassals of the Crown might make war on each other, on what principle could the same right be refused to their vassals, to the Lords of Alençon and Brionne? Among the endless links of the feudal chain, it was hard to find the exact point where sovereignty ended and where simple property began. A preacher therefore who denounced private war must have had some difficulty in so doing without denouncing war altogether. But the doctrine, hard as it might be to carry out in practice, was rapturously received at its first announcement. As the first preaching of the Crusade was met with one universal cry of "God wills it," so the Bishops, Abbots, and other preachers of the Truce were met with a like universal cry of Peace, Peace, Peace. Men bound themselves to God and to one another to abstain from all wrong and violence, and they engaged solemnly to renew the > exhiberetur, ut si quis ad ea cujuscumque culpæ obnoxius confugium faceret, illæsus evaderet, nisi solummodò ille qui pactum prædictæ pacis violässet, hic tamen captus ab altare præstitutam vindictam lueret. Clericis similiter omnibus, monachis, et sanctimonialibus, ut si quis cum eis per regionem pergeret nullam vim ab aliquo pateretur." He adds some more purely religious provisions about fasting and the like.

Enthusiastic reception of the Truce.

> <sup>1</sup> R. Glaber, iv. 5. "Quibus universi, tanto ardore accensi ut per manus Episcoporum baculum ad cœlum elevarent, ipsique palmis extensis ad Deum, Pax, pax, unanimiter clamarent. Ut esset videlicet signum perpetui pacti de hoc, quod spoponderant inter se et Deum."

T.

红:

¥

, d

. c.

,

g :

B' 5

4

¥. (

•

ſ,

obligation every five years.1 From Aquitaine the move- CHAP. VIII. ment spread through Burgundy, royal and ducal.2 it seems to have been gradually found that the establishment of perfect peace on earth was hopeless. After seven Relaxation years from the first preaching of peace, we find the requirements of its apostles greatly relaxed. It was found vain to forbid all war, even all private war. All that was now attempted was to forbid violence of every kind from the evening of Wednesday till the morning of Monday.3 It was in this shape that the Truce was first preached in Reception northern and eastern Gaul. The days of Christ's supper, Truce in of His passion, of His rest in the grave and His resurrec- Burgundy and Lothation, were all to be kept free from strife and bloodshed. ringia. The Burgundian Bishops were zealous in the cause; so especially was Richard, Bishop of Verdun in Lotharingia.4 But Bishop Gerard of Cambray maintained, on the other

- <sup>1</sup> R. Glaber, iv. 5. "In hac tamen ratione ut evoluto quinquennio confirmandse pacis gratia id ipsum ab universis in orbe fieret mirum in modum."
- <sup>2</sup> Ib. "Dehine per Arelatensem provinciam atque Lugdunensem, sieque per universam Burgundiam usque in ultimas Franciæ partes, per universos episcopatus indictum est qualiter certis in locis à præsulibus magnatisque totius patrize de reformanda pace et sacrze fidei institutione celebrarentur concilia." In Martène and Durand's Thesaurus, i. 159, is a circular letter on the subject from Ragenbald, Archbishop of Arles, and other Burgundian Prelates.
- 3 Rudolf, under the year 1041 (v. 1, Duchèsne, Rer. Franc. Scriptt. iv. 55 A), recurs to the subject; "Contigit verd ipso in tempore, inspirante divina gratia, primitus in partibus Aquitanicis, deinde paullatim per universum Galliarum territorium firmari pactum propter timorem Dei pariter et amorem. Taliter ut nemo mortalium, à feriæ quartæ vespere usque ad secundam feriam incipiente luce, ausu temerario præsumeret quippiam alicui hominum per vim auferre, neque ultionis vindictam à quocumque inimico exigere, nec etiam à fideijussore vadimonium sumere. Quod si ab aliquo fieri contigisset contra hoc decretum publicum, aut de vita componeret aut à Christianorum consortio expulsus patria pelleretur. Hoc insuper placuit universis, veluti vulgò dicitur, ut Treuga Domini vocaretur." I conceive this relaxation to mark a change from the Pax Dei to the Treuga Dei. See Ducange in Treuga, and Palgrave, iii. 201. Something must be allowed to the inherent confusion of Rudolf's way of expressing himself.

&lt;sup>4</sup> Hugo Flav. Chron. ap. Pertz, viii. 403.

Opposition of Gerard of Cambray.

CHAP. VIII. hand, that the whole affair was no concern of the ecclesiastical power. It was, he argued, the business of temporal rulers to fight, and the business of spiritual men to pray; the pious scheme of his brethren could never be carried out, and the attempt to enforce it could lead only to an increase of false-swearing.1 This Prelate, in his worldly wisdom, seems to have looked deeper into the hearts of the men of his time than his more hopeful and enthusiastic brethren. At last the new teaching reached Normandy. The luxury of mutual destruction was dear to the Norman mind; for a long time any restraint upon it was strongly resisted, and even the preaching of Bishop Richard himself had for a long time no effect.<sup>2</sup> Miracles were needed to convince so stiff-necked a generation, but at last the apostolic labours of Hagano, the successor of Richard, The Truce brought even Normandy to a better mind.3 The young Duke and his counsellors were urgent in behalf of the cils of Caen Truce, and it was at last received by the Clergy and Laity of Normandy in the famous Council held for that purpose at Caen. We are told that it was most carefully received at the Coun-[1042],

> Gest. Epp. Cam. ap. Pertz, vii. 474, 485. Gerard's objections are given at great length, and are well worth studying, as a setting forth of the Regale and Pontificale. Some of the French Bishops seemed to have ventured on a pious fraud; "Unus eorum cœlitùs sibi delatas dixit esse literas, que pacem monerent renovandam in terra." The chronicler of Cambray quite approves the opposition of the local Prelate; "Alia quoque importabilia quamplurima dederunt mandata, que oneri visa sunt replicare. Hac novitate pulsatus mandati præsul noster, infirmitatique peccantium condescendens, secundum decreta sanctorum patrum ad singula suum formavit eloquium."

> <sup>2</sup> Hugo Flav. ap. Pertz, viii. 403. "Quam quum noluisset recipere gens Neustriæ, viro Dei Richardo prædicante, et ut cam susciperent, quia voluntas Domini erat, et à Deo non ab homine decretum, hoc processerat, admonente divino judicio cœpit in eos desævire ignis qui eos torquebat ; eo anno ferê totus orbis [was the whole world plagued for the sins of Normandy !] penuriam passus est pro raritate vini et tritici. Sequuta est è vestigio mortalitas hominibus præmaxima ab inc. Dom. 1042." This passage is made up out of R. Glaber (u. s.), where however Richard is not mentioned. <sup>3</sup> Hugo Flav. u. s.

<sup>4</sup> The decree of the synod of Caen is given at length in the Concilia

observed; but, nearly forty years after, when the long CHAP. VIII. reign of William was drawing towards its end, it had to be again ordained in another Council at Lillebonne, and all the and Lillepowers of the State, ecclesiastical and temporal, were called bonne [1080]. on to help in enforcing its observance.2

The men who laboured to put even this small check on the violence of the times are worthy of eternal honour, and it is probable that the institution of the Truce of God really did something for a while to lessen the frightful anarchy into which Normandy had fallen. But we can hardly doubt that a far more effectual check was supplied by the increasing strength of William's government, as he drew nearer to manhood, and more and more fully displayed the stern and vigorous determination of his character. But neither the one nor the other could avail wholly to preserve Normandy for some years to come either from civil war or from foreign invasion. A far Wide more deeply spread conspiracy than any that we have as spread conspiracy yet heard of was now formed against the Duke. We have against William. now reached one of the great epochs in the life of the 1047. Conqueror; we shall soon have to tell of his first battle Rotomagensis Provinciæ, p. 39. The Fathers are stringent against "caballicationes et hostilitates." The main decree runs, "In pace quæ vulgò dicitur Trevia Dei, et que die Mercurii sole occidente incipit, et die Lunæ sole nascente finit, hæc quæ dicam vobis promptissimå mente dehinc inantea debetis observare. Nullus homo nec femina hominem aut feminam usquam assaliat, nec vulneret, nec occidat, nec castellum, nec burgum, nec villam in hoc spatio quatuor dierum et quinque noctium assaliat nec deprædetur nec capiat, nec ardeat ullo ingenio aut violentia aut aliqua fraude." See Roman de Rou, 10485 et seqq. The church of Sainte Paix at Caen was built to commemorate the event, but Prevost (note to Roman de Rou, ii. 99) places its building in 1061.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Will. Pict. 113 (Giles). "Sanctissime in Normannia observabatur sacramentum pacis quam Treviam vocant, quod effrænis regionum aliarum iniquitas frequenter temerat."

&lt;sup>2</sup> Ord. Vit. 552 A. It was confirmed again for Christendom generally. at the Council of Clermont in 1095. Will. Malms. iii. 345.

Intrigues of Guy of ship with the Duke, and his large possessions.

CHAP. VIII. and his first victory. Within a few years after the proclamation of the Truce of God, not this or that isolated Baron, but the whole of the most Norman part of Normandy rose in open revolt against its sovereign. The Burgundy. prime mover in the rebellion was Guy of Burgundy.1 He His friend- had been brought up with the Duke as his friend and kinsman,<sup>2</sup> and he had received large possessions from his bounty. Among other broad lands, he held Vernon, the border fortress on the Seine, so often taken and retaken in the wars between France and Normandy. He held also Brionne, the castle on the Risle, lately the home of William's faithful guardian Count Gilbert.<sup>3</sup> But the old jealousy was never lulled to sleep; the sway of the Bastard was insupportable, and, the greater the qualities that William displayed, the more insupportable was it doubtless felt to be. William had now reached manhood. After such a discipline as he had gone through, his nineteen years of life had given him all the caution and experience of a far more advanced age. He was as ready and as able to show himself a born leader of men as Cnut had been at the same time of life.4 The turbulent spirits of Normandy began to feel that they had found a master; unless a blow were struck in time, the days of anarchy and licence, the days of castle-building and oppression, would Guy of Brionne therefore found many soon be over. lords of the ready listeners, especially among the great lords of the Beesin and true Norman land west of the Dive. He, the lawful heir of their Dukes, no bastard, no tanner's grandson, but sprung of a lawful marriage between the princely houses

He plots with the Côtentin.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Will. Pict. 80 (Giles). "Hujus vesanise signifer prosiluit Guido." Will. Malms. iii. 230. "Sator discordiarum erat Guido quidam."

&lt;sup>2</sup> Will. Pict. u. s. "A puerilibus annis cum ipeo familiariter nutritus." Will. Gem. vii. 17. "Crudelem convivam . . . qui cum eo à puerilibus annis educatus fuerat." Will. Malms. u. s. "Convictus familiaritatem, familiaritas amicitias, paraverat." So Roman de Rou, 8758 et seqq.

&lt;sup>3</sup> See above, p. 194.

&lt;sup>4</sup> See val. i. p. 404.

of Burgundy and Normandy, claimed the Duchy as his oner. vin. right by birth. But, if the lords of the Bessin and the Scheme for Côtentin would aid him in dispossessing the Bastard, he of the would willingly share the land with them.2 This most Duchy. probably means that he would content himself with the more purely French parts of the Duchy, the original grant to Rolf, and would leave the Barons of the later settlements in the enjoyment of independence. We can thus understand, what at first sight seems puzzling, why the cause of Guy was taken up with such zeal. Otherwise it is hard to see why the chiefs of any part of Normandy, and, above all, the chiefs of this more strictly Scandinavian part, should cast aside a prince who was at any rate a native Norman, in favour of one whose connexion with Normandy was only by the spindle-side, and who must have seemed in their eyes little better than a Frenchman. We can thus Geograalso understand the geographical division of parties during division of the war which followed. William is faithfully supported Parties; by the French districts to the East; by Rouen and the

<sup>1</sup> William, in his autobiography in Orderic (657 A), is made to say, "Ille [Guido] verò verbis et actibus mihi derogavit, me nothum degeneremque et principatu indignum detestatus judicavit et hostiliter diffamavit." Roman de Rou, 8770;

> "De Willeame aveit grant envie, Ki sor li aveit seignorie, Cumenca sei à corucier, Et Normendie à chalengier; Reprovout li sa batardie."

So again, 8782;

"N'i a, dist il, plus proçain eir, Ki Normendie deie aveir: Pere sa mere fu Richart, D'espuse esteit, n'ert pas bastart."

<sup>2</sup> Roman de Rou, 8786;

"E ki li voldreit fere dreit, Normendie li apendreit, E se meintenir le volcient Ensemle od li le partireient."

So Will. Pict. 8o. "Sed aut principatum aut maximam portionem Normannia ambiebat."

to William.

Bayeux and the Danish lands join the rebellion.

CHAP. VIII. whole land to the right of the Dive. These are the dis-Rouen and tricts which the division between Guy and the confederate lands loyal Lords would have given to the Burgundian prince, and which no doubt armed zealously against any such arrange-To them the overthrow of William's authority ment. meant their own handing over to a foreign ruler. But to the inhabitants, at any rate to the great lords, of the Lower Normandy, the Scandinavian land, it would seem that the struggle against the ducal power was simply a struggle for renewed independence. We are told that the sympathies of the mass of the people, even in the Bessin and the Côtentin, lay with William.1 This is quite possible. The peasant revolt may well have left behind it some root of abiding bitterness, bitterness which would show itself far more strongly against the immediate lords of the soil than against the distant sovereign, who is, in such cases, always looked to as a possible protector. But the great lords of the western districts joined eagerly in the rebellion; and the smaller gentry, willingly or unwillingly, followed their banners. The descendants of the second colony of Rolf,2 of the colonies of William Longsword and Harold Blaatand, drew the sword against the domination of the districts which, even a hundred years before, had become French.<sup>3</sup> Saxon Bayeux and Danish Coutances rose against Romanized Rouen and Evreux. We know not whether the old speech and the old worship may not still have lingered in some out-of-the-way corners; it is certain that the difference in feeling between the two districts was still living and working, just as the outward difference is still to this day stamped on their inhabitants. The foremost men of western Normandy at once attached themselves to Guy, and joined zealously in his plans. First in the revolt was Nigel or Neal of Saint Saviour,

Rebel leaders :

<sup>1</sup> Roman de Rou, 8896 et seqq.

&lt;sup>2</sup> See vol. i. p. 199.

&lt;sup>3</sup> See vol. i. p. 216.

Ľ.

Ľ

5

Viscount of Coutances, the son of the chief who had, forty- CHAP. VIII. six years before, beaten back the host of Æthelred.2 The elder Neal of Saint Neal had died, full of years, during the days of anarchy,3 Saviour. and his son was destined to an equally long possession of his honours. In the very heart of his peninsula stood his castle by the Ouve, already consecrated by a small college of Canons, the foundation of his grandfather Roger, soon to give way to his own famous Abbey of Saint Saviour.4 This point formed the natural centre of the whole conspiracy. From that castle, Neal, the ruler of the Côtentin, commanded the whole of that varied region, its rich meads, its hills and valleys, its rocks and marshes, the dreary landes by the great minster of Lessay, the cliffs which look down on the fortress of Cæsar, and which had stood as beacons to guide the sails of Harold Blaatand to the rescue.<sup>5</sup> The Viscount of Saint Saviour now became the chief leader of the rebellion, won over by the promises and gifts of Guy, who did not scruple to rob his mother of her possessions, and to bestow them on his ally.6 With Neal

- <sup>1</sup> Both Neals bear the title of Viscount of the Côtentin, but others also bore it in their lifetime. See Delisle, Histoire du Château et des Sires de Saint-Sauveur-le-Vicomte (Valognes, 1867), p. 23. The collection of Charters in this work is most valuable.
- <sup>2</sup> See vol. i. p. 330. The three chief conspirators, Neal, Randolf, and Hamon, are mentioned in various accounts. Will. Pict. 80. Will. Malms. iii. 230. Roman de Rou, 8748, 8778. William of Jumièges (vii. 17) speaks of Guy and Neal ("Nigellus Constantiensis presses") only.
  - <sup>3</sup> In 1040 or 1042. Delisle, p. 3.
- The Abbey was founded by Neal himself in the next year, 1048, according to Neustria Pia, 540. Cotman, Antiquities of Normandy, i. 9. But what seems to be Neal's foundation charter in Delisle (Preuves, p. 42; cf. 55, 59) is placed by him in 1080.
- See vol. i. p. 243, for Harold Blastand's occupation of Cherbourg. I cannot however believe that Cherbourg is really "Cæsaris burgus." Is it not rather the same word as Scarborough?
- This very curious fact comes out in a Charter of the Abbey of the Holy Trinity at Caen, printed by Mr. Stapleton in the Archæologia, xxvi. 355. "Adeliza, Ricardi Comitis filia, Ricardi Comitis soror, contra eumdem prædictum fratrem suum, scilicet Robertum Comitem, castrum quid dicitur Hulme in Constantino situm cum omnibus ibidem pertinentibus mercata est.

Randolf,

Bayeux.

Hamon

CHAP. VIII. stood Randolf, Viscount of Bayeux, who, from his castle of Brichessart, held the same sway over the Saxons of the Viscount of Bessin which Neal held over the Danes of the Côtentin.<sup>1</sup> In the same company was Hamon, lord of Thorigny, lord Dentatus. too of the steep of Creuilly, where a vast fabric of later times has displaced his ancient donjon, and where the adjoining church bears witness to the splendour and bounty of the generation immediately following his own.2 Some personal peculiarity entitled him to bear, in the language of our Latin chroniclers, one of the most glorious cognomina of old Rome, and Hamon Dentatus became the forefather of men famous in British as well as in Norman history.3 One loyal chronicler, in his zeal, speaks of the rebel by the strange name of Antichrist; but, as in the case of Thurstan of Falaise, the stain was wiped out in > Quod postea Guido filius suus, injusté sibi auferens, dedit illud Nigello Vicecomiti." See also Stapleton, Roll of Exchequer, ii. xxix. The charter bears date in 1075, when Adeliza was still living.

> the next generation. His son, Robert Fitz-Hamon, was destined to set the seal to the work of Offa and of Harold, to press down the yoke for ever upon the necks of the southern Cymry, and to surround his princely fortress of

<sup>1</sup> Roman de Rou, 8938.

<sup>2</sup> Ib. 9182;

"Dan As Dens esteit un Normant De fié è d'homes bien poissant, Sire esteit de Thorignie E de Mezi è de Croillie."

On Crevilly church and castle, see Cotman, ii. 91. De Caumont, i. 320.

3 William of Malmesbury introduces him (ii. 230) as "Haimo Dentatus [Dan As Dens], avus Roberti quo nostro tempore in Anglia multarum possessionum incubator exstitit." Robert died of a wound received at Tinchebrai, 1106 (Will. Malms. v. 398), and his daughter Mabel married the famous Robert Earl of Gloucester (Hist. Nov. i. 3).

<sup>4</sup> Benoît, 32, 742;

"Per cel Rannol de Beiesin, E par Neel de Costentin. E par Hamun une Antecriz."

The expression is very strange, but it is so taken by M. Le Cointe (see Appendix O), and I see not what else it can mean.

Cardiff with the lowlier castles of his twelve homagers of CHAP. VIII. the land of Morganwg. Hardly less famous was a third Grimbald Baron from the Saxon land, Grimbald of Plessis, whose ancestors and whose descendants have won no renown, but whose own name still remains impressed upon his fortress, and whose sister's son became the forefather of a mighty house in England. Of her stock came William of Albini, who, like the Tudor of later days, won the love of a widowed Queen, and whose name still lives among his works in the fortresses of Arundel and Castle Rising.1 By the help of these men the claims of the Burgundian became widely acknowledged. They swore to support his rights, and to deprive the Bastard of the Duchy which he had invaded, whether by force of arms or by the baser acts of treachery. They put their castles into a state of Preparathorough defence; they stored them for a campaign or tions for the revolt. a siege,<sup>2</sup> and made ready for the most extensive and thoroughly organized revolt which the troubled reign of the young Duke had yet beheld.

The revolt began, as an earlier revolt had begun,<sup>3</sup> with a treacherous attempt to seize or murder the Duke, in which Grimbald seems to have been the immediate agent.<sup>4</sup>

The opportunity was tempting, as William was now at Attempt to seize a point in Neal's own Viscounty, at no great distance from William at his own castle. He was at Valognes, the old town so rich Valognes. in Roman remains, and the rich and fanciful outline of whose Gothic cupola is one of the most striking objects in

&lt;sup>1</sup> Taylor's Wace, 11. Castle Rising is eminently the castle of dowager Queens, the earlier parts having been built for Adeliza, and the later for Isabella, mother of Edward the Third.

Roman de Rou, 8796;

&quot;Issi unt lur chastels garniz Fossez parcéz, dreciéz paliz."

&lt;sup>3</sup> See above, p. 197.

&lt;sup>4</sup> See Roman de Rou, 9347 et seqq. For the present story see vv. 8800-8895, and Palgrave, iii. 212.

CHAP. VIII. the architecture of the district. Perhaps some scent of the coming danger had reached him, and he had ventured into the enemy's country in order to search out matters for himself. But, in any case, he did not neglect the chosen amusement to which he and his race were given up, even beyond other men of their time. Several days had been spent in the employment of William's favourite weapon the bow1 against either savage or harmless victims. At William last, one night, when all his party, except his immediate warned by household, had left him, while he was yet in his first sleep, his fool. Gallet his fool, like his uncle Walter at an earlier stage of his life,<sup>2</sup> burst into his room, staff in hand, and aroused him. If he did not arise and flee for his life, he would never leave the Côtentin a living man. The Duke arose, His escape. half dressed in haste, leaped on his horse, seemingly alone, and rode for his life all that night. A bright moon guided him, and he pressed on till he reached the estuary formed by the rivers Ouve and Vire. There the ebbing tide supplied a ford, which was afterwards known as the Duke's Way. William crossed in safety, and landed in the district of Bayeux, near the church of Saint Clement. He entered the building, and prayed for God's help on his way. His natural course would now have been to strike for Bayeux; but the city was in the hands of his enemies; he determined therefore to keep the line between Bayeux and the sea, and thus to take his chance of reaching the loyal districts. As the sun rose, he drew near to the church and castle of Rye,3 the dwelling-place of a faithful vassal named Hubert. The Lord of Rye was standing at his own gate, between the church and the mound on CHAP. VIII. which his castle was raised.1 William was still urging on tion by his foaming horse past the gate; but Hubert knew and Hubert of stopped his sovereign, and asked the cause of this headlong He heard that the Duke was flying for his life ride. before his enemies. He welcomed his prince to his house, he set him on a fresh horse, he bade his three sons ride by his side, and never leave him till he was safely lodged in his own castle of Falaise.2 The command of their He reaches father was faithfully executed by his loyal sons. We are not surprised to hear that the house of Rye rose high in William's favour; and we can hardly grudge them their share in the lands of England, when we find that Eudes the son of Hubert, the King's Dapifer and Sheriff of Essex, was not only the founder of the great house of Saint John at Colchester, but won a purer fame as one of the very few Normans in high authority who knew how to win the love and confidence of the conquered English.3

&lt;sup>1</sup> Roman de Rou, 8803. "Par li boiz chacié et bersé." "Berser" is explained (Roquefort, Glossaire de la Langue Romaine) by "tirer de l'arc." On William's skill with the bow, see Will. Malms. iii. 279.

&lt;sup>2</sup> See above, p. 197.

&lt;sup>3</sup> On the church of Rye, parts of which may be as old as this time, see De Caumont, iii. 572.

<sup>1</sup> Roman de Rou, 8846;

3

Ę

"Hubert de Rie ert à sa porte, Entre li mostier et sa mote, Guillame vit désaturné E sun cheval tuit tressué."

Hubert seems to have been an early riser and a good church-goer. The "mote" is the mound or "agger" (see above, p. 191), whence the name is sometimes transferred to the castle itself. Thus we find in the Gesta Com. Andeg. (D'Achery, iii. 257), "Domum munitissimam que usque hodie 'Mota Fulcoii' a vulgo vocatur."

- <sup>2</sup> Ib. 8860 et seqq. I see no reason to doubt the general truth of the story, but there is a passage in the sequel which sounds mythical. William's pursuers presently ask Hubert which way the Bastard is gone, and he puts them on a wrong scent (vv. 8874). This story is as old as the babyhood of Hermes.
- <sup>3</sup> On Eudes see Ellis, Introduction to Domesday, i. 415. Orderic (489 C) calls him "Normannici Ducis dapiferum, qui in pago Constantino divitiis et potestate inter Normannise proceres eminebat." The good character of Eudes comes from the Colchester History of the Monasticon, iv. 607. which I shall have to refer to again. He married Roberia, daughter of Richard son of Count Gilbert (Ib. 608).

CHAP. VIII. Progress of the rebellion.

He seeks help of the King of

The Bessin and the Côtentin were now in open rebellion. We are told that men cursed the rebels, and wished well to the Duke in their hearts. But the revolted Barons had for the time the upper hand. They seized on the ducal revenues within their districts, and robbed and slew many who still clave to their allegiance. The dominion of the male line of Rolf, the very existence of Normandy as an united state, seemed in jeopardy. William did not venture to meet his enemies with the forces of the districts which still remained faithful. He was driven to seek for foreign aid, and he sought it in a quarter where one would think the French. that nothing short of despair could have led him to think of seeking for it. He craved help of one who was indeed bound to grant it by every official and by every personal tie, but who had hitherto acted towards William only as a faithless enemy, ready to grasp at any advantage, however mean The Duke of the Normans, driven to and treacherous. such humiliation by the intrigues of an ungrateful kinsman, crossed the French border, and made his suit to his Lord King Henry at Poissy. He met with favour in the eyes of his suzerain; a French army, with the King at its head, was soon ready to march to the support of Duke William against his rebels. It is hard to see why Henry,

Henry comes to his help in person.

> <sup>1</sup> We learn the place of meeting from Orderic (372 A); "Unde coactus juvenis Dux Pexeium convolavit, ibique pronus ad pedes Henrici Regis corruit, et ab eo contra malefidos proceres et cognatos auxilium petivit." So Roman de Rou, 8942;

> > "Par pleintes ke Willame fist, E par paroles ke il dist, Fist li Reis asembler son ost."

Other writers are less eager to set forth William's humiliation. William of Jumièges (vii. 17) says, "Necessitate coactus Henricum Francorum Regem expetiit pro subveniendi obtentu." The Brevis Relatio (ap. Giles, Scriptt. 3) says simply, "Contulit se ad Regem Francise." William of Poitiers (81) slurs over William's application to the King, and takes no further notice of Henry's share in the campaign, beyond adding, after his account of the battle, "Interfuit huic prolio Francise Rex Henricus, victrici causse auxilians."

WILLIAMS BECARS TROP FALLOWING THE CHARDS AND THE BANKS OF SAME AND THE SAME AND THE SAME AND SAME AND THE SAME AN later conduct is of so opposite a CHAP. VIII. once faithfully to discharge rerlord towards an injured that a revolt which, His pro-Dule Ma Britis Co. Line Co. nberment of Nor-bable motives. New Bis Prince to his days exactly falling ede lie tilra ena nig tead of the him off to me and the same of the same . there BORNER OF LINE o or three it, and all pros would run a fair Ac as The e by their overlord. encroached on the Nor-. scrupled to give encourages against their own sovereign. st of princes may have led him to . policy to abet open rebellion, and he sted whether the aggrandizement of the arons of the Bessin and the Côtentin would al gain to France. Such neighbours might prove re turbulent as vassals, and might not be much more s to subdue as enemies, than the comparatively firm and rderly government of the Dukes of Rouen. At all events French aid was freely granted to the princely suppliant. The King set forth at the head of his army

<sup>1</sup> The original writers of course do not greatly trouble themselves about the seeming inconsistency of Henry's conduct. There is perhaps a slight touch of sarcasm in the words of William of Jumièges (vii. 17), "Tunc tandem Rex memor beneficii quod a patre ejus sibi quondam impensum fuerat, vires Francorum simul coëgit." So William of Malmesbury knows no motive but pure gratitude (iii. 230); "Necessitas Regem tutorem excivit ut desperatis partibus pupilli succurreret. Itaque paternse benevolentise recordatus, quod eum favore suo in regnum sublimaverat, apud Walesdunas in defectores irruit." We then find ourselves in the thick of the battle. Orderic (372 A) seems to make it an act of simple magnanimity on the King's part; "At ille [Henricus], ut erat clemens, desolato adolescenti compatiens, robur exercitàs Francorum excivit, et in Neustriam Duci chap. viii. to join the troops which William had gathered from the loyal districts, and to share with them in a decisive encounter with the rebel forces.

Battle of Val-Es-Dunes, 1047;

The French and the loyal Normans joined their forces some miles to the east of Caen, in the neighbourhood of the memorable field of Val-ès-dunes. The spot is not one specially attractive in itself; it is not one of those spots which seem marked out by the hand of nature as specially designed to become the scene of great historical events. But we shall see that, for the purposes of the particular battle which was fought there, no ground could have been better suited. Nor, at first sight, does the fight of Valès-dunes, an engagement of cavalry between two Norman factions, seem to have any claim to a place among the great battles of history. But Val-ès-dunes was the first pitched battle of the Conqueror; it was the field on which he first won a right to that lofty title, and the lessons which he learned there stood him in good stead on a far more awful day. And, more than this, it was there that William conquered his own land and his own people, and by that earlier conquest both schooled and strengthened himself for his mightier conquest beyond the sea. Normandy had first to be firmly grasped, and her fierce Barons to be brought under the yoke, before the hand of William could be stretched forth to fix its grasp on England, and to press the yoke upon the necks of her people. In a word, the strife with Randolf and Neal and their revolted provinces was the needful forerunner of the strife with Harold and his Kingdom. The tourney of Norman horsemen upon the open slope of Val-ès-dunes was William's school of fence for the sterner clashing of axe and spear upon the palisaded heights of Senlac.

its importance in the life of William.

auxiliaturus perrexit." William, or Orderic, in the death-bed summary (657 B), leaves out the French aid altogether; "Tunc auxiliante Deo, qui justus judex est, inter Cadomum et Argentias hostes vici."

And there is another aspect in which the two battles CHAP. VIII. have a common feature. Val-ès-dunes, no less than Sen-Val-ès-dunes a lac, was a struggle between the Roman and the Teuton. battle be-The fact was not indeed forced in the same way upon Romanised men's minds by the outward contrast of language, of and Teutactics, of every badge of national difference. Still it is mandy. none the less true that, at Val-ès-dunes, the old Scandinavian blood of Normandy found its match, and more than its match, in the power of France and of the French portions of the Norman Duchy. Danish Coutances and Saxon Bayeux were brought face to face with Romanized Rouen and Evreux and with royal Paris itself. From all the District lands east of the Dive men flocked to the Ducal standard. which sup-The episcopal cities of Lisieux and Evreux, along with William. primatial Rouen, sent forth their loyal burghers, and the men of the surrounding districts pressed no less eagerly to the muster. They came, according to the old division, which the suppression of the peasant revolt had not wholly broken up, arranged in companies which still retained the name of communes, suggesting the freedom which they had perhaps not wholly lost. From beyond the Seine came the troops of Caux, and from the south of the Duchy came the men of Auge, and of Duke Robert's County of Hiesmes. And who can doubt that foremost among them all were the burghers of William's own Falaise, zealous on behalf of a Prince who was also their own immediate countryman? But the whole west of Normandy, the land where the old Norman speech and spirit had longest lingered, was arrayed on the side of the Except the contingent of his own birth-place and rebels. its neighbourhood, no part of the Duke's force seems to have come from the lands west of the Dive; all else came

&lt;sup>1</sup> Roman de Rou, 8997. "La s'asemblerent li cumunes." For the list of the districts which helped William see vv. 8946 et seqq.

CHAP. VIII. from the old domain of Rolf, the oldest, but, then as now, not the most Norman Normandy.1

Description of the field of battle.

The field of battle lies just within the hostile country.2 South-east of Caen, in continuation of the high ground of Allemagne<sup>3</sup> immediately south of the town, stretches a long, broad, and slightly elevated plain, sloping gently towards the east.4 It hardly deserves to be called a hill, and the indentations with which its sides are broken hardly deserve to be called valleys.5 Several villages and churches, Secqueville, Bellengreville, Billy, Chicheboville, form the boundaries of the field, but the plain itself is open and without any remarkable feature. A ridge somewhat higher than the rest of the ground, known as Mount Saint Lawrence, is the only conspicuous point of the plain itself, and this marks the western boundary of the actual battle-ground. The little stream of the Muance, a tributary of the Orne, bounds the plain to the south-east.<sup>6</sup> To

&lt;sup>1</sup> See Appendix O.

&lt;sup>2</sup> My account of the field and battle of Val-ès-dunes is drawn from an examination made on the spot in May, 1867. In company with Mr. J. R. Green, I went over the whole ground, Wace in hand. No modern description can do more than amplify Wace's few topographical touches (Roman de Rou, 8978 et seqq.), and his minute and spirited account of the battle. Every detail shows in how thoroughly honest and careful a spirit he set to work. On the topography, see De Caumont, Statistique Monumental du Calvados, ii. 84 et seqq., and Appendix O.

I should greatly like to come across some explanation of this puzzling name (see De Caumont, i. 53). Nothing is more likely than a Teutonic colony anywhere in these parts, but such a colony would hardly be called Allemannia. The name is ancient, as it occurs in William's foundation charter of Saint Stephen's. See Neustria Pia, 626. The copy there is not very accurate, as I can witness from having (for once) examined an original manuscript.

&lt;sup>4</sup> Roman de Rou, 8986;

&quot;Maiz encuntre soleil levant Se funt la terre en avalant."

&lt;sup>5</sup> Ib. 8982; "Li plaines sunt lunges è lées, N'i a granz monz ne granz vallées."

• Ib. 8988; "Une riviere l'avirone, Deverz midi è devers none."

the north lies the high ground of Argences, over which CHAP. VIII. William advanced with the troops of the loyal districts. The French auxiliaries, approaching from the south by way of Mezidon, first reached the little village of Valmeray, where a ruined tower of later date marks the site of the church of Saint Brice in which King Henry heard mass before the battle. 1 Meanwhile the Duke's forces crossed Junction the Muance at the ford of Berengier,2 and at once joined the Ducal and King and Duke now ranged their troops in the French forces. order in which it was most natural to meet an enemy advancing from the west. The Normans, who had come from the north, formed the right wing, while the French, coming from the south, naturally formed the left.3 There was pitched the royal standard, on which we are told that the presumption of the upstart house of Paris had dared to emblazon the eagle of Julius and Charles.4 King Henry and Duke William, each baton in hand,5 were now marshalling their troops, and the battle seemed about to begin, when, if we may trust our only detailed narrative of that day's fight, one side was cheered and the other dispirited by an unlooked for incident.

Ralph of Tesson was lord of the forest of Cingueleiz,

<sup>1</sup> Roman de Rou, 8990;

"A Saint-Briçun de Valmerei Fu la messe chanteé el Rei, Li jor ke la bataille fu; Grant poor i unt li cler éu."

<sup>2</sup> Ib. 9001.

851

S

E

1 ĭ.

11

U

ŗ.

1

3 Ib. 9004;

"La gent Willame fu à destre, E Franceiz furent à senestre; Verz ocident tornent lor vis, Quer là sourent les anemis."

4 Benott, 33490;

"Or fait son estandart drecier, La fu l'eigle d'or qui resplent."

<sup>s</sup> Roman de Rou, 9020;

"En sa main chescun un baston."

Ralph of Tesson joins the Duke.

CHAP. VIII. the forest some way to the south of Caen, between the rivers Orne and Lise, and his chief seat was at Harcourt Thury. He was a lord of great power, and his contingent is said to have mustered no less than a hundred and twenty. knights with their banners and tokens.1 He had no ground of offence against the Duke; yet he had joined in the conspiracy, and had sworn on the saints at Bayeux to smite William wherever he found him.<sup>2</sup> But his heart smote him when he found himself standing face to face against his lord in open battle. His knights too pressed around him, and reminded him of his homage and plighted faith, and how he who fought against his natural lord had no right to fief or honour.3 On the other hand the Viscounts Neal and Randolf pressed him to stand firmly by them, and promised great rewards as the price of his adherence. For a while he stood doubtful, keeping his

<sup>1</sup> Roman de Rou, 9012;

"Set vingz chevaliers out od sei Tant dut aveir en sun cunrei, Tuit aloent lances levées, Et en totes guimples fermeés."

<sup>2</sup> Ib. 9042;

"Cil lor aveit ainz asseuré, Et à Baex sor sainz juré, Ke Guillame sempres ferreit En kel lieu il le trovereit."

One might wish that another oath on the saints at Bayeux could have found as easy and convenient fulfilment.

<sup>3</sup> Ib. 9050;

"Guillame est son natural sire, Et il sis homs ne puet desdire, Pensa ke il li fist homage Véant sun pere et sun barnage; N'a dreit el fié ne à l'onor, Ki se cumbat à son seignor."

The feudal scruple is stronger in the minds of the inferior tenants, a point worth noticing, whether the tale be trustworthy in detail or not. This agrees with Wace's former statement that, even in the revolted provinces, the popular feeling was on William's side. The poor gentleman might need the protection of the common sovereign no less than the peasant.

troop apart from either army. We are told that the King CHAP. VIII. and the Duke marked them as they stood, and that William told Henry that he knew them for the men of Ralph of Tesson, that their leader had no grudge against him, and that he believed that they would all soon be on his side. Presently the arguments of his own knights prevailed with Ralph; he bade them halt, and he himself spurred across the field, shouting as his war-cry the name of his lordship of Thury.1 He rode up to the Duke, he struck him with his glove, and so performed his oath to smite William wherever he found him.2 The Duke welcomed the returning penitent, and Ralph rode back to his men. His detachment stood aside for a space till the two hosts were engaged in the thick of the battle. He then watched his opportunity, and made a vigorous charge on the side of the Duke.

Such an auspicious reinforcement might well stir up the Character spirits of the young Duke and his followers. Every man battle; a was eager for battle. A fierce combat of cavalry began. We have heard of the infantry of the communes as appear-cavalry. ing at the ducal muster, but we hear nothing of them in the battle. We hear nothing of the Norman archers, who were to win so terrible a renown upon a later field. All is one vast tourney, mounted knights charging one another with shield, sword, and lance. The first great battle of William, like the first great battle of Alexander, was truly

8

I wish I could believe, with Thierry (i. 150) and Pluquet (Wace, ii. 32, 528), that this war-cry was an invocation of Thor, "Thor aie," as opposed to the "Dex aie" of the French Normans. But I fear we must see in it nothing more profound or venerable than the lordship of Thury. See Prevost, Wace, p. 528, and Taylor, 21. Palgrave, iii. 216.

Examples of entrapping men to destruction by the literal fulfilment of an oath are common enough. This opposite case may be compared with Aurelian's way of discharging his oath when besieging Thyana; "Canem in hoc oppido non relinquam." The city was taken, and the Emperor slew all the dogs. Vopiscus, Aurelian, 22, 23 (Hist. Aug. ii. 472).

* Arrian, vi. 11. 9. 'Αλλά πρός Γρανίκφ μέν ξυνέβη μαχή Ιππική. iv. 8. 11. ή Ιππομαχία ή έπι Γρανίκφ.

CHAP. VIII. a battle of chivalry in every sense of the word, a hand to hand personal fight between mounted nobles on either side. On pressed the Duke, sword in hand, seeking out the perjured Viscounts, and shouting the war-cry of Normandy, "Dex aie." 2 On the same side rose the shout of "Montjoye-Saint-Denys," the national war-cry of the French Kingdom. From the rebel host arose the names of various local saints, patrons of the castles and churches of the revolted leaders, Saint Sever, Saint Amand, and others of less renown.3 On the rebel left rode the men of the Bessin, on the right those of the Côtentin. The men of the peninsula thus came face to face with the royal troops; the King of the French, as in the old days of Lewis and Harold,4 had to meet in close fight with the fiercest and most unconquerable warriors of the Norman And well and bravely did King Henry do his duty name. on that one day of his life. Even in the Norman picture, it is around the King, rather than around the Duke, that the main storm of battle is made to centre. The knights now met on each side, lance to lance, and, when their lances were shivered, sword to sword. There was no difference of tactics, Personal exertions of King Henry.

<sup>1</sup> Roman de Rou, 9074;

"Willame va par la campaigne; Des Normanz meine grant compaigne, Li dui Viscuntes vait quérant, E li perjures demandant."

<sup>2</sup> Ib. 9094;

"Cil de France crient, Montjoie; Ceo lor est bel ke l'en les oie; Willame cri, Dex aie; C'est l'enseigne de Normendie."

<sup>3</sup> See Taylor, 22.

<sup>4</sup> See vol. i. p. 244. Wace seems rather to delight in opposing his own province to the French. 9108;

> "El Rei de France et as Franceiz Si vint ensemb Costentineiz."

So 9128; "Constentineiz è Franceiz sunt Li uns as altres contrestunt." no contrast between one weapon and another; the fight of CHAP. VIII. Val-ès-dunes was the sheer physical encounter of horse and man, the mere trial of personal strength and personal skill in knightly exercises. The King, as in such a fight any man of common courage must do, exposed himself freely to danger; but, as far as his personal adventures went, the royal share in the battle was somewhat unlucky. Once, if not twice, the King of the French, the overlord of Normandy, was hurled from his horse by the thrust of a Norman lance. A knight of the Côtentin first overthrew him by a sudden charge. The exploit was long remembered in the rhymes of his warlike province,1 but the hero of it purchased his renown with his life. The King was unhurt, but the report of such an accident might easily spread confusion among his army. Like more renowned warriors before and after, like Eadmund at Sherstone,2 like William at Senlac, it was needful that he should show himself to his followers, and wipe out the misfortune by fresh exploits. Henry was therefore soon again in the thickest of the fight; but, less fortunate than either Eadmund or William, the like mishap befell him a second time.3 The King presently encountered one of

"De ço distrent li païsant, E dient encore en gabant: De Costentin iessi la lance Ki abati le Rei de France."

I have found the rhyme remembered in a Norman cottage, close by the field of Val-es-dunes.

<sup>1</sup> Roman de Rou, 9144;

&lt;sup>2</sup> See vol. i. p. 425. But William's overthrow was real, though his death was imaginary; in the case of Eadmund all was an invention of Eadric. But the effect on the army would be the same in all three cases.

The narrative in the Roman de Rou (9134-9207) clearly implies that Henry was overthrown twice, first by a nameless knight of the Côtentin, secondly by Hamon himself. At the same time there certainly is, as Mr. Taylor (p. 25) says, a certain confusion in the way of telling the story, and one might be tempted to believe that the one overthrow was a mere repetition of the other. But each story seems to receive a certain amount

OHAP. VIII. the three great chiefs of the rebellion; another thrust, dealt by the lance of Hamon, again laid Henry on the ground; but a well timed stroke from a French knight more than avenged this second overthrow; the Lord of Thorigny was carried off dead on his shield like an old Spartan. The King honoured his valiant adversary, and, by his express order, Hamon was buried with all fitting splendour before the Church of Our Lady at Esquai on the Orne.<sup>2</sup>

The King is thus made decidedly the most prominent figure in the picture, and, somewhat inglorious as were Henry's personal experiences that day, it is to him and his Frenchmen that the Norman poet does not scruple to attribute the victory.<sup>3</sup> The fight appears throughout as a fight between Normans and Frenchmen.<sup>4</sup> But the Duke of the Normans himself was not idle. If his royal ally of corroborative evidence. The first overthrow is supported by the Côtentin rhyme, the second by the independent testimony of William of Malmesbury (iii. 230); "Haimo in acie cæsus, cujus insignis violentia laudatur, quod ipsum Regem equo dejecerit; quare a concurrentibus stipatoribus interemtus."

Exploits and good fortune of William.

- <sup>1</sup> Roman de Rou, 9199. "Mez sor l'escu fu mort levé."
- <sup>2</sup> Will. Malms. u. s. "Pro fortitudinis miraculo Regis jussu tumulatus est egregiè." Wace (9200) mentions the place. He is buried "devant l'iglise," seemingly not in the church.
  - <sup>3</sup> Roman de Rou, 9258;

"Néel se cumbati cum pros; Si tiex les trovast li Reis tos, Mar i fussent Franceiz venuz, Descunfiz fussent è veincuz."

So again, 9280;

"Mais ço sai ke li Reis veinki."

4 Ib. 9173;

"E Franceiz Normanz envaïr, E Normanz torner è guenchir.

So 9266;

"Franceiz de tutes parz espeissent," Normanz décheient è décreissent."

We must remember that all the local feelings of Wace, a native of Jersey and Canon of Bayeux, would be on the side of the rebels, however much they might be balanced by loyalty to the memory of the great William.

was personally unlucky, it was on this day that William CHAP. VIII. began that career of personal success, of good fortune in the mere tug of battle, which, till the clouded evening of his life, was as conspicuous as the higher triumphs of his military genius and his political craft. Men loved to tell how the young Duke slew with his own hand the beloved vassal of Randolf, Hardrez, the choicest warrior of Bayeux; 1 how the veteran champion, in the pride of his might, rode defiant in the front rank; how the Duke rode straight at him, not justing with his lance as in a mimic tourney, but smiting hand to hand with the sword. The poet rises to an almost Homeric flight, when he tells us how William smote the rebel below the chin, how he drove the sharp steel between the throat and the chest, how the body fell beneath his stroke and the soul passed away.2

The fortune of the day was now distinctly turning Randolf against the rebels; but, had all of them displayed equal loses heart and flees. courage, the issue of the struggle might still have been unfavourable to King and Duke. Neal of Saint Saviour still fought among the foremost of the men of his peninsula, but the heart of his accomplice from Bayeux began to fail him. Randolf had seen his most cherished vassal fall by the hand of his young sovereign; his heart quailed lest the like fate should be his own; he feared lest Neal

<sup>1</sup> Benoît, 33, 660;

"Hardrez uns chevalier hardiz, De Baiues nez e norriz, Preissiez d'armes e concuz."

<sup>2</sup> The anatomical precision of Wace (9222) is quite in the style of the Iliad:

"Willame verz li s'eslessa, Li fist passer le fer trenchant; Ne li pout rien aveir garant, Un glaive tint, bien l'avisa; Willame empoint è cil chai, Parmi li cors lez le menton, Li cors envers, l'alme en issi." Entre la gorge et le gotron,

These are spirited lines; so is the whole description of the battle; yet how feebly does the Romance of Gaul, even in this its earliest and most vigorous shape, sound beside the native ring of the Ludwigslied and the Song of Maldon.

CHAP. VIII. had fled; he feared that he was betrayed to the enemy; he repented that he had ever put on his helmet; it was sad to be taken captive, it was a still worse doom to be slain. The battle ceased to give him any pleasure; 1 he gave way before every charge; he wandered in front and in rear; at last he lost heart altogether; he dropped his lance and his shield, he stretched forth his neck,2 and rode for his life. The cowards, we are told, followed him; but fight to the Neal still continued the fight, giving and taking blows till his strength failed him. The French pressed upon him; their numbers increased, the numbers of the Normans lessened; some of his followers had fled, others lay dead and dying around him. At last the mighty lord of the Côtentin saw that all hope was lost. On the rising ground of Saint Lawrence the last blow seems to have been struck. The spot was afterwards marked by a commemorative chapel, which was destroyed by the Huguenots in the religious On its site it doubtless was that the valiant Neal wars. at last turned and left the field, seemingly the last man of the whole rebel army.

Neal continues the last.

Rout of the Rebels.

The rout now became general. The example of Randolf drew after it far more followers than the example of Neal. The rebels rode for their lives in small parties, the troops of the King and the Duke following hard upon them, and smiting them from the rear. From the ridge of Saint Lawrence they rode westward, to reach the friendly land of Bayeux; 3 they rode by the Abbey of Fontenay and the

&lt;sup>1</sup> Roman de Rou, 9249. "La bataille mult li desplait."

I suppose this means something more than mere sorrow at ill success; it seems to imply the loss of the "certaminis gaudia," which he had doubtless enjoyed in the opening charge of the battle. Through the whole of this paragraph I do little more than translate the life-like description of Wace.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Roman de Rou, 9254;

&quot;Lessa la lance è puiz l'escu, Fuiant s'en vait, col estendu."

&lt;sup>3</sup> 1b. 9298. "En Béessin volent torner."

quarries of Allemagne; but the flood of the Orne checked CHAP. VIII. their course; men and horses were swept away by the stream, or were slaughtered by the pursuers in the attempt to cross; the mills of Borbillon, we are told, were stopped by the dead bodies.1

The victory was a decisive one, and it was one which Completeproved no less decisive in its lasting results than it had been victory. as a mere success on the field of battle. King Henry, who The French had done his work well and faithfully, now went back auxiliaries return. to his own land, and left William to complete the reduction of his revolted subjects. One of them, the original author of the plot, still offered him a long and vigorous resistance. Of the conduct of Guy of Burgundy in the field we hear nothing, except an incidental mention of a wound which he received there.2 Indeed, since the appearance of his three great Norman adherents, the Burgundian prince has nearly dropped out of sight.3 He Escape of now reappears, to receive from the Norman writers a vast Guy. out-pouring of scorn on account of his flight from the field,4 though it does not appear to have been in any way more ignominious than the flight of the mass of his Norman allies. At any rate he was not borne away in the indiscriminate rush of his comrades towards the Orne. He

&lt;sup>1</sup> Roman de Rou, 9295-8. The Orne plays an important part in the destruction of the rebels in most of the accounts. Will. Pict. 81. "Absorbuit non paucos fluvius Olna equites cum equis." Will. Gem. vii. 17. "Rex cum Duce . . tantà eos illicò strage delevit, ut quos gladius non extinxit, Deo formidinem inferente, fugientes fluvius Olnæ absorberet." Will. Malms. iii. 230. "Multi fluminis Olnæ rapacitate intercepti, quod, in arcto locati, equos ad transvadandos vortices instimularent."

&lt;sup>2</sup> Ord. Vit. 657 B. "Guidonem vulneratum et de bello fugă elapsum."

* The only writer, I think, who introduces Guy personally in his account of the war is William of Malmesbury (u. s.); "Cum his per totam Normanniam grassabatur prædo improbissimus, inani spe ad comitatum illectus."

<sup>4 &</sup>quot;E prœlio lapsus," says William of Jumièges; "vix elapsus," according to William of Malmesbury; while, in William of Poitiers, it rises to "turpissimè elapsus."

Brionne.

Siege of Brionne

CHAP. VIII. escaped, with a large body of companions, in quite the opposite direction, to his own castle of Brionne on the He defends Risle. There he took up a position of defence, and was himself at speedily followed and besieged by Duke William. castle of Brionne of those days was not the hill-fortress, the shell of a donjon of that or of the next age, which now looks down upon the town and valley beneath. stronghold of Count Guy had natural defences, but they were defences of another kind. The town itself seems to have been strongly fortified; but the point of defence which was most relied on at Brionne was the fortified hall of stone which stood on an island in the river.2 William had, before now, by one vigorous assault, brought his own native Falaise to surrender; 3 but, though we are expressly told that the stream was everywhere fordable, the island fortress seems to have been deemed proof against any attacks of this kind. A regular siege alone could reduce it, and 1047-1050! William was driven to practise all the devices of the military art of his day against his rebellious cousin. a castle, this time very possibly of wood, on each side of the river, and thus cut off the besieged from their supplies of provisions.4 Constant assaults on the beleagured castle

1 "Cum magno equitatu," says William of Poitiers (81).

&lt;sup>3</sup> The description given by William of Poitiers (u.s.) is remarkable; "Brionium . . contendit. Oppidum hoc, quum loci natura, tum opere inexpugnabile videbatur. Nam, præter alia firmamenta, quæ moliri consuevit belli necessitudo, aulam habet lapideam arcis usum pugnantibus præbentem, quam fluvius Risela nullo quidem tractu vadi impatiens circumfluit." This seems to show that the town had fortifications of its own; and this again suggests the question, what was the state of the point overhanging the town where the present castle stands? The "aula lapidea" is a singular expression, seeming, together with the words which follow, to imply something different from the ordinary donjon, though capable of being put to purposes of defence,—a crenellated house, as it might have been called in later days. "Lapidea," because an "aula" would doubtless be often of wood, while "arces" were of stone. <sup>8</sup> See above, p. 206.

<sup>4</sup> Will. Pict. u. s. "Castella utrimque ad ripas fluminis bipartiti opponens." So Will. Gem. "Stabilitis munitionibus in utraque parte fluminis vocabulo Risle."

are spoken of, but their aim seems to have been mainly CHAP. VIII. to frighten the besieged rather than to produce any more practical effect; 1 hunger was the sure and slow means on which William relied to bring Guy to reason. siege was clearly a long one, though it is hardly possible to believe, on the incidental statement of a single authority, that it was spread over a space of three years.2 At last the endurance of Guy and his companions gave Surrender way, and he sent messengers praying for mercy. Duke required the surrender of the castle; but touched, we are told, by the tie of kindred blood, he bade Guy remain in his court.3 Nor was the Duke's hand, on the William's whole, heavy on the other offenders. No man was put to the vanto death, though William's panegyrist holds that death quished. was the fitting punishment for their offences.4 But in Rarity of those days, both in Normandy and elsewhere, the legal executions. execution of a state criminal was an event which seldom happened. Men's lives were recklessly wasted in the end-

<sup>1</sup> Will. Pict. 81. "Oppugnatione diurna territans."

William of Poitiers merely says "postremo." Orderic (687 B), in describing the speedy capture of Brionne by Duke Robert in 1090, says, "Sic Robertus Dux ab hora nona Brionnam ante solis occasum obtinuit, quam Guillelmus pater ejus, cum auxilio Henrici Francorum Regis, sibi vix in tribus annis subigere potuit, dum Guido filius Rainaldi Burgundionis post prœlium Vallisdunensis illic præsidium sibi statuit." But there is nothing in any other writer to imply that Guy held out for any such length of time, and it seems quite inconsistent with the account of William of Jumièges. Moreover it is clear that Henry took no part in the siege; "Quem [Guidonem] Dux, Rege Franciam repetente, properè insequutus," &c. (Will. Gem. vii. 17.)

*Will. Pict. u. s. "Motus Dux consanguinitate, supplicitate, miseria victi, non acerbius vindicavit. Recepto castro, in curia sua commanere eum concessit." So Will. Gem. u. s.; "Dux, suorum consultu, miseries misertus, clementer illi pepercit, et, recepto castello Brioci, cum suis domesticis eum manere in domo sua jussit."

Will. Pict. u.s. "Supplicia item consociis, que capitalia ex æquo irrogarentur, condonare maluit ob rationabiles caussas." This distinct statement cannot be shaken by the vastly inferior authority of Henry of Huntingdon (M. H. B. p. 759 C), who says, "Quoedam exsulavit, quoedam corpore minuit."

William's ordinary treatment

CHAP. VIII. less warfare of the times, and there were men, as we have seen, who did not shrink from private murder, even in its basest form. But the formal hanging or beheading of a noble prisoner, so common in later times, was, in the eleventh century, distinctly an unusual sight.2 strange as it may sound, there was a sense in which William the Conqueror was not a man of blood. He would sacrifice any number of lives to his boundless ambiof enemies. tion; he did not scruple to condemn his enemies to cruel personal mutilations; he would keep men for years, as a mere measure of security, in the horrible prison-houses of those days; but the extinction of human life in cold blood was something from which he shrank. His biographer exultingly points out this feature in his character, and his recorded acts do not belie his praise.3 Once only did he swerve from this rule, when he sent the noble Waltheof to the scaffold. And, as that act stands out conspicuously from its contrast to his ordinary conduct, so it is the act from which it is impossible not to date the decline of his high fortune. And, at the time of his first great victory, William was of an age which is commonly disposed to be generous, and none of the worse features of his character had hitherto come to the surface. With one exception only,

&lt;sup>1</sup> See above, pp. 192-197, and compare the whole career of Eadric.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Compare the remarks of Palgrave, iii. 78.

* William of Poitiers, speaking of a somewhat later stage of his life, has the words (p. 93), "More suo illo optimo, rem optans absque cruore confectum iri;" and he continues at length (94); "Monet equidem digna ratio et hoc memoriæ prodere, quam pia continentia cædem semper vitaverit, nisi bellică vi aut aliâ gravi necessitudine urgente. Exsilio, carcere, item aliâ animadversione qua vitam non adimeret, ulcisci malebat: quos juxta ritum sive legum instituta cæteri principes gladio absumunt, bello captos vel domi criminum capitalium manifestos." The words in Italics are clearly an euphemism for mutilation, as we shall see by his conduct at Alençon. So the Abingdon Chronicler (1076), speaking of his worst doings, tells us; "Sume hi wurdon geblende, and sume wrecen of lande, and sume getawod to scande. Dus wurden bes kyninges swican genyberade." Here is no mention of capital punishment, save in the case of Waltheof only.

DO very hard punishments were inflicted on the conquered CHAP. VIII. rebels. The mass of the rebellious Barons paid fines, gave Destruchostages, and had to submit to the destruction of the castles castles. which they had raised without the ducal licence.1 To this, and to other measures of the same kind, it is owing that such small traces of the Norman castles of the eleventh century now remain. Neal of Saint Saviour had to retire for a time to Britanny, but his exile must have been short, as we find him, seemingly in the very next year, again in office and in the ducal favour. He survived his restoration forty-four years; 2 he lived to repay at Senlac the old wrong done by Englishmen to his father's province; but, almost alone among the great Norman chiefs, he received no share in the spoils of England. As for Guy, Guy returns to he presently left the country of his own free will. His Burgundy. sojourn at William's court must have been little else than an honourable imprisonment, and it would seem that he now found little respect or sympathy in Normandy.3 He Will Pict. 82. "Dein ad jussum ejus festinanter ac funditus destruxere munitiones novarum rerum studio constructas." Will. Gem. vii. 17. "Conspicientes itaque cuncti optimates qui deviârant à Ducis fidelitate illum omne præsidium fugæ partim destruxisse, partim interclusisse, datis obsidibus, rigida colla ei ut domino suo subdidere. Sic castellis ubique eversis, nullus ultra ausus est contra eum rebellem animum detegere."

<sup>2</sup> Will. Pict. u. s. "Nigellum alio tempore [I do not understand this], quoniam improbe offensabat, exsilio punitum fuisse comperio." Wace (9311) gives the place of his exile;

"Néel ne se pout acorder, Ne el païs n'osa cunverser, En Bretaigne fu lungement, Ainz ke il fist acordement."

Notwithstanding Wace's "lungement," he must have been restored in the next year, when we find him consenting to certain grants to the Abbey of Marmoutier which the Duke had made out of his estates in Guernsey (insula que appellatur Grenesodium) during his banishment. See the Charters in Delisle, Preuves, 21-25. By some evident slip of dictation or copying, Neel is made in Palgrave, iii. 217, to defend himself at Brionne instead of Guy. He died in 1092. Delisle, p. 24.

Will. Pict. u.s. "Guido in Burgundiam sponte rediit propter molestiam probri. Ferre apud Normannos pigebat vilem se cunctis, odiosum esse multis."

CHAP. VIII. returned to his native land, the Burgundian Palatinate, and there, we are told, spent the rest of his days in plotting against his brother, the reigning Count William.1 One criminal only was reserved for a harsher fate. Grim-Fate of Grimbald. bald was taken to Rouen, and there kept in prison—such as prisons were in those days—and in fetters. He was looked on as the foulest traitor of all; he it was whom the Duke charged with the personal attempt on his life at Valognes.<sup>2</sup> Grimbald confessed the crime, and named as his accomplice a knight named Salle the son of Hugh. The accused denied the charge, and challenged Grimbald to the judicial combat. Before the appointed day of battle came, Grimbald was found dead in his prison. He was buried with his fetters on his legs, his lands were confiscated, and part of them was given to the church of Bayeux. Plessis became a domain of the see, and other portions of the estates of Grimbald became the corpses of various prebends in the cathedral church.3

<sup>1</sup> Will. Pict. 82. Will. Malms. iii. 230. Mr. Thomas Roscoe, on the other hand (History of William the Conqueror, p. 61), tells us that "at a subsequent period he highly distinguished himself in the service of the duke, and headed a large body of veteran troops at the famous battle of Hastings."

<sup>2</sup> Roman de Rou, 9346;

"Se il le prist, il out raisun, Kar il l'eust par traisun, Ce dist, à Valuignes murdri, Quant un fol Golet l'en garni."

3 Ib. 9362;

"A Baieues fu lors otréiée, Quant l'iglise fu dediée, De la terre Grimout partie A Madame Sainte Marie, Partie fu ki ke l'en die Mise à chescun en l'abéie."

See Pluquet and Taylor's notes. The "abéie" must mean the cathedral church, but it was a great sacrifice to the rhyme for one of its canons to speak of it as an abbey. The grant of Plessis and other possessions "Grimoldi perfidi" to Odo and his successors in the see of Bayeux will be found in Gallia Christiana, xi. 64.

The power of William was now on the whole firmly CHAP. VIII. established. He had still to repel many attacks from Establishhostile neighbours, and we shall have yet to record one William's more considerable revolt within the Norman territory. Power in Normandy But the Norman Barons now knew that they had a master.1 For some years to come, internal discord, strictly so called, underwent a sort of lull to a degree most remarkable in such an age. Under the firm and equal government of her great Duke, Normandy began to recover from her years of anarchy, and to rise to a higher degree of prosperity than she had ever yet attained to.2 The Duchy became, more completely than it had ever Effect of been before, a member of the European and of the Capetian the strugcommonwealth. The Capetian King indeed soon learned The supreagain to look with a grudging eye on his northern French neighbour; but the general result of the struggle must element confirmed. have been to make Normandy still more French than before. The French and the Scandinavian elements had met face to face, and the French element had had the upper hand. Frenchmen and French Normans had overthrown the stout Saxons of the Bessin and the fierce Danes of the Côtentin. The distinction between the two parts of Normandy is still one which even the passing traveller may remark; but, from the day of Val-ès-dunes, it ceased to manifest itself in the great outward expressions of language and political feeling. The struggle which began during the minority of Richard the Fearless was now finally decided at the close of the minority of William

&lt;sup>1</sup> Will. Pict. 82. "Normanni superati semel universi colla subdidere domino suo, atque obsides dedere plurimi."

&lt;sup>2</sup> Ib. 113. "Ejus animadversione et legibus è Normannia sunt exterminati latrones, homicidee, malefici. . . . . Caussam viduse, inopis, pupilli, ipse humiliter audiebat, misericorditer agebat, rectissimè definiebat. Ejus sequitate reprimente iniquam cupiditatem vicini minus valentis aut limitem agri movere aut rem ullam usurpare, nec potens audebat quisquam nec familiaris. Villæ, castra, urbes, jura per eum habebant stabilia et bona."

CHAP. VIII. the Bastard. The Count of Rouen had overcome Saxons and Danes within his own dominions, and he was about to weld them into his most trustworthy weapons wherewith to overcome Saxons and Danes beyond the sea. The omen of the fight against Neal and Hamon might well have recurred to the mind of William, when Neal himself and the son of Hamon marched forth at his side from the camp at Hastings, and went on to complete the conquest of England at Exeter and York.

§ 3. From the Battle of Val-ès-dunes to William's Visit to England. 1047-1051.

of Anjou; their connexion with Norman and English history.

Characteristics of Angevin history.

3154.

William was thus at peace at home; his next war was indeed one of his own seeking, but it was one from which he could not have shrunk without breaking through every The Counts tie alike of gratitude and of feudal duty. This is the first time that I have had directly to mention a power, which had been, for more than a hundred years, steadily growing up to the south of Normandy, and which was to exercise a most important influence on the future history of Normandy and, through Normandy, on that of England. I mean the dynasty of the Counts of Anjou. That house, the house which mounted the throne of England in the person of a great-grandson of William, produced a succession of princes to whose personal qualities it must mainly have been owing that their dominions fill the place which they do fill in French and in European history. Anjou holds a peculiar position among the great fiefs of France. It was a singular destiny which gave so marked a character, and so conspicuous a history, to a country which seems in no way marked out for separate existence by any geographical or national distinction. Normandy, Britanny, Flanders, Aquitaine, Ducal Burgundy, all had a being of their own; they were fiefs of the Crown of France, but CHAP. VIII. they were in no sense French provinces. But Anjou was at most an outpost on the Loire, a border district of France and Aquitaine; beyond this position it had nothing specially to distinguish it from any other part of the great Parisian Duchy. A momentary Saxon occupation in the Saxon fifth century 2 cannot be supposed to have left behind it occupation. any such abiding traces as were certainly left by the settlement of the same people at Bayeux, perhaps even by their less famous settlement at Seez.3 It was wholly to the energy and the marked character of its individual rulers that Anjou owes its distinct and prominent place among the principalities of Gaul. The restless spirit of the race showed itself sometimes for good and sometimes for evil, but there was no Count of Anjou who could be called a fool, a coward, or a fainéant. The history or legends of the family which was to rise to such greatness laid claim to no very remote or illustrious pedigree.4 The first Count Ingelgar, of Anjou, who held a part only of the later County,5 was 870?

&lt;sup>1</sup> The dependence of Anjou on the Duchy of France is acknowledged in a charter of Geoffrey Grisegonelle quoted in the Art de Verifier les Dates, ii. 833. He calls himself "Gratia Dei, et Senioris Hugonis largitione, Andegavensis Comes."

&lt;sup>2</sup> On the Saxon occupation of Anjou, see Greg. Tur. ii. 18. Hist. Franc. Epit. 1, 2.

&lt;sup>3</sup> On the Saxons of Seez, the Saxones Diablintes, see Stapleton, i. xliii.

&quot;The history of the Counts of Anjou is given at length, but mixed up with much legendary matter in the early parts, in the "Gesta Consulum Andegavensium," by an author of the time of Henry the Second, printed in D'Achery's Spicilegium, iii. 234. It is introduced by a most curious fragment, namely a short Angevin history written or dictated by Count Fulk, nephew and successor of Geoffrey Martel. A lay historian is a phænomenon which we have not come across since the time of our own Æthelweard, and it is not to be denied that the Count shows much sounder sense, and a much nearer approach to historical criticism, than the monk of Marmoutier. He had at least one advantage in his princely rank, that he had nothing to gain by flattering his own forefathers.

&lt;sup>8</sup> Gest. Cons. 235. "Datus est ei et dimidius comitatus Andegavis

CHAP. VIII. invested with that dignity either by Charles the Bald or Peasant origin of the family.

and Tertullus. Historical value of these tales.

by his son Lewis the Stammerer. He bore the name of Ingelgar, and he seems to be the first member of the family who can be unhesitatingly set down as historical. His grandfather, Torquatius or Tortulfus, was, according to the legend, a peasant, and seems to have sprung from that Breton race of which his descendants became the most persevering enemies. It must have been a later version of the tale which invented for him a Roman name and a Roman de-Torquatius scent.2 The son of Torquatius, Tertullus, rose, we are told, to importance at the court of Charles, and founded the greatness of his house.3 Whatever may be the amount of strictly historical truth preserved in these stories, they are, in one point of view, of no small historical value. Like the similar story of the origin of Godwine, they point to a belief, which can hardly have been ill-founded, that, in Gaul in the ninth century and in England in the eleventh, ignoble birth did not disqualify a man from > civitatis ad defendendam regionem et urbem, sævisque prædonibus oppositus est, et Comes ibi factus." So in the fuller account in p. 239, which adds, "quia ultrà Meduanam in Andegavo alter Comes habebatur." The " sævi prædones" are explained to be Northmen and Bretons.

> <sup>1</sup> The authors of the Art de Verifier les Dates (ii. 828), as also Sir F. Palgrave (i. 502), place the enfeoffment of Ingelgar under Charles the Bald in the year 870. But the story in the Gesta Consulum (238 et seqq.) seems to make the reigning King to be Lewis the Stammerer. Count Fulk himself (233) describes the benefactor of his ancestor as "Rex Francise. non à genere impit Philippi, sed à prole Caroli Calvi." Fulk had excellent reasons for the epithet bestowed on Philip. See Will. Malma. iii. 257.

> <sup>2</sup> Gest. Cons. 237. "Fuit vir quidam de Armorica Gallia, nomine Torquatius, genus cujus olim ab Armorica jussu Maximi Imperatoris à Britonibus expulsum est. Iste à Britonibus, proprietatem vetusti ac Romani nominis ignorantibus, corrupto vocabulo Tortulfus dictus fuit." We may be pretty sure that Tortulf, or something like it, of which his son's name Tertullus seems another and happier Latinization, was the true name. Charles made Torquatius a forester, "illius forestes que Nidus-meruli nuncupatur." The writer goes on to talk about Senators and Emperors taken from the plough.

<sup>3</sup> Gest, Cons. ib.

rising to the highest dignities, or from founding a dynasty or vision of Princes or even of Kings. But, when we reach Ingelgar, we seem to stand on more distinctly historical ground. He held Amboise in Touraine as an allodial possession, and he was, as we have seen, invested with the Countship of Anjou on the hither side of the Mayenne. But it is plain that no detailed account of his actions, or of those of his immediate successors, was preserved. His son Fulk the Red received from Charles the Simple Fulk the Red. Heed. The remaining portion of the County of Anjou, that be-888. youd the Mayenne, and he vigorously defended his enlarged dominions against the attacks of Northmen and Bretons. This Romulus was appropriately succeeded by a Numa, Fulk the Good. Fulk the Good, renowned for his piety, his almsdeeds, 938.

- <sup>2</sup> Gest. Cons. 239. "Alodium snim cognationis sorum erat Ambasium villa."
- <sup>1</sup> Count Fulk (p. 233) says, with much good sense, "Quorum quatuor Consulum virtutes et acta, quia nobis in tantum de longinquo sunt, ut etiam loca ubi corpora corum jacent nobis incognita sunt, digné memorare non possumus." Ingelgar, in the legend (p. 239), slays the accuser of a slandered lady—in this case his own godmother and benefactress—much in the style of the ballad of Sir Aldingar or of the story of Queen Gunhild.
- "Gest. Cons. 235 (so 244). "Integrum comitatum, qui priùs bipertitus erat, recepit." The Breton story (Chron. Briccense, ap. Morice, Memoires pour servir de Preuves à l'Histoire de Bretagne, pp. 29, 30) makes him—"vir maledictus et diabolicus"—marry the widow of the Breton prince Alan, and procure the death of her son Drogo.

&lt;sup>1</sup> See vol. i. pp. 277, 278. The author of the Gesta Consulum becomes eloquent on this head (p.237); "Tempore enim Caroli Calvi complures novi atque ignobiles, bono et honesto nobilibus potiores, clari et magni effecti sunt. Quos enim appetentes gloris militaris conspiciebat, periculis objectare et per cos fortunam temperare non dubitabat. Erant enim illis diebus homines veteris procapise multarumque imaginum, qui acta majorum sucrum, non sua, ostentabant; qui quum ad aliquod grave officium mittebantur, aliquem è populo monitorem sui officii sumebant, quibus quum Rez aliis imperare justisset, ipsi sibi alium imperatorem poscebant. Ideo ex illo globo paucos secum Rex Carolus habebat; novis militaria dona et hereditates pluribus laboribus et perículis acquisitas benignè prebebat. Ex quo genere fuit iste Tertullus, à quo Andegavorum Consulum progenies sumpsit exordium." See Palgrave, i. 404, 500–502; cf. ii. 11.

THE PROPERTY OF THE PARTY OF TH

CHAP. VIII. his just and peaceful government, and for being the traditional author of the proverb that an unlettered King is but a crowned ass.1 His son, Geoffrey Grisegonelle,2 renewed Geoffrey Grisegothe warlike fame of his house; he fought with his neighnelle. 958. bours of Britanny and Aquitaine; and he is said to have borne an important share in the wars between 978. King Lothar and the Emperor Otto the Second.3 After him came his son Fulk,4 surnamed Nerra or the Black, Fulk Nerra. renowned as a warrior and still more renowned as a pil-987. grim, and who is the first prince of his house whose name has found its way into the general history of France. He overthrew his brother-in-law Conan of Britanny in one or more pitched battles, which French, as well as Breton and 992. Angevin, writers thought worthy of record. He was also His war with Odo of Chartres, engaged in a war with his neighbour Odo the Second, Count of Blois and Chartres, the grandson of the famous Theobald, a war which passed on as an inheritance to the next generation, and which proved the origin of the first entanglements between Normandy and Anjou.5 It sounds like an incursion from another hemisphere, when we read how Aldebert, Count of Perigueux, Perigueux with its cupolas and its Roman tower, far away in the heart of Aquitaine, appeared as an ally of the Angevin Fulk gains Count. He took Tours and gave it to Fulk, but the and loses citizens were ill disposed to their new master, and Odo Tours. 990. recovered it after a short time. Later in his reign, Fulk Battle of Pontlevois defeated Odo in a great battle at Pontlevois in the territory 1016.

&lt;sup>1</sup> See the story of Fulk and King Lewis From-beyond-Sea in the Gesta, p. 245. The proverb was a favourite with our Henry the First, and was at least approved by the Great William. See Will. Malms. y. 390.

&lt;sup>2</sup> "Grisa gonella" = "grisa tunica." Gest. Cons. 246, 247.

&lt;sup>3</sup> See Appendix P.

&lt;sup>4</sup> Count Maurice, who, in the Gesta (249), comes between Geoffrey Grisegonelle and Fulk Nerra, finds no place in the list given by Fulk Rechin, and is rejected by the authors of the Art de Verifier les Dates.

&lt;sup>5</sup> See Appendix P.

of Toursine, and afterwards gained or recovered Saumur. CHAP. VIII. We have already met with him in the character of a mediator between contending candidates for the Crown of France,1 and he appears also in the less honourable light of an assassin, who removed a courtier of King Robert who stood in the way of the plans of his own termagant niece Queen Constance.<sup>2</sup> We hear also heavy complaints of him as a violator of ecclesiastical rule, by setting up the usurped authority of the See of Rome against the rights of the independent metropolitans of Gaul.3 But he is His pilgriperhaps best known for his two pilgrimages to the Holy mages. Sepulchre, for the ready ingenuity which he displayed on his first journey, and for the extreme of penitential humiliation by which he edified all men on the second.4 Less happy in his private than in his public career, he was troubled in his last years by a rebellion of his son; he was charged, truly or falsely, with the murder of one wife, and

&lt;sup>1</sup> See vol. i, p. 520.

&lt;sup>2</sup> According to R. Glaber (iii. 2), he sent assamins, who murdered Hugh, the courtier in question, before the King's eyes. The murder is done, according to good English precedent, at a hunting-party, which perhaps makes the story a little suspicious. See vol. i. p. 366.

* Fulk founded a monastery near Loches, in honour of the Cherubim and Seraphim, and applied to Hugh, Archbishop of Tours, to consecrate the church. The Primate refused, unless Fulk restored some alienated possessions of his see. Fulk then went to Rome with well stored money-bags, by the help of which he persuaded Pope John—which of all the Johns contemporary with Fulk we are not told—to send a Cardinal to consecrate it. The Bishops of Gaul were horrified at this invasion of their rights, and divine vengeance showed itself by the church being blown down on the night following its consecration. R. Glaber, ii. 4, copied in the Gesta Consulum, 251. Rudolf takes this opportunity to set forth his theory of the Papal authority, which is well worth studying, and which breathes in its fulness the spirit of the later Gallican liberties. The Bishop of Rome is the first of Bishops, but he may not interfere with the diocessan jurisdiction of any of his brethren.

&#x27;On Fulk's pilgrimage, see Fulc. Rech. p. 233. Gest. Consul. 252. Will. Malms. iii. 235. The Chronicler of Saint Maxentine makes him die, "ut dicitur," on pilgrimage in 1032.

See at longth Will, Malma, u. s.

CHAP. VIII. with driving another from him by ill-treatment.1 A reign of unusual length made him, during a few years, a contemporary of the Great William, and at last he left his dominions to a son under whom Normans and Angevins met for the first time in open warfare.

Geoffrey Martel. 1040.

This son, Geoffrey by name, rejoiced in the surname of Martel, which he bestowed upon himself to express the heavy blows which, like the victor of Tours, he dealt around upon all his enemies.2 He began his career in his father's lifetime. A dispute for the possession of the County of Saintonge led to a war between him and William the Sixth or the Fat, Duke of Aquitaine and Count of Poitou.<sup>3</sup> Geoffrey was successful; he took the William of Aquitanian prince prisoner, and kept him in close bondage, till his wife Eustacia ransomed him at a heavy price. According to one version, the ransom consisted only of gold and silver, the spoil or contribution of the monasteries of his Duchy. Others however assert that it was nothing short of the cession of Bourdeaux and other cities, and an engagement to pay tribute for the rest of his dominions. Three days after this hard bought deliverance, William died. Immediately afterwards, or, according to some accounts, in the course of the year before, Geoffrey married Agnes, the step-mother of his victim, the widow of William's father, William the Fifth or the Great. The marriage was, on some ground or other, branded as incestuous, and it was this imprisonment of William and

He imprisons Aquitaine. April 22, 1033.

&lt;sup>1</sup> See Art de Verifier les Dates, ii. 838.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Fulk, p. 233. "Propter que omnia bella, et propter magnanimitatem quam ibi exercebat, merito Martellus nominatus est, quasi suos conterens hostes." William of Malmesbury (iii. 231) calls him "Gaufredus cognomento Martellus, quod ipse sibi usurpaverat, quia videbatur sibi felicitate quadam omnes obsistentes contundere." Another account makes the name derived from the trade of Geoffrey's foster-father, a blacksmith, something like Donald of the Hammer in Scottish story.

<sup>3</sup> On the whole story, see Appendix Q.

this marriage with Agnes which, we are told, gave rise in CHAP. VIII. some way to Geoffrey's rebellion against his father and to Geoffrey rebels the discord between Fulk and his second wife Hildegardis against his the mother of Geoffrey. 1033.

The imprisonment of William of Aquitaine evidently made a deep impression upon men's minds at the time; but it was the standing war with the house of Chartres which brought Anjou into direct collision with Normandy, and thereby, at a somewhat later time, into connexion with England. The last energies of Odo were mainly Last days directed to objects remote from Anjou, and even from Chartres. Chartres and Blois. He was one of the party which opposed the succession of King Henry, and in so doing he must have crossed the policy of Henry's great champion Duke Robert. In a war which followed with the King His war Odo was unsuccessful, but his mind was now set upon Henry. greater things. Already Count of Champagne, he aimed 1034at restoring the great frontier state between the Eastern tempt on and the Western Franks, at reigning as King of Bur-the Kinggundy, of Lotharingia, perhaps of Italy. After meeting Burgundy. for a while with some measure of success, he was at His defeat last defeated and slain by Duke Gozelo, the father of and death Godfrey of whom we have already heard,2 in a battle near 1037. Bar in the Upper Lotharingia. His great schemes died with him. His sons were only Counts and not Kings, and their father's dominions were divided between them. The sons of both of them obtained settlements in England, His sons and a grandson of one figures largely in English history. and Theo-Stephen reigned in Champagne; his son Odo married bald. a sister of the Conqueror, and was one of the objects of his brother-in-law's bounty in England.4 Theobald inherited Blois and Chartres. His son Stephen married

&lt;sup>1</sup> See the Chronicle in Duchèsne, Rer. Franc. Scriptt. iv. 97.

&lt;sup>2</sup> See above, p. 97.

See Appendix P,

<sup>4</sup> See Appendix N.

Their wars a King of the English. But at present we have to deal with King Henry and with Count Theobald as a vassal of France at variance with Geoffrey. with his overlord, as a neighbour of Anjou inheriting the hereditary enmity of his forefathers. Touraine, part of which was already possessed by Geoffrey, and, above all, the metropolitan city of Tours, were ever the great objects of Angevin ambition. It was a stroke of policy on the part of Henry, when he formally deprived the rebel Theobald of that famous city, and bestowed it by a royal grant on the Count of Anjou.<sup>2</sup> Geoffrey was not slow to press a claim at once fresh and most plausible. He advanced on the city to assert his rights by force. Saint Martin, we are specially told, favoured the enterprise.<sup>3</sup> The brothers resisted in vain. Stephen was put to flight; Theobald was taken prisoner, and was compelled, like William of Aquitaine, to obtain his freedom by the surrender of the city.4

Both French and Angevin writers agree in describing Geoffrey as taking possession of Tours with the full consent of King Henry. Yet, in the first glimpse of Angevin affairs given us by our Norman authorities, the relations between the King of the French and the Count of Anjou

- <sup>1</sup> Fulk (p. 233) describes the cession made by Theobald to Geoffrey, and adds, "Pars autem alia Turonici pagi sibi contigerat possessione paterna." We have seen that the Counts of Anjou held Amboise and Loches.
- This grant is distinctly asserted, not only by Fulk (u.s.), "Ex voluntate Regis Henrici accepit donum Turonicæ civitatis ab ipso Rege," but also by R. Glaber (v. 2), followed by Gesta Cons. 256, "Contigit ut.. Rex, ablato ab iisdem dominio Turonicæ urbis, daret illud Gozfredo cognomento Tuditi, filio scilicet Fulconis jam dicti Andegavorum comitis." The Norman writers of course know nothing of all this, and make Geoffrey an unprovoked aggressor.
- <sup>3</sup> R. Glaber (v. 2) describes Geoffrey's victory and the captivity of Theobald, and adds, "Nulli dubium est, beato Martino auxiliante, qui illum piè invocaverat, suorum inimicorum victorem exstitisse."
- On the captivity of Theobald, see Fulk, p. 233. Gesta Cons. (largely after R. Glaber), 256. Chronn. Andd. a. 1044, ap. Labbe, i. 276, 287. Will. Pict. 86. Will. Gem. vii. 18. Will. Malms. iii. 231. R. Glaber is also followed by Hugo Flav. (Labbe, i. 186. Pertz, viii. 403).

Geoffrey receives Tours as a grant from Henry, and imprisons Theobald. 1044.

are set forth in an exactly opposite light. Geoffrey is CHAP. VIII. engaged in a rebellious war against Henry, and the Duke William helps King of the Normans appears simply to discharge his feudal Henry duty to his lord, and to return the obligation incurred by Geoffrey. the King's prompt and effectual help at Val-ès-dunes.1 1048. These two accounts are in no way inconsistent; in the space of four years the relations between the King and so dangerous a vassal as Geoffrey may very well have changed. Henry may well have found that it was not sound policy to foster the growth of one whose blows might easily be extended from Counts to Kings. The campaign which followed is dwelt on at great length by our Norman authorities and is cut significantly short by the Angevins. In its course, we are told, William gained the highest Personal reputation. The troops of Normandy surpassed in number william. the united contingents of the King and of all his other vassals.* The Duke's courage and conduct were preeminent, and they won him the first place in the King's counsels.2 But on one point Henry had to remonstrate with his valiant ally. He was forced, says the panegyrist, to warn both William himself and the chief Norman leaders against the needless exposure of so precious a life.4

Will. Pict. 82. "Vicinitudinem post has ipse Regi fide studiosissima reddidit, rogatus ab so auxilium contra quotdam inimiciesimos ei atque potentissimos ad officiendum." This writer is very confused in his chronology of the war, placing the details about Domfront and Alençon at a long distance from this passage which seems to record the beginning of hostilities.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Ib. "Cornebant Francigenze, quod invidia non cerni vellet, exercitum deductum è Normannià solà regio majorem, omnique collegio, quantum adduxerant vel miserant Comites plurimi."

&lt;sup>3</sup> Th. 83. "Rez ei quam libenter proponebat consultanda, et maxima quaque ad ejus gerebat sententiam, anteponens in perspicientià consulti melioris eum cannibus."

* Ib. "Unicum id redarguebat, quod nimium periculis objectabat se, ac plerumque pugnam quaritabat, decurrens palam cum denis aut pauci-oribus. Normannos etiam primates obsecrabat, ne committi prodium vel levissimum ante municipium aliquod paterentur; metuens videlicet

CHAP. VIII. William at no time of his life ever shrank from danger, and we may be sure that, at this time of his life especially, he thoroughly enjoyed the practice of war in all its But William's impulses were already under the forms. control of his reason. He knew, no doubt, as well as any man, that to plunge himself into needless dangers, and to run the risk of hairbreadth scapes, was no part of the real duty of a prince or a general. But he also knew that it was mainly by exploits of this kind that he must dazzle the minds of his own generation, and so obtain that influence over men which was needful for the great schemes of his life. In any other point of view, one would say that it was unworthy of William's policy to win the reputation of a knight-errant at the expense of making for himself a lasting and dangerous enemy in the Count of Anjou.

Position of Maine under Geoffrey.

The undisputed dominions of the two princes nowhere touched each other. But between them lay a country closely connected both with Normandy and with Anjou, and over which both William and Geoffrey asserted rights. This was the County of Maine, a district which was always said to have formed part of the later acquisitions of Rolf,<sup>2</sup> but of which the Norman Dukes had never taken practical possession. The history of the Cenomannian city and province will be more fittingly sketched at another stage of William's career; it is enough to say here that Geoffrey was now practical sovereign of Maine, in the character of protector, guardian, or conqueror of the young Count Hugh, the son of the famous Herbert, surnamed Wake-the-dog.<sup>3</sup> William Count Herbert. 1015. Hugh. 1036.

oocasurum virtutem ostentando, in quo regni sui præsidium firmissimum et ornamentum splendidissimum reponebat."

William of Poitiers' theory of William's rashness (83) is not very clear; "Cæterum quæ velut immoderatam fortitudinis ostentationem multoperè dissuadebat Rex atque castigabat, ea nos fervidæ atque animosæ ætati aut officio adscribimus."

2 See vol. i. p. 200.

&lt;sup>3</sup> Gesta Dom. Ambasiens. ap. D'Achery, iii. 273. "Quidam Comes pernimium juvenis Herbertus, cognomento Evigilans Canem." See Palgrave, iii. 240.

and Geoffrey thus became immediate neighbours, and Geof- OHAP. VIII. frey, with the craft of his house, knew how to strike a blow where William was weakest. Two chief fortresses guarded The fortthe frontier between Maine and Normandy. Each com- Domfront manded its own valley, its own approach into the heart of and Alenthe Norman territory; each watched over a stream flowing from Norman into Cenomannian ground. These were Domfront towards the western, and Alençon towards the eastern, portion of the frontier. Domfront commanded the region watered by the Mayenne and its tributaries, while Alençon was the key of the valley of the Sarthe, the keeper of the path which led straight to the minster of Seez and to the donjon of Falaise. Of these two strongholds, Alençon stood on Norman, Domfront on Cenomannian soil.1 Norman writers maintained that Domfront, no less than Alençon, was of right a Norman possession, both fortresses alike having been reared by the licence of Richard the Good.<sup>2</sup> But even Alençon, whatever may have been its Disloyalty origin, was at this time far from being a sound member of Alençon. of the Norman body-politic. As a lordship of William Talvas, it shared in the ambiguous character, half Norman, half French, which attached to all the border possessions of the house of Belesme. And, as events presently showed, its inhabitants shared most fully in the spirit in which the

One might fancy from the words of William of Jumièges (vii. 18), "Cœpit Normanniam rapinis vehementer demoliri, intra Danfrontis castrum seditiosis custodibus immissis," that Domfront was now Norman. But it is clear from William of Poitiers (86) that it was, as a town of Maine, in Geoffrey's possession at the beginning of the war; "Willelmus . . adibat cum exercitu terram Andegavensem, ut reddens talionem primo abalienaret Gaufredo Damfrontum, post reciperit Alentium." So William of Malmesbury (iii. 231), "Damfruntum, quod erat tunc comitis Andegavorum, obsidione coronavit." So also Roman de Rou, 9382;

&quot;Alençon ert de Normendie E Danfronz del Maine partie."

&lt;sup>2</sup> Will. Pict. 89. "Perhibent homines antiquioris memorise, castra hac ambo Comitis Ricardi concessu esse fundata, unum intra alterum, proximè fines Normannia."

CHAP. VIII. Lord of Alençon had cursed the Bastard in his cradle.1 We are told also that the citizens both of Alençon and of Domfront disliked the rule of William, on account of the strict justice which he administered and the checks which he put on their marauding practices.2 This complaint sounds rather as if it came from turbulent barons than from burghers; yet it is quite possible that the burghers of a frontier town, especially on a frontier which was very doubtful and ill defined, may have indulged in those breaches of the peace which it was William's greatest praise, both in Normandy and in England, to chastise without mercy. At any rate, the people of Alençon were thoroughly disloyal to Normandy, and they willingly received the Angevin Count and his garrison.<sup>3</sup> William returned the blow of Geoffrey's hammer in kind. Leaving Alençon for a while to itself, he crossed the frontier, Angevin or Cenomannian as we may choose to call it, and laid siege to Domfront. his exploits On his march he found that treason was not wholly exon the way. tinguished, even among his own troops. He had gone on a foraging or plundering party with fifty horse; 4 a traitor, a Norman noble, sent word of his whereabout to the defenders of the town, who sent forth, we are told, three hundred horse and seven hundred foot to attack the Duke unexpectedly. It sounds like romance when we read

Alençon garrisoned by Geoffrey.

William marches to Domfront:

&lt;sup>1</sup> See above, p. 186. So William of Malmesbury (iii. 231), "Pronis in perfidiam habitatoribus."

&lt;sup>2</sup> Will. Pict. 87. "Deferre haudquaquam volebant dominum sub quo licenter quaestum latrociniis contraherint: quali caussa fuerant seducti inhabitantes Alentium." He then goes on with one of his panegyrics on William's stern justice.

&lt;sup>3</sup> Ib. 86. "Inhabitatores ad se pronos reppererat."

<sup>4</sup> Ib. 87. "Ubi approximabatur Danfronto, cum equitibus divertit quinquaginta, acceptum quæ stippendium augerent." But this curious euphemism for what one would have thought in those days hardly needed apology is explained in the next sentence, "Prædæ autem index castellanis prodidit ipsum quidam ex Normannis majoribus, intimans quò aut cur ierit, et quam paucis comitatus, atque hunc esse qui mortem fugæ præferret."

that William at once charged and overthrew the horseman OHAP. VIII. nearest to him, that the rest were seized with a sudden panic and took to flight, that the Duke and his little band chased them to the gates of Domfront, and that William carried off one prisoner with his own hands.1 Such stories are no doubt greatly exaggerated; the details may often be pure invention; but, as contemporary exaggerations and inventions, they show the kind of merit which Normans then looked for in their rulers, and they show the kind of exploit of which William himself was thought capable. And the perfectly casual mention of the traitor in the Traitors in Norman camp is instructive in another way. We have man camp. here no doubt merely an example of what often happened, and the way in which treason is spoken of as an everyday matter sets vividly before us the difficulties with which William, even now after the victory of Valès-dunes, had still to contend at every step.2

William now laid siege to Domfront. The town was Siege of strong both by its fortifications and by its natural position. The spirit of the citizens was high, and they were further strengthened by the presence of a chosen body of Angevin troops sent by Count Geoffrey. An assault was hopeless where two steep and narrow paths were the only ways by which the fortress could be approached even on foot. William surrounded it with four towers, and the Norman army sat down before it. The Duke was foremost in every attack, in every ambush, in every night march to cut off

&lt;sup>1</sup> Will. Pict. 87. "Captum suis unum manibus retinuit."

&lt;sup>2</sup> Compare, on the chances of treason near William's person, those remarkable expressions of William of Jumièges (vii. 4) which have been already quoted in p. 200.

*Will. Pict. 87. "Celerem irruptionem situs oppidi denegabat omni robori sive peritise; quum scopulorum asperitas pedites etiam deturbaret, præter qui angustis itineribus duobus atque arduis accederent." There is here something of the Norman trust in cavalry; there is a feeling as if a place where horsemen were of no use had some unfairness about it.

* Ib. "Castella circumponit quatuor."

CHAP. VIII. the approach of those who sought to bring either messages or provisions to the besieged town. Yet we are told that he found himself so safe in the enemy's country that he often enjoyed the sports of hunting and hawking, for comes to relieve Domfront.

Geoffrey

Messages between William and Geoffrey. Early knighterrantry.

which the neighbouring woods afforded special opportu-1048-1049. nities.2 The siege had continued for some time in this way, and it was now seemingly winter,3 when news was brought that Count Geoffrey was advancing with a large force to the relief of the town. A tale of knight-errantry follows, the main substance of which, coming as it does from a contemporary writer, we have no ground for disbelieving, even though some details may have been heightened to enhance the glory of William. The story is worthy of attention as showing that, amid all the apparent rudeness of the times, some germs of the later follies of chivalry had already begun to show themselves. As the Angevin army approached, William sent a message to Geoffrey by the hands of two of his chosen friends, two youths who had grown up along with him, and who were destined to share example of with him in all his greatest dangers and greatest successes. Both were men who lived to be famous in English history, Roger of Montgomery, the son-in-law of the terrible Talvas,4 and William, the son of that Osbern who had lost his life through his faithfulness to his master.5 These two trusty companions were sent to see Count Geoffrey, and to get from him an explanation of his purpose. Geoffrey told them that, at daybreak the next morning,

&lt;sup>1</sup> Will. Pict. 87. "Aliquando perdius et pernox equitans, vel in abditis occultus explorat, si qui offendantur aut commeatum advectantes, aut in legatione directi, aut pabulatoribus suis insidiantes."

&lt;sup>2</sup> Ib. "Est regio illa silvis abundans ferarum feracissimis. Sæpe falconum, sæpissime accipitrum volatu oblectatur." The distinction between the use of falcons and that of hawks—did William stoop to the sparrow-hawk !—is worth the notice of those who are versed in the minuter technicalities of animal torture.

<sup>3</sup> Ib. "Non loci difficultas, aut sævitia hiemis," &c.

<sup>4</sup> See above, pp. 185, 196.

See above, p. 198.

he would come and beat up William's quarters before CHAP. VIII. Domfront. There should be no mistake about his person; he would be known by such a dress, such a shield, such a coloured horse. The Norman messengers answered that he need not trouble himself to come so far as the Norman quarters; he whom he sought would come and visit him nearer home. Duke William would be ready for battle, with such a horse, such a dress, such manner of weapons.2 The Normans appeared the next morning, eager for fight, and their Duke the most eager among them.3 But no Geoffrey enemy was there to await them; before the Normans came in sight, the Count of Anjou and his host had decamped. Geoffrey doubtless, like some later generals, retired only for strategical reasons; but the Norman writers can see no nobler motive for his conduct than his being seized with a sudden panic.4 Here, and throughout the war, the lions

<sup>1</sup> Will. Pict. 88. "Præsignat qualem in prælio equum sit habiturus, quale scutum, qualem vestitum." The device on the shield was therefore still left to the fancy of the wearer. Had the Counts of Anjou already possessed hereditary armorial bearings, the Normans could hardly have needed to be told what kind of shield Geoffrey would carry.

Ib. "Illi contra opus non esse respondent instituto eum itinere longiùs fatigari. Nam continuò propter quem vadit adfore. Equum vicissim domini sui præsignant, vestitum, et arma." Here, it may be remarked, is no special mention of the shield; it comes under the general head of "arma."

It is almost profanation to compare warfare of this sort with the patriot struggle at Maldon, yet there is in all this something analogous to Brihtnoth's over-chivalry in allowing the Northmen to cross the river. See vol. i. p. 300. But Brihtnoth may after all have had a reason for his conduct. Cf. Herod. v. 118.

The reason given by William of Poitiers (u. s.) for the Duke's special zeal is one of the most amazing things that I ever came across. "Omnium accrrimus ipse Dux inurget accelerantes. Tyrannum fortasse absumi desiderabat adolescens piissimus; quod ex omnibus præclaris factis pulcerrimum judicavit Senatus Latinus et Atheniensis." The instances of Tyrannicide collected by Jean Petit (see Hist. Fed. Gov. i. 383) are strange enough, but the idea of William gaining the honours of a Timoleon by slaying Geoffrey in battle beats them all.

Will. Pict. u. s. "Subitaneo tenore consternatus Gaufredus, adversa acie necdum conspecta, profugio salutem suam cum agmine toto committit."

denly refuse to do their duty. We have no Angevin account of the siege of Domfront to set against our evidently highly coloured Norman picture.

William marches suddenly to Alençon, and besieges the town.

The whole country now lay open for William to harry; but he knew better than to waste time and energy on mere useless ravages. He determined rather to strike another sudden blow. Leaving a force before Domfront, he marched all night, through the enemy's country, along the course of the Mayenne, passing by Mehendin, Pointel, and Saint-Samson.<sup>2</sup> He thus suddenly appeared before Alençon with the morning light.8 A bridge over the Sarthe, strongly fortified with a ditch and a palisade, divided the Norman from the Cenomannian territory.4 This bridge now served as a barrier against a Duke of the Normans attacking his own town from the Cenomannian side. The defenders of the bridge, whether Angevins or disaffected Normans, received the Duke with the grossest personal insult. They spread out skins and leather jerkins, and beat them, shouting, "Hides, Insults offered to William at Alençon.

Wace (9601) makes him make a little show of preparation for battle, but he presently yields to the wiser advice of a knight who counsels flight. Wace (9527-9628) puts this whole story later, after the taking of Alençon. He adds a third to the two messengers in William of Poitiers, namely William Fitz-Thierry (9539).

- <sup>1</sup> Will. Pict. 88. "Novit esse prudentium victorize temperare, atque non satis potentem esse qui semet in potestate ulsciscendi continere non possit." William of Jumièges (vii. 18) adds another reason; "Ecce adsunt exploratores, Alencium castrum absque suorum detrimento eum capere posse nuntiantes." This is his first mention of Alençon.
  - <sup>2</sup> Roman de Rou, 9436 et seqq.
  - * Will. Gem. u. s. "Tots nocte equitans diluculo Alencium venit."
- 4 William of Jumièges (u. s.) merely says, "In quodam municipio trans flumen posito." Wace is much fuller (9440 et seqq.);

"Alençon est sor Sartre asiz, Iloec devize le païz;
Normanz sunt devers li chastel,
Et ultre l'ewe sunt Mansel."

He then goes on to describe the bridge and its defences.

ides for the Tanner." The Duke of the Normans had OHAP. VIII. cted a merciful and generous part towards the rebels of Tal-ès-dunes and Brionne; but the grandson of Fulbert Falaise could not endure the jeers thus thrown on his lescent by the spindle side. Anything like a personal insult is commonly far more unpardonable in princely By es than a real injury. The one act of cruelty which stains the reign of our great Edward is the slaughter of 1296. the inhabitants of Berwick in revenge for a jesting and not very intelligible ballad sung against him from the walls.2 So now William swore, according to his fashion, by the Splendour of God,3 that the men who thus mocked him should be dealt with like a tree whose branches are cut off by the pollarding-knife.4 He kept his word.

<sup>1</sup> Will. Gem. vii. 18. "Pelles enim et renones ad injuriam Ducis verberaverant, ipsumque pelliciarium despective vocitaverant, ee quod parentes matris ejus pelliciarii exstiterant." So Wace, 9458;

"Willeame unt asez convicié;

U peletiers aveit ases;

Plusurs feiz li unt hucié;

Li unt cel mestier reprocé,

La pel, la pel al parmentier,

E par cuntraire è par vilté."

Pur ceo ke à Faleize fu nez,

Wace seems to wish to evade the Duke's actual kindred with the professors of the unsavoury craft.

<sup>2</sup> Annales Anglise et Scotise, ap. Riley, Rishanger, p. 373. The words were,

> "Kyng Edward, wanne þu havest Berwic, pike þe, Wanne bu havest geten, dike be."

Cf. Peter Langtoft, ii. 272. Hearne. Compare William's indignation at the insults offered to him at Exeter (Will. Malms. iii. 248), though he seems to have been in a much less savage mood there than that at Compare also the indignation of James the Second, at the indignities offered to him by the fishermen (Macaulay, i. 569), and that of William the Third at Sir John Fenwick's impertinence to the Queen (Ib. iv. 34).

<sup>3</sup> Roman de Rou, 9466;

"Jura par la resplendor Dé, Co ert suvent sun serement."

<sup>4</sup> This very expressive formula comes from Wace, 9468;

"S'il pot cels prendre, malement Ne porterunt ne pié ne puing, Lur sera cel dit achaté: Ne ne verrunt ne preus ne luing."

Des membres serunt esmundé.

CHAP. VIII. A vigorous assault was made upon the bridge. Houses were unroofed, and the timbers were thrown into the fosse.1 Fire was set to the mass; the wood was dry, the flame spread, the palisades and gates were burned down, and William was master of the bridge, and with it of the town of Alençon. The castle still held out. The Conqueror, faithful to his fearful oath, now gave the first of parts of his character really deserve.

He takes the town. and mutilates his prisoners.

> were cut off,2 and the dismembered limbs were thrown over the walls of the castle, as a speaking menace to its defenders.3 The threat did its work; the garrison sur-> that long list of instances of indifference to human suffering which have won for him a worse name than many offenders were brought before him; their hands and feet

Thirty-two of the rendered, bargaining only for safety for life and limb.4 Alençon, tower and town, was thus taken so speedily that William's panegyrist says that he might renew the boast of Cæsar, "I came; I saw; I conquered." Leaving

<sup>1</sup> Roman de Rou, 9477.

<sup>2</sup> Will. Gem. vii. 18. "Illusores verò, coram omnibus infra Alencium consistentibus, manibus privari jussit et pedibus. Nec mora, sicut jusserat, triginta duo debilitati sunt." So Roman de Rou, 9489 et seqq. William of Poitiers is silent altogether both as to the vengeance and as to the insult. Neither subject was perhaps altogether agreeable to a professed panegyrist. But William cuts the whole story of Alençon very short.

<sup>3</sup> Roman de Rou, 9493;

"El chastel fist li piés geter Por cels dedenz espoanter."

4 Will. Gem. vii. 18. "Custodes autem castelli tam severam austeritatem Ducis cognoscentes timuerunt, et ne similia paterentur, ilicò portas aperuerunt, Ducique castellum reddiderunt, malentes illud reddere quam cum suorum periculo membrorum tam gravia tormenta tolerare." Wace (9500) makes the terms

"Quitement aler s'en porreient; Salva lur membres è salva lur cors."

So William of Malmesbury (iii. 231); "Alentini se dedidere, pacti membrorum salutem." But he had not mentioned the mutilation.

<sup>5</sup> Will. Pict. 89. "Oppidum enim naturâ, opere, atque armaturâ munitissimum adeò currente proventu in ejus manum venit ut gloriari his verbis liceret, Veni, Vidi, Vici."

a garrison in Alençon, the Duke hastened back to GRAP. VIII. Domfront, the fame of his conquest and of his cruelty Domfront surrenders. going before him. The man before whom Alençon had fallen, before whom the Hammer of Anjou had fled without striking a blow, had become an enemy too fearful for the men of Domfront to face.1 They surrendered on terms somewhat more favourable than those which had been granted to the defenders of the castle of Alençon; they were allowed to retain their arms as well as their lives and limbs.2 William entered Domfront, and displayed the banner of Normandy over the donjon.3 The town henceforth became a standing menace on the side of Normandy against Maine, and it formed, together with Alençon, the main defence of the southern frontier of the Duchy. If William undertook the war to discharge his feudal duty towards King Henry, he certainly did not lose the opportunity for permanently strengthening his own dominions. In fact, in our Norman accounts, the King of the French has long ago slipped away from the scene, and the Count of Chartres has vanished along with him. William and Geoffrey remain the only figures in the foreground. The Duke, having secured his frontier, William marched, seemingly without resistance, into the undoubted Ambières. territory of Maine; he there fortified a castle at Ambières, and returned in triumph to Rouen.4

The men of Alençon had jeered at the grandson of the Tanner; but the sovereign who so sternly chastised their

VOL. II.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Will. Pict. 89. "Percutit citissimè hic rumor Danfrontinos. Diffidentes itaque altus clipeo se liberandos post fugam famosissimi bellatoris Gaufredi Martelli," &c.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Roman de Rou, 9624.

³ Ib. 9625;

&quot;E li Dus fist sun gonfanon Lever è porter el dangon."

<sup>4</sup> Will. Gem. vii. 18. Roman de Rou, 9631.

CHAP. VIII. jests was determined to show that the baseness of his mother's origin in no way hindered him from promoting his kinsmen on the mother's side. If one grandson of Fulbert wore the ducal crown of Normandy, another already wore the mitre of Bayeux; and another great promotion, almost equivalent to adoption into the ducal house, was now to be bestowed upon a third. The county William the Warlof Mortain-Moritolium in the Diocese of Avranches<sup>1</sup> ing; -was now held by William, surnamed Warling, son of Malger, a son of Richard the Fearless and Gunnor.2 He was therefore a first cousin of William's father, a his connexion with descendant of the ducal stock as legitimate as any the ducal family. other branch of it. We have not heard his name in the accounts of any of the former disturbances; but it is clear that he might, like so many others, have felt himself aggrieved by the accession of the Bastard. Among Robert the the knights in Count William's service was one, so the Bigod. story runs, who bore a name hitherto unknown to history, though not unknown to legend and fanciful etymology, but a name which was to become more glorious on English ground than the names of Fitz-Osbern and Montgomery. The sons of Robert the Bigod's were to rule where Harold now held his Earldom, and his remote descendant was to win a place in English history worthy of Harold himself, as the man who wrested the freedom

&lt;sup>1</sup> This Moretolium or Moretonium must be carefully distinguished from Mauritania, Moretonia, or Mortagne-en-Perche, in the Diocese of Seez.

&lt;sup>2</sup> William of Jumièges (vii. 19) merely calls him "Willelmus cognomento Werlencus, de stirpe Richardi Magni." Orderic (660 B) calls him "Guillelmum cognomento Werlengum, Moritolii Comitem, filium Malgerii Comitis," and Malger appears as an uncle of Duke Robert in Will. Gem. vi. 7.

Will. Gem. u.s. "Quidam tiro de familia sua nomine Robertus Bigot." The name Bigod or Bigot, which we have already seen (see above, p. 201) applied as a term of contempt for the Normans, has been connected with Rolf's "English" (see vol. i. p. 191) oath, "Ne se bigoth." Chron. Tur. ap. Duchèsne, iii. 360.

of England from the greatest of England's later Kings.1 CHAP. VIII. The patriarch of that great house was now a knight so poor that he craved leave of his lord to leave his service, and to seek his fortune among his countrymen who were carving out for themselves lordships and principalities in Apulia. The Count bade him stay where he was; within eighty days he, Robert the Bigod, would be able, there in Normandy, to lay his hands on whatever good things it pleased him. In such a speech treason plainly lurked; He charges and Robert, whether out of duty to his sovereign or with treain the hope of winning favour with a more powerful son. master, determined that the matter should come to the ears of the Duke. The Bigod was a kinsman of Richard of Avranches, the son of Thurstan the rebel of Falaise,2 and Richard was now high in favour at the court of William. By his means Robert obtained an introduction to the Duke, and told him of the treasonable words of the Count of Mortain. William accordingly sent for his cousin, and charged him with plotting against the state. He had, the Duke told him, determined again to disturb the peace of the country, and again to bring about the reign of licence. But, while he, Duke William, lived, the peace which Normandy so much needed should, by God's help, never be disturbed again.4 Count

<sup>1</sup> For the famous dialogue between Edward the First and the Earl Marshal Roger Bigod, see Walter of Hemingburgh, ii. 121 (ed. Hamilton). Could we suppose that either King or Earl spoke English (doubtless both understood it), one might see in the King's oath ("Per Deum, Comes, aut ibis aut pendebis") and the Earl's retort ("Per idem juramentum, O Rex, nec ibo nec pendebo") an allusion to the punning derivation of the name Bigod just mentioned.

&lt;sup>a</sup> See above, p. 206.

Will. Gem. vii. 19. "Per Richardum Abrincatensem cognatum suum familiaritatem Ducis consequutus est."

&lt;sup>4</sup> Ib. "Seditiosis tumultibus Normanniam perturbare decrevisti, et contra me rebellans me nequiter exhæredare disposuisti, ideoque rapacitatis tempus egeno militi promisisti. Sed nobiseum, cum dono Creatoris, ut indigemus, maneat pax perennis."

William the Warling goes to Apulia.

Robert, Count of Mortain.

CHAP. VIII. William must at once leave the country, and not return to it during the lifetime of his namesake the Duke. The proud Lord of Mortain was thus driven to do what his poor knight had thought of doing. He went to the wars in Apulia in humble guise enough, attended by a single esquire. The Duke at once bestowed the vacant County of Mortain on his half-brother Robert, the Of him we shall hear son of Herlwin and Herleva. again in the tale of the Conquest of England. Thus, says oùr informant, did William pluck down the proud kindred of his father and lift up the lowly kindred of his mother.1

Estimate of Wilduct.

This affair of William of Mortain is one of which we ham's con- may well wish for further explanation. We are hardly in a position to judge of the truth or falsehood of the charge brought by Robert the Bigod against his lord.2 We have no statement from the other side; we have no defence from the Count of Mortain; all that we are told is that, when arraigned before the Duke, he neither confessed nor denied the charge.3 We need not doubt that William was honestly anxious to preserve his Duchy from internal disturbances. But in this case his justice, if justice it was, fell so sharply and speedily as to have very much the look of interested oppression. It was impossible to avoid the suspicion that William the Warling was sacrificed to the Duke's wish to make a provision for his halfbrother. We are not surprised to find that the charge of having despoiled and banished his cousin on frivolous pretences was brought up against William by his enemies in later times, and was not forgotten by historians in the CHAP. VIII. next generation.1

&lt;sup>1</sup> Will. Gem. vii. 19. "Sic tumidos sui patris parentes asperè prostravit, humilesque matris suse propinques honorabiliter exaltavit."

&lt;sup>2</sup> The whole story is highly coloured by Sir F. Palgrave, iii. 224. William of Mortain may very likely have been guilty, but the evidence was very weak.

&lt;sup>3</sup> Will. Gem. u. s. "Nec negare potuit, neque intentionem dicti declarare præsumpsit."

The energy of William had thus, for the time, thoroughly quelled all his foes, and his Duchy seems Prosperous for some years to have enjoyed as large a share of condition peace and prosperity as any state could enjoy in those mandy. troubled times. The young Duke was at last firmly settled in the ducal seat, and he now began to think of strengthening himself by a marriage into the family of some neighbouring prince. And he seems to have already made up his mind in favour of the woman who retained his love during the remainder of their joint lives, Matilda,2 William the daughter of Baldwin, Count of Flanders. He must Matilda of have been in treaty for her hand very soon after the Flanders in mar-Angevin war, as the marriage was forbidden by a decree riage. of the Council of Rheims.3 But the marriage itself did 1049. not take place till several years later, and the negotiation 1053. opened so many questions, and was connected with so many later events, that I reserve the whole subject of William's marriage for a later chapter. William had to William's struggle through as many difficulties to obtain undisputed objects, possession of his wife as he had to obtain undisputed pos- Wife, and Kingdom, session of either his Duchy or his Kingdom. And he all pursued in the like spirit.

<sup>1</sup> Ord. Vit. 534 B. "Ipse Guillelmum Guarlengum Moritolii Comitem pro uno verbo exhæredavit et de Neustria penitus effugavit." This comes in the speech at the famous bride-ale of 1076, but the historian afterwards says in his own person (660 B), "Guillelmum cognomento Werlengum . . . pro minimis occasionibus de Neustriâ propulsaverat."

<sup>2</sup> The grand old Teutonic name of Machthild had by this time become in Latin Mathildis, and in French mouths and in the mouths of Englishmen pronouncing French names, it became Mahtild, Mahault, Molde, Maud, and so forth. The name is familiar to students of Saxon history, and to the students, if there be any, of our own Æthelweard.

<sup>3</sup> Concilia, ed. Labbe and Coss. ix. 1092. Stapleton, Arch. Journal, iii. 20. "Interdixit etiam Balduino Comiti Flandrensi ne filiam suam Wilielmo Nortmanno nuptui daret, et illi ne eam acciperet." On this Council, see above, p. 112.

SHAP. VIII. struggled after all three with the same deliberate energy, ever waiting his time, taking advantage of every opportunity, never baffled by any momentary repulse. His struggle for Normandy was now, for the time, over; he had fairly conquered his own Duchy, and he had now only to defend it. His struggle for Matilda had already begun; a struggle almost as hard as the other, though one which was to be fought, not with bow and spear, but with the weapons of legal and canonical disputation. Whether he had already begun to lift up his eyes to the succession of his childless cousin, whether he had already formed the hope that the grandson of the despised Tanner might fill, not only the ducal chair of Normandy, but the Imperial throne of Britain, is a question to which we can give no certain answer. But there can be little doubt that, soon after this time, the idea was forcibly brought before his mind. And, with characteristic pertinacity, when he had once dreamed of the prize, he never slackened in its pursuit till he could at last call it his own.

Condition

Normandy was now at rest, enjoying the rest of hardof England. won peace and prosperity. England was also at rest, if we may call it rest to lie prostrate in a state of feverish She rested, as a nation rests whose hopes are stillness. crushed, whose leaders are torn from her, which sees for the moment no chance of any doom but hopeless submission to the stranger. It was at this crisis in the history of the two lands that the Duke of the Normans appeared as a guest at the court of England. Visits of mere friendship and courtesy among sovereign princes were in those days. The rulers of the earth seldom William's visit to England. 1051.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Chron. Wig. 1052. "Da sone com Willelm Eorl fram geondan ssé, mid mycclum werode Frenciscra manna; and se cyning hine underfeng, and swa feela his geferan swa him to onhagode, and let hine eft ongean." See also Roman de Rou, 10539 et seqq., where however the journey is put much too late.

met, save when a superior lord required the homage of oner vm. a princely vassal, or when Princes came together, at the summons of the temporal or the spiritual chief of Christendom, to discuss the common affairs of nations and churches. Such visits as those which William and Eustace of Boulogne paid at this time to Eadward were, in England at least, altogether novelties. And they were novelties which were not likely to be acceptable to the national English mind. We may Estimate be sure that every patriotic Englishman looked with an in English evil eye on any French-speaking prince who made his way eyes. to the English court. Men would hardly be inclined to draw the distinction which justice required to be drawn between Eustace of Boulogne and William of Rouen. And yet, under any other circumstances, England, or any other land, might have been proud to welcome such a guest as the already illustrious Duke. Under unparalleled difficulties he had displayed unrivalled powers; he had shone alike in camp and in council; he had triumphed over every enemy; he had used victory with moderation; he was fast raising his Duchy to a high place among European states, and he was fast winning for himself the highest personal place among European Princes. Already, at the age of twentythree, the Duke of the Normans might have disputed the palm of personal merit even with the great prince who then filled the throne of the world. He had, on a narrower field, displayed qualities which fairly put him on a level with Henry himself. But, in English eyes, William was simply the most powerful, and therefore the most dangerous, of the greedy Frenchmen who every day flocked in greater numbers to the court of the English King. William came with a great following; he tarried awhile in his cousin's company; he went away loaded with gifts and honours.1

&lt;sup>1</sup> Flor. Wig. 1051. "His gestis Nortmannicus Comes Willelmus cum multitudine Nortmannorum Angliam venit, quem Rex Eadwardus et

Eadward's alleged the Crown probably made at this time. General of things favourable

CHAP. VIII. And we can hardly doubt that he also went away encouraged by some kind of promise, or at any rate by some promise of kind of implied hope, of succeeding to the Kingdom which to William he now visited as a stranger. There was indeed everything to raise the hope in his breast. He landed in England; he journeyed to the court of England; his course lay through appearance what were in truth the most purely English parts of England; but the sons of the soil lay crushed without a chief. to William. On the throne sat a King of his own kin, English in nothing but in the long succession of glorious ancestors of whom he showed himself so unworthy. His heart was Norman; his speech was French; men of foreign birth were alone welcome at his court; men of foreign birth were pre-The highest places of the dominant in his councils. Church were already filled by Norman Prelates. Norman Primate of all England, the choicest favourite of the King, the man at whose bidding he was ready to believe that black was white, would doubtless be the first to welcome his native sovereign to his province and diocese. The great city which was fast becoming the capital of England, the city beneath whose walls Eadward had fixed his chosen dwelling, had been made to own the spiritual rule of another Norman priest. A short journey, a hunting-party or a pilgrimage, would bring King and Duke within the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of a third Norman, the unworthy stranger who disgraced the episcopal throne of Dorchester. Among the temporal chiefs of the Kingdom there was already one French Earl, kinsman alike of William and of Eadward, who would not fail in showing honour to the most renowned of his speech and kindred. Norman > socios ejus honorificè suscepit, et magnis multisque donatum muneribus ad Nortmanniam remisit." Roman de Rou, 10548;

Norman predominance in England.

"Et Ewart forment l'énora : Mult li dona chiens è oisels El altres aveir boens è bels, E kanke il trover poeit Ki à haut hom cunveneit." Stallers, Treasurers, personal officers of every kind, swarmed CHAP. VIII. around the person of the King. Norman Thegns were already scattered through the land, and were already filling the land with those threatening castles, of which the wise policy of William had destroyed so many within his own dominions. Robert the son of Wymarc, Richard the son of Scrob, and the whole herd of strangers who were fattening on English soil, would flock to pay their duty to a more exalted countryman who came on the same errand as themselves. They would tell him with delight and pride how the insolence of the natives had been crushed, how the wrongs of Count Eustace had been avenged, and how the rebel leaders had been driven to flee from justice. They would speak of England as a land which Norman influences had already conquered, and which needed only one exertion of the strong will and the strong hand to enable the Norman to take formal possession. The land was fast becoming their own. Some wild tribes, in parts of the island to which William's journey was not likely to extend, might still remain under aged chieftains of English or Danish birth. But even these rude men had been found, whether through fear or policy, ready to fall in with the plans of the Norman faction, and to range themselves against the champions of the national cause. And the richest and most civilized parts of the land, the very parts which had been so lately held by the sturdiest champions of Norman innovations, had now become one great field for Normans of every class to settle in. From Kent to Hereford they might enrich themselves with the lands and largesses which a gracious King was never weary of showering upon them. That King was childless; he had no heir apparent or presumptive near to him; he had had

According to modern laws of succession, the heir of Eadward was undoubtedly Walter of Mantes, the son of his sister Godgifu, and elder brother of Ralph of Hereford. The Ætheling Eadward, it must always be

Lack of direct heirs in the royal house.

CHAP. VIII. a brother, but that brother had been done to death by English traitors, with the fallen captain of traitors at their head. Not a single near kinsman of the royal house could be found in England. The only surviving male descendant of Æthelred was the banished son of Eadmund, who, far away in his Hungarian refuge, perhaps hardly occurred to the minds of Norman courtiers. William was Eadward's kinsman; it was convenient to forget that, though he was Eadward's kinsman, yet not a single drop of royal or English blood flowed in his veins. It was convenient to forget that, even among men of foreign birth, there were those who were sprung, by female descent at least, from the kingly stock of England. Ralph of Hereford was the undoubted grandson of Æthelred, but the claims of the timid Earl of the Magesætas could hardly be pressed against those of the renowned Duke of the Normans. It was convenient to forget that, by English Law, mere pect of the descent gave no right, and that, if it had given any right, William had no claim by descent to plead. It was easy to dwell simply on the nearness by blood, on the nearness by mutual good offices, which existed between the English King and the Norman Duke. There was everything to suggest the thought of the succession to William's own mind; there was everything to suggest it to the foreign counsellors who stood around the throne of Eadward. Probably William, Eadward, and Eadward's counsellors > remembered, was not, according to our notions, the heir of the King, but the King was the heir of the Ætheling. But, as female descent had never been recognized, one can hardly suppose that the children of Godgifu were looked on as Æthelings, or as at all entitled to any preference in disposing of the Crown. I am therefore justified in saying that Eadward had neither apparent nor presumptive heir. This is a principle to which I shall have to refer again.

> were alike ignorant or careless of the English Constitution.

They did not, or they would not, remember that the Kingdom was not a private estate, to be passed from man to man

Constitutional aspromise.

either according to the caprice of a testator or according to chap. VIII. the laws of strict descent. They did not remember that no man could hold the English Crown in any way but as the free gift of the English people. The English people would seem to them to be a conquered race, whose formal consent, if it needed to be asked at all, could be as easily extorted as it had been by Swend and Cnut. If they dared to refuse, they might surely be overcome by the Norman no less easily than they had been overcome by the Dane. It would probably seem to them that the chances were all in favour of William's being able to succeed quietly as the heir or legatee of Eadward. If those chances failed, it would still be open to him to make his entry by arms as the avenger of the blood of Ælfred and his companions.

The moment was thus in every way favourable for No direct suggesting to William on the one hand, to Eadward on the point. the other, the idea of an arrangement by which William should succeed to the English Crown on Eadward's death. We have no direct evidence that any such arrangement took place at this time, but all the probabilities of the story lead irresistibly to the belief that such was the case. The purely English writers are silent, but then they are silent as to any bequest or arrangement in William's favour at any time. They tell us nothing as to the nature of his claim to the Crown; they record his invasion, but they record nothing as to its motives.1 The Norman writers, on the other hand, so full of Eadward's promise to William, nowhere connect it with William's visit to England, which one only among them speaks But Norman writers, Norman records, the of at all.2

See the Abingdon and Worcester Chronicles, and Florence of Worcester, under 1066.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Namely Wace, quoted above, p. 295. He must have got his account from an English source.

CHAP. VIII. general consent of the age, confirmed rather than conlish writers.

Negative futed by the significant silence of the English writers, the Eng. all lead us to believe that, at some time or other, some kind of promise of the succession was made by Eadward to William. The case of Eadward's promise is like the case of Harold's oath. No English writer mentions either; but the silence of the English writers confirms rather than disproves the fact of both. All those Norman calumnies which they could deny, the English writers do most emphatically deny. The fact then that they never formally deny the reports, which they must have heard, that Harold swore an oath to William, that Eadward made a promise in favour of William, may be accepted as the strongest proof that some kind of oath was sworn, that some kind of promise was made. Had either Eadward's promise or Harold's oath been a pure Norman invention, William could never have paraded both in the way that he did in the eyes of Europe; he could never have turned them to the behoof of his cause in the way that he so successfully did. I admit then some promise of Eadward, some oath of Harold. But that is all. The details, as they are given by the various Norman writers, are so different, so utterly contradictory, that we can say nothing, on their showing, as to the time, place, We are left with or circumstances of either event. the bare fact, and for anything beyond it we must look to the probabilities of the case. The oath of Harold I shall discuss at the proper time; at present mise of Eadward. and some oath of Harold, historical. but the Norman details untrustworthy.

Some pro-

we come to Florence's account of Harold's election and o tion, we shall see how carefully every word is weighed, with the obvious intention of excluding some Norman misrepresentation or other. The fables about Harold seizing the crown, about his crowning himself, his being crowned by Stigand, and so forth, are all implicitly denied; so is Eadward's alleged last bequest to William; but there is not a word to exclude either an earlier promise on the part of Eadward or an oath on the part of Harold. Both these subjects are avoided.

we are concerned with the bequest of the English CHAP. VIII. Crown said to have been made by Eadward in favour of William.

Every one who has grasped the true nature of the No power English Constitution, as it stood in the eleventh century, in the will fully understand that, strictly speaking, any bequest of King, only the kind was altogether beyond the power of an English mendation. King. The Law of England gave the King no power to dispose of a Crown which he held solely by the free choice of the Witan of the land. All that Eadward could constitutionally do was to pledge himself to make in William's favour that recommendation to the Witan which the Witan were bound to consider, though not necessarily to consent to.1 That, when the time came, Eadward's Eadward did make such a recommendation, and did not purpose; make it in favour of William, we know for certain. The his final recommenlast will of Eadward, so far as such an expression can be dation of allowed, was undoubtedly in favour of Harold. We shall see, as we go on, that there is the strongest reason to believe that Eadward at one time designed his namesake the Ætheling as his successor. It is even possible that his thoughts were at one time directed towards his nephew Ralph of Hereford. In a weak prince like Eadward changes of purpose of this kind are in no way wonderful. And in truth the changes in the condition of the country were such that a wiser King than Eadward might well have changed his purpose more than once between the visit of William and his own death. Now there is not the slightest sign of any intention on behalf of William during the later years of Eadward; first the Ætheling, and then the great Earl, are the persons marked out in turn for the succession. And yet, as we have seen, it is impossible not to believe that some promise was, at some time or other, made in

&lt;sup>1</sup> See vol. i. pp. 118, 291, 533.

Impossi-Norman accounts.

CHAP. VIII. William's favour. The details of the Norman stories are bility of the indeed utterly incredible.1 The version which is least grotesquely absurd represents Eadward as promising the Crown to his dear cousin and companion William, when they were both boys or youths living together in Nor-It is enough to upset this tale, taken literally, mandy. if we remember that Eadward, who is here represented as the familiar and equal companion of the boy William, was, when he left Normandy, nearly forty years old, some five and twenty years older than his cousin. He is moreover made to dispose of a Crown which was not yet his, and which he afterwards assumed with a good deal of unwillingness. Yet this story is distinctly less absurd than the other versions. It is even possible that William or his advisers may have begun to look on the succession to the English Crown as a matter within the scope of their policy, from the time when the English embassy came to bring the King-elect Eadward from Normandy to his own Kingdom.2 It is a far wilder story which describes Archbishop Robert as going over to announce to William the decree of the English Witan in his favour, a decree confirmed by the oaths of the Earls Leofric, Siward, and—Godwine! But even this story is less marvellous than that which represents Harold himself, at a time when he was the first man in England, and when his own designs on the Crown must have been perfectly well known, as sent by Eadward into Normandy to announce to the Duke the bequest which the King had made in his favour. All these stories are simply incredible; they are simply instances of that same daring power of invention by virtue of which Dudo of Saint Quintin describes William Longsword and Richard the

&lt;sup>1</sup> I shall deal with these stories in my third volume.

&lt;sup>2</sup> See Appendix A.

Fearless as reigning over half the world, by virtue CHAP. VIII. of which Guy of Amiens describes Robert the Devil as the actual conqueror of England.2 Yet some promise William's must be accepted, and some time and some place must only opporbe found for it. What time and place are so obvious tunity for the proas the time and place when Eadward and William, mise. once and once only during their joint reigns, met together face to face? Every earlier and every later time seems utterly impossible; this time alone seems possible and probable. At the moment everything would tend to suggest the idea both to the King and to the Duke. The predominance of the Norman faction, the actual presence of the Norman Duke, the renown of his exploits sounding through all Europe, the lack of any acknowledged English heir, the absence of any acknowledged English leader, all suggested the scheme, all seemed to make it possible. Everything at that moment tended Later cirin favour of William's succession; every later event, every unfavourlater change of Circumstances, tended in favour of the able to William. succession of any one rather than of William. At that moment the Norman party were in the full swing of power. Before another year had passed, the cause of England had once more triumphed; Eadward had Englishmen around him; he gradually learned to attach himself to men of his own race, and to give to the sons of Godwine that confidence and affection which he never gave to Godwine himself. He either forgot his promise to William, or else he allowed himself to be convinced that such a promise was unlawful to make and impossible to fulfil. But William never forgot it. We may be sure that, from that time, the Crown of England was the great object of all his hopes, all his thoughts, all his policy. Even in his marriage it may not have been

<sup>2</sup> See vol. i. p. 518.

<sup>1</sup> See vol. i. pp. 209, 249.

Matilda's descent from Ælfred.

Nature of William's claims.

CHAP. VIII. left quite out of sight. The marriage of William and Matilda was undoubtedly a marriage of the truest affection. But it was no less undoubtedly a marriage which was prompted by many considerations of policy. And, among other inducements, William may well have remembered that his intended bride sprang by direct, if only by female, descent from the stock of the great Ælfred.1 His children therefore would have the blood of ancient English royalty in their veins. Such a descent would of course give neither William, nor Matilda, nor their children, any real claim; but it was a pretension one degree less absurd than a pretension grounded on the fact that Eadward's mother was William's great-aunt. And William knew as well as any man that, in politics, a chain is not always of the strength only of its weakest link. He knew that a skilful combination of fallacious arguments often has more practical effect on men's minds than a single conclusive argument. He contrived, in the end, by skilfully weaving together a mass of assertions not one of which really proved his point, to persuade a large part of Europe that he was the true heir of Eadward, kept out of his inheritance by a perjured usurper. That all these schemes and pretensions date from the time of William's visit to Eadward, that the Norman Duke left the English court invested, in his own eyes and in those of his followers, with the lawful heirship of the English Crown, is a fact which seems to admit of as little doubt as any fact which cannot be proved by direct evidence.2

&lt;sup>1</sup> I am indebted for the suggestion of Matilda's descent from Ælfred as a possible element in William's calculations to Lord Lytton's romance of Harold. It is highly probable in itself, though I do not remember to have seen it put forward by any ancient writer. Matilda was lineally descended from Ælfthryth, daughter of Ælfred, wife of Count Baldwin the Second, and mother, I am sorry to say, of the wicked Arnulf.

<sup>2</sup> I suppose that this would have occurred to every one as the obvious

In short, it marks one of the most important stages of CHAP. VIII. our history, when "William Earl came from beyond sea with William's mickle company of Frenchmen, and the King him received, important and as many of his comrades as to him seemed good, and the history. let him go again." 1 From that day onwards, we feel that we have been brought nearer, by one of the longest stages of our journey, to the fight of Senlac and the coronation of Westminster.

William then visited England at the moment while God- Lack of wine was sheltered at the court of Bruges, while Harold details. was planning vengeance at the court of Dublin, while Eadgyth was musing on the vanity of earthly things in her cell at Wherwell. He therefore met none of the family who were most steadily hostile to all his projects. But we ask in vain, Did he meet the stout warrior Siward? Did he meet the mediator Leofric? Did he meet the Primate who was, fifteen years later, to place the Crown on his own brow, or that more stout-hearted Primate who either refused or was deemed unworthy to bear any part in that great ceremony? And we cannot but ask, Did he meet the now aged Lady, through whom came all his connexion with England or English royalty, the wife and mother of so many kings, the victim of so many spoliations? With what grace could Eadward explanation of the difficulty, had not a passage of the false Ingulf been held to settle the question another way; "De successions autem regni spes adhuc aut mentio nulla facta inter eos fuit." (Gale, i. 65.) Now certainly this strong negative assertion is one of those passages which for a moment suggest the idea that the forger had some materials before him which we have not. But so vague a possibility can hardly be set against the whole probability of the case. It is curious to see Lappenberg (ii. 251 Thorpe, 511 of the German) swaying to and fro between the obvious probability and the supposed authority of Ingulf. Before him, Prevost (Roman de Rou, ii. 100) had ventured, in the teeth of Ingulf, to connect William's visit with Eadward's alleged bequest.

See the Worcester Chronicle as quoted above, p. 294.

whom alone William could call him kinsman, but between whom and himself there had been so little love? At all events, if Eadward was now for a season set free from the presence of his wife, he was soon set free for ever from the presence of his mother. Early in the next year died Emma. March 6, Ælfgifu-Emma, the Old Lady, the mother of Eadward King and of Harthacnut, and her body lay in the Old Minster by Cnut King.

The course of our story has thus brought us once more to the shores of our own island. In our next Chapter we shall have to begin the picture of the bright, if brief, regeneration of England. We shall have to listen to the spirit-stirring tale, how the champions of England came back from banishment, how the heart of England rose to welcome her friends and to take vengeance on her enemies, how for fourteen years England was England once again under the rule of the noblest of her own sons.

<sup>1</sup> Chronn. Ab. Cant. 1051. Wig. Petrib. 1052. I need hardly remind any reader that the Old Minster is Winchester Cathedral. The bones of Cnut and Emma were among those which were so strangely exalted by Bishop Fox in the chests which surround the presbytery. Between him, Henry of Blois, and the Puritans, it is now impossible to distinguish the bones of Cnut from those of William Rufus.

CHAPTER IX.

THE REIGN OF EADWARD FROM THE RETURN OF GODWINE TO THE DEATH OF EADWARD THE ATHELING.1 1052-1057.

THE two streams of English and Norman history were Character joined together for a moment in the year when the Period. sovereigns of England and Normandy met face to face for the only time in the course of their joint reigns. streams will now again diverge. England shook off the Norman influence, and became once more, to all outward appearance, the England of Æthelstan and Eadgar. several years the history of each country seems to have no Little direct influence upon the history of the other. But this direct connexion mutual independence is more apparent than real. land once more became free from Norman influence as and Norregarded her general policy; but the effects of Eadward's man affairs. Norman tendencies were by no means wholly wiped away.

<sup>1</sup> There is nothing specially to remark on the authorities for this period, which are substantially the same as those for the seventh Chapter. We have still to look, just in the same way as before, to the Chronicles, the Biographer, and Florence, to William of Malmesbury and the other subsidiary writers. Just as before, when Norman affairs are at all touched on, the Norman writers should be compared with the English. During these years we have little to do with Scandinavian affairs, so that the Sagas are of little moment. Welsh affairs, on the other hand, are of unusual importance, and the two Welsh Chronicles, the Annales Cambrize and the Brut y Tywysogion, or Chronicle of the Princes, must be carefully compared with our own records.

CHAP. IX. Normans still remained in the land, and the circumstances of the deliverance of England were not without their effect as secondary causes of the expedition of William. Through the whole period we may be sure that the wise statesmen of both countries were diligently watching each other's actions. Harold and William, though not as yet open enemies or avowed rivals, must have found out during these years that each was called on by his own policy to do all that he could to thwart the policy of the other. But though there was this sort of undercurrent closely connecting the interests of the two countries, yet, in all the outward events of history, it was a period of remarkable separation between them. The events recorded by English historians within this period belong almost exclusively to the affairs of our own island. It is a period in which the relations between the vassal Kingdoms of Britain and the Imperial power again assume special But it is still more emphatically marked by the death of the greatest of living Englishmen, and the transmission of his power, and more than his power, to a Growth of worthy successor. We left Godwine and Harold banished men. We have now to record their triumphant return to a rejoicing nation. We have then to record the death of Godwine, the accession of Harold to his father's formal rank, and the steps by which he gradually rose to be the virtual ruler of the Kingdom, perhaps the designated successor to the Crown.

§ 1. The Return and Death of Godwine. 1052-1053.

If the minds of Englishmen had been at all divided in General regret at the absence their estimate of Godwine during his long tenure of power, of Godwine. it only needed his exile to bring every patriotic heart to one opinion with regard to him. Godwine doubtless had his

the power of Harold.

enemies; no man ever stood for thirty years and more at CHAP. IX. the head of affairs without making many enemies; and there were points in his character which may have given reasonable offence to many. Even if the whole of his enormous wealth was fairly and legally acquired, its mere accumulation in the hands of one man 1 must have excited envy in many breasts. His eagerness to advance his family may well have offended others, and the crimes and the restoration of Swegen, even under the guaranty of Bishop Ealdred, cannot fail to have given general scandal. It is possible then that there were Englishmen, not devoid of love and loyalty to England, who were short-sighted enough to rejoice over the fall of the great Earl. But, when Godwine was gone, men soon learned that, whatever had been his faults, they were far outweighed by his merits. Men now knew that the Earl of the West-Saxons had been the one man who stood between them and the dominion of strangers. During that gloomy winter England felt as a conquered land, as a land too conquered by foes who had not overcome her in open battle, but who had, by craft and surprise, deprived her of her champions and guardians. The common voice of England soon began to call for the return of Godwine. The banished Earl was looked to by all men as the Father of his Country; England now knew that in his fall a fatal blow had been dealt to her own welfare and freedom. Men began openly to declare that it was better to share the banishment of Godwine than

&lt;sup>1</sup> At the same time, it is worth considering whether the whole of the estates set down in Domesday as belonging to Godwine and his sons were always their private property, and whether some parts may not have been official estates attached to their Earldoms. Still, after any possible deductions, their wealth was enormous.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Vita Eadw. 404. "Et quoniam suprà dizimus sum ab omnibus Anglis pro patre coli, subitò auditus discessus ejus exterruit cor populi. Ejus absentiam sive fugam habuere permiciem suam, interitum gentis Anglios, excidium insuper totius patrise."

Godwine invited to return.

CHAP. IX. to live in the land from which Godwine was banished. Messages were sent to the court of Flanders, praying the Earl to return. If he chose to make his way back into the land by force, he would find many Englishmen ready to take up arms in his cause. Others crossed the sea in person, and pledged themselves to fight for him, and, if need were, to die in his behalf.2 These invitations, we are told, were no secret intrigue of a few men. common voice of England, openly expressed and all but unanimous, demanded the return of the great confessor of English freedom.3

The King's preparations against Godwine.

These open manifestations on behalf of the exiles could not escape the knowledge of the King and his counsellors. It was thought necessary to put the south-eastern coast into a state of defence against any possible attack from the side of Flanders. The King and his Witan -one would like to have fuller details of a Gemót held under such influences—decreed that ships should be sent forth to watch at the old watching-place of Sandwich.<sup>5</sup> Forty ships were accordingly made ready, and they took their place at the appointed station under the command of the King's nephew Earl Ralph, and of Odda, the newly appointed Earl of the Western shires.6

The fleet at Sandwich.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Vita Eadw. 404. "Felicem se putabat qui post eum exsulari poterat."

&lt;sup>2</sup> Ib. "Quidam post eum vadunt, quidam legationes mittunt, paratos se, si velit reverti, eum cum violentia in patria suscipere, pro eo pugnare, pro eo, si necesse sit, velle se pariter occumbere."

* Ib. "Et hoc accitabatur non clam vel privatim, sed in manifesto et publice, et non modo à quibusdam, sed penè ab omnibus indigenis patrise."

<sup>4</sup> Chron. Petrib. 1052. "Gerædde se cyng and his witan." Abingdon and Worcester do not mention the Witan.

&lt;sup>5</sup> See above, p. 99.

<sup>6</sup> Chronn. Ab. Wig. Petrib. The number of the ships, "xl. snacca," comes from Worcester; the names of the commanders from Peterborough, "and setton Raulf Eorl and Oddan Eorl to heafodmannum beerto." Florence seems to put these preparations later, after Harold's landing at Porlock. But surely the choice made both by Gruffydd and by Harold of their points for attack, shows that the Earls of those districts were already absent with the fleet.

Precautions of this kind against the return of one for CHAP. IX. whose return the mass of the nation was longing must have been unpopular in the highest degree. And, if anything could still further heighten the general discontent with the existing state of things, it would be the events Ravages which were, just at this time, going on along the Welsh of North border. The Norman lords whom Eadward had settled in Wales. Herefordshire proved but poor defenders of their adopted country. The last continental improvements in the art of fortification proved vain to secure the land in the absence of chiefs of her own people. Gruffydd of North Wales marked his opportunity; he broke through his short-lived alliance with England, and the year of the absence of Godwine and his sons was marked by an extensive and successful invasion of the land of the Magesætas. Gruffydd doubtless took also into his reckoning the absence of the local chief at Sandwich. He crossed the border, he harried far and wide, and he seems not to have met with any resistance till he had reached the neighbourhood of Leominster.2 There His victory he was at last met by the levies of the country, together minster. with the Norman garrison of Richard's Castle.3 Perhaps, as in a later conflict with the same enemy in the same neighbourhood, English and foreign troops failed to act tory, and, after slaying many men of both nations, he went away with a large booty. Men remarked that this heavy blow took place exactly thirteen years after Gruffydd's first great victory at Rhyd-y-Groes. Though the coincidence is thus marked, we are not told what day of what month was thus auspicious to the Welsh prince; but the dates of the events which follow show that it must have been early in the summer.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Chron. Wig. and Flor. Wig. 1052. This incursion seems not to be mentioned in the Welsh Chronicles. Its perpetrator is described only as "Griffin se Wylisca cing;" "Walensium Rex Griffinus;" but the King intended must be the Northern Gruffydd.

&lt;sup>2</sup> The Worcester Chronicle says, "pet he com swybe neah to Leomynstre." Florence speaks of the harrying, but does not mention the place.

* Chron. Wig. "And men gadorodon ongean, ægðer ge landes men ge Frencisce men of dam castele." So Florence, "Contra quem provinciales illi et de castello quamplures Nortmanni ascenderunt." "The castle" is doubtless Richard's Castle. Florence, who had mistaken the meaning of the Chronicler in the entry of the former year (see above, p. 142), now that he had got among Herefordshire matters, understood the description. Here again the expressions witness to the deep feeling awakened by the building of this castle.

Godwine petitions for his return.

Godwine must by this time have seen that the path for his return was now open, and it was seemingly this last misfortune which determined him to delay no longer.3 It was not till all peaceful means had been tried and failed, that the banished Earl made up his mind to attempt a restoration by force. He sent many messages to the King, praying for a reconciliation. He offered now to Eadward, as he had before offered both to Harthacnut and to Eadward himself, to come into the royal presence and make a compurgation in legal form in answer to all the charges which had been brought against him.4 But all such petitions were in vain. It marks the increasing intercourse between England and the continent, that Godwine, when his own messages were not listened to, sought, as a last resource, to obtain his object through the intercession of foreign princes.<sup>5</sup> Embassies on his behalf were sent by his host

&lt;sup>1</sup> Chron. Wig. 1052. "And man bær ofsloh swybe feola Engliscra godra manna, and eac of bam Frenciscum." (The French get no honourable epithet.) All this evaporates in Florence's "multis ex illis occisis."

&lt;sup>2</sup> See above, p. 56, and vol. i. p. 564.

I infer this from the way in which Harold's expedition is spoken of as happening almost immediately ("sona," "parvo post hoc tempore") after Gruffydd's victory, as if the two things had some connexion with each other.

&lt;sup>4</sup> Vita Eadw. 405. "Mittit tamen adhuc pacem et misericordiam petere a Rege domino suo [cynehlaford], ut sibi liceat cum ejus gratia ad se purgandum legibus venire coram eo." See above, p. 142, and vol. i. p. 573.

&lt;sup>5</sup> Ib. "Hoc quoque pro ejus dilectione et suo officio missis legatis suis,

Count Baldwin and by the King of the French. Baldwin, CRAP. IX. who had so lately been at war with England, might seem sies from an ill-chosen intercessor; but his choice for that purpose foreign may have been influenced by his close connexion with the his behalf. Court of Normandy. William was just now earnestly pressing his suit for Matilda. The ally of the great Duke might be expected to have some influence, if not with Eadward, at least with Eadward's Norman favourites. King Henry, it will be remembered, claimed some sort of kindred with Eadward, though it is not easy to trace the two princes to a common ancestor. But King and Marquess alike pleaded in vain. Eadward was surrounded by his foreign priests and courtiers, and no intercessions on behalf of the champion of England were allowed to have any weight with the royal mind, even if they were ever allowed to reach the royal ear.2

The Earl was now satisfied that nothing more was to Godwine be hoped from any attempts at a peaceful reconciliation. on a return He was also satisfied that, if he attempted to return by by force. force, the great majority of Englishmen would be less likely to resist him than to join his banners. He therefore, towards the middle of the summer,3 finally determined to attempt his restoration by force of arms, and he began to make preparations for that purpose. His con- Estimate duct in so doing hardly needs any formal justification. is simply the old question of resistance or non-resistance. If any man ever was justified in resistance to established authority, or in irregular enterprises of any kind, undoubtedly Godwine was justified in his design of making

Rez petit Francorum, et ipsum cum quo hiemabat idem persuadebat Marchio Flandrengium."

See above, p. 17. Endward and Baldwin had a common ancestor, though certainly a very remote one, in the great Ælfred. See above, p. 304.

Vita Eadw. 405. "Sed et illi hoo suggerebant satis frustra; obstruzerat enim pias Regis aures pravorum malitia."

* Ib. " Mediante proxima sestate."

CHAP. IX. his way back into England in arms. So to do was indeed simply to follow the usual course of every banished man of those times who could gather together the needful force. The enterprises of Osgod Clapa 1 at an earlier time, and of Ælfgar at a later time, are not spoken of with any special condemnation by the historians of the time. And the enterprise of Godwine was of a very different kind from the enterprises of Ælfgar and of Osgod Clapa. Ælfgar and Osgod may have been banished unjustly, and they may, according to the morality of those times, have been guilty of no very great crime by seeking restoration with weapons in their hands. Still the question of their banishment or restoration was almost wholly a personal question. The existence or the welfare of England in no way depended on their presence or absence. But the rebellion or invasion of Godwine was a rebellion or an invasion in form only. His personal restoration meant nothing short of the deliverance of England from misgovernment and foreign influence. He had been driven out by a faction; he was invited to return by the nation. The enterprise of Godwine in short should be classed, not with the ordinary forcible return of an exile, but with enterprises like those of Henry of Bolingbroke in the fourteenth century and of (1399) and William of Orange in the seventeenth. In all three cases the deliverer undoubtedly sought the deliverance of the country; in all three he also undoubtedly sought his own restoration or advancement. But Godwine had one great advantage over both his successors. They had to deal with wicked Kings; he had only to deal with a weak King. They had to deal with evil counsellors, who, however evil, were still Englishmen. Godwine had simply to deliver King and people from the influence and thraldom of foreigners.

Comparison of Godwine with Henry of Bolingbroke Orange (1688).

He was thus able, while they were not able, to deliver

&lt;sup>1</sup> See above, p. 100.

England without resorting to the death, deposition, or CHAP. IX. exile of the reigning King, and, as far as he himself was personally concerned, without shedding a drop of English blood.

The narrative of this great deliverance forms one of the most glorious and spirit-stirring tales to be found in any age of our history. It is a tale which may be read with unmixed delight, save for one event, which, whether we count it for a crime or for a misfortune, throws a shadow on the renown, not of Godwine himself, but of his nobler son. Harold and Leofwine, we have seen, had made up their minds from the beginning to resort to force, whenever the opportunity should come. They had spent the winter in Ireland in making preparations for an expedition. They were by this time ready for action, and, now that their father had found all attempts at a peaceful reconciliation to be vain, the time for action seemed clearly to have come. It was doubtless in concert with Godwine that Harold and Harold and Leofwine<sup>2</sup> now set sail from Dublin with nine ships. sail from Their crews probably consisted mainly of adventurers from Dublin. the Danish havens of Ireland, ready for any enterprise which promised excitement and plunder. But it is quite possible that Englishmen, whether vehement partisans or simply desperate men, may have also taken service under the returning exiles. The part of England which they chose for their enterprise would have been well chosen, if they had been attacking a hostile country. They made for They enter the debateable land forming the southern shore of the Channel. Bristol Channel, where no doubt large traces of the ancient British blood and language still remained.

&lt;sup>1</sup> See above, p. 152.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Leofwine is not mentioned in the Chronicles, but his name is given by Florence, and the Biographer (405) speaks of "duo prædicti filii."

The language of the Biographer is here remarkable. He had just before spoken of the people of the East and South of England as "Orientales sive Australes Angli." He now calls the point where Harold landed of Somersetshire shire ill disposed towards them. Posible grounds for their hostility.

CHAP. IX. country was left, through the absence of its Earl Odda with the fleet, without any single responsible chief. The people But it soon appeared that, from whatever cause, the wishes of the people of this part of the kingdom were and Devon- not favourable to the enterprise of Harold and Leofwine. Possibly the prevalence of Celtic blood in the district may have made its inhabitants less zealous in the cause of the English deliverer than the inhabitants of the purely English shires. Possibly the evil deeds of Swegen, whose government had included Somersetshire, may have made men who had lived under his rule less attached to the whole House of Godwine than those who had lived under the rule of Harold or of Godwine himself. And we must remember that, up to this time, Harold had done nothing to win for himself any special renown or affection beyond the bounds of his own East-Anglian Earldom. As yet he shone simply with a glory reflected from that of his father. And his enterprise bore in some points an ill look. He had not shared the place of exile of his father, nor had he taken any part in his father's attempts to bring about a peaceful restoration. He had gone, determined from the first on an armed return, to a land which might almost be looked on as an enemy's country. He now came back at the head of a force whose character could not fail to strike Englishmen with suspicion and dread. We are therefore not surprised to hear that the men of Somerset and Devon met him in arms. He landed on the borders of those two shires, in a wild and hilly region, which to this day remains thinly peopled, cut off from the chief centres even of local life, the last

Harold's landing at Porlock;

> "Occidentalium Britonum sive Anglorum fines." So marked a change of expression cannot be accidental; it must point to the still debateable character of large parts of Somerset and Devon, neither purely Welsh nor purely English. Compare the significant use of the word "Britanni" by Thietmar, commented on in vol. i. p. 422.

place within the borders of South Britain where the wild GHAP. IX. stag still finds a shelter. The high ground of Exmoor, and description of the the whole neighbouring hilly region, reaches its highest country. point in the Beacon of Dunkery, a height whose Celtic name has an appropriate sound among the remains of primæval times with which it is crowned. It is the highest point in its own shire, and it is overtopped by no point in Southern England, except by some of the Tors of Dartmoor in the still further west. A descent, remarkably gradual for so great a height, leads down to the small haven of Porlock, placed on a bay of no great depth, but well defined by two bold headlands guarding it to the east and west. The coast has been subject to many changes. A submarine forest, reaching along the whole shore, shows that the sea must have made advances in earlier times. And there is as little doubt that it has again retreated, and that what is now an alluvial flat was, eight hundred years back, a shallow and muddy inlet, accessible to the light craft of those days. Harold therefore landed at a spot nearer than the present small harbour to the small town, or rather village, of Porlock.2 A landing in this Object of remote region could contribute but little to the advance-prise. ment of the general scheme of Godwine; the object of Harold must have been merely to obtain provisions for his crews. He came doubtless, as we shall find his father did also, ready for peaceable supplies if a friendly country afforded them, but ready also to provide for his followers

nt land

I do not remember any mention in any ancient writer of this submarine. forest on the Somersetshire coast; but a forest of the same kind on the other side of the British Channel is spoken of by Giraldus, Exp. Hib. i. 36 (vol. v. p. 284 Dimock). In the year 1171 a violent storm laid it bare.

&lt;sup>2</sup> The Abingdon and Worcester Chronicles (1052) have simply "neh Sumerstion gemeran and Dafettascire" (see the same forms in the entries for the last year, and Appendix G); so Florence, "in confinio Sumersetanize et Dorsetania," this last word being a mistake for Domnania, as appears from the next sentence. The Peterborough Chronicle gives the name of the spot, "and com ba dp set Portlocan."

Harold's victory at Porlock; the country, and sails to join his father.

CHAP. IX. by force, if force was needed for his purpose. But the whole neighbourhood was hostile; a large force was gathered together from both the border shires, and he plunders Harold, whether by his fault or by his misfortune, had to begin his enterprise of restoration and deliverance by fighting a battle with the countrymen whom he came to deliver. The exiles had the victory, but it is clear that they had to contend with a stout resistance on the part of a considerable body of men. More than thirty good Thegas and much other folk were slain.2 So large a number of Thegns collected at such a point shows that the force which they headed must have been gathered together, not merely from the immediate neighbourhood of Porlock, but from a considerable portion of the two shires.3 We may conceive that the system of beacons, which has been traced out over a long range of the hill-tops in the West of England, had done good service over the whole country long before the fleet of Harold had actually entered the haven of Porlock. But the crews of Harold's ships were doubtless picked men, and their success, over even a much larger force of irregular levies, would have been in no way wonderful. Harold now plundered without opposition, and carried off what he would in the way of goods, cattle, and men.4 He then sailed to the south-west, he doubled the Land's End,5 and sailed along the English Channel to meet his father.

&lt;sup>1</sup> See Appendix R.

&lt;sup>2</sup> The Worcester and Abingdon Chronicles (1052) give the numbers; "And per ofsloh má bonne xxx. godera begena ("nobilibus ministris," Flor.) butan ofrum folce."

<sup>3</sup> Chronn. Ab. and Wig. "Ægber ge of Sumersæton ge of Defenescire."

<sup>4</sup> Chron. Petrib. "And nam him on orfe and on mannum and on sehtum, swa him geweard." Were these captives dealt with as conscripts or galley-slaves, or, considering whence the fleet came, were they intended for the Irish slave-trade?

&lt;sup>5</sup> Chronn. Ab. and Wig. "And sona æfter þan for abutan Penwiösteort." Chron. Petrib. "And gewende him be eastweard to his feder."

This event is the chief stain which mars the renown of CHAP. IX. Harold, and which dims the otherwise glorious picture of Harold's the return of Godwine and his house. Harold's own age conduct. perhaps easily forgave the deed. No contemporary writer speaks of it with any marked condemnation; one contemporary writer even seems distinctly to look upon it as a worthy exploit. It was in truth nothing more than the ordinary course of a banished man. Harold acted hardly worse than Osgod Clapa; he did not act by any means so badly as Ælfgar. But a man who towers above his own generation must pay, in more than one way, the penalty of his greatness. We instinctively judge Harold by a stricter standard than that by which we judge Ælfgar and Osgod Clapa. On such a character as his it is distinctly a stain to have resorted for one moment to needless violence, or to have shed one drop of English blood without good cause. The ravage and slaughter at Porlock distinctly throws a shade over the return of Godwine and over the fair fame of his son. It is a stain rather to be regretted than harshly to be condemned; but it is a stain nevertheless. It is a stain which was fully wiped out by later labours and triumphs in the cause of England. Still we may well believe that the blood of those thirty good Thegns and of those other folk was paid for in after years by prayers and watchings and fastings before the Holy Rood of Waltham; we may well believe that it still lay heavy on the hero's soul as he marched forth to victory at Stamfordbridge and to more glorious overthrow at Senlac.

Harold and Leofwine were thus on their way to meet Godwine their father. Meanwhile the revolution was going on June 22, rapidly on the other side of England.2 Godwine had 1052.

Vita Kadw. 405. See Appendix R.

On the paratives of Godwine's return, see Appendix 8.

His first appearance off the English coast.

to Bruges.

CHAP. IX. gathered together a fleet in the Yser, the river of Flanders which flows by Dixmuyden and Nieuport, and falls into the sea some way south-west of Bruges. He thence set sail, one day before Midsummer eve, and sailed straight to Dungeness, south of Romney.<sup>2</sup> At Sandwich the Earls Ralph and Odda were waiting for him, and a land force had also been called out for the defence of the coast.3 Some friendly messenger warned the Earl of his danger, and he sailed westward to Pevensey. In Sussex he was in his own country, among his immediate possessions and his immediate followers, and he seems to have designed a landing on the very spot where a landing so fatal to his house was made fourteen years later. ships followed after him, but a violent storm hindered either party from carrying out its designs. Neither side knew the whereabouts of the other; the King's fleet He returns put back to Sandwich, while Godwine retired to his old quarters in Flanders.<sup>5</sup> Great discontent seems to have

> <sup>1</sup> Chron. Petrib. 1052. "Da gewende Godwine eorl ut fram Brycge mid his scipum to Yseran;" so the Biographer (405), "parata multiplici classe in fluvio Hysara." It is clearly not Gesoriacum or Boulogne, as Mr. Earle makes it in his Glossary.

> <sup>2</sup> Chron. Petrib. "And let út ane dæge ær midsumeres mæsse æfene ["mediante sestate," Vit. Eadw.] best he com to Nesse, be is be suffan Rumenea."

> 3 William of Malmesbury (ii. 199) makes Eadward himself present; "Nec segnem sensit Regem illa necessitas quin ipse in navi pernoctaret, et latronum exitus specularetur, sedulo explens consilio quod manu nequibat præ senio." Eadward was now fifty at the most, and his presence is hardly possible, according to the authentic narratives. Eadward's presence with the fleet is distinctly marked in 1049 (see above, p. 99), but not now.

> <sup>4</sup> Chron. Petrib. "And weard best weeder swide strang best be corless s mihton gewitan hwet Godwine eorl gefaren hæfde." The ignorance could hardly fail to be mutual. So William of Malmesbury (u. s.); "Quum cominus ventum esset, et jam penè manus consererentur, nebula densissima repente coorta furentum obtutus confudit, miseramque mortalium audaciam compescuit." William had just got one of his fits of fine writing upon him.

> <sup>5</sup> Chron. Ab. "He [Godwine] heom ætbærst, and him sylfan gebearh beer beer he ba mihte." So Florence; "Quo in loco potuit se occultavit." But Peterborough says expressly, "And gewende ba Godwine eorl út followed this mishap on the King's side. The blame ONAP. IX. was clearly laid on the Earls and on the force which they commanded. Eadward may not have learned the lesson of Cnut, and he perhaps thought that the elements were bound to submit to his will. The fleet was ordered to return to London, where the King would put at its head. other Earls, and would supply them with other rowers.1 To London accordingly the fleet returned, but it was found easier to get rid of the old force than to provide a new one; everything lagged behind; probably nobody was zealous in the cause; even if any were zealous, their zeal would, as ever happened in that age, give way beneath the irksomeness of being kept under arms without any hope of immediate action. At last the whole naval force, which was to guard the coast and keep out the returning traitor, gradually dispersed, and each man went to his own home.2

The coast was now clear for Godwine's return, and Godwine his friends in England were doubtless not slow to ap-second prize him that his path was now open. He might now, time to Wight. it would seem, have sailed, without fear of any hindrance, from the mouth of the Yser to London Bridge. But, with characteristic wariness, he preferred not to make his great venture till he had strengthened his force by the addition of the ships of Harold and Leofwine, and till he had tried and made himself sure of the friendly feeling of a large part of England. In the first district however where he landed, he found the mass of the people either unfriendly agean beet he com eft to Brycge;" and so William of Malmesbury; "Denique Godwinus ejusque comites eo unde venerant vento cogente reducti." Mark the cadence of an hexameter.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Chron. Petrib. "And sceolde man setton offre eorlas and offre hasseton to bam scipum." Mr. Thorpe translates "hasæton" by "chief officers," Mr. Earle by "rowers." I commonly bow to Mr. Earle's authority on such matters; but the other version seems to make better sense.

&lt;sup>2</sup> See vol. i. p. 426 note.

CHAP. IX. to him or kept in check by fear of the ruling powers. From Flanders he sailed straight for the Isle of Wight, as a convenient central spot in which to await the coming of his sons from Ireland. He seems to have cruised along the coast between Wight and Portland, and to have harried the country without scruple wherever supplies were refused to him.1 But of armed resistance, such as Harold had met with at Porlock, we hear nothing, and there is nothing which implies that a single life was lost on either side. At last the nine ships of Harold, rich with the Meeting plunder of Devon and Somerset, joined the fleet of his of Godwine and Harold: they sail eastward.

Zeal in their cause shown by Sussex, Kent, and Essex.

after so many toils and dangers, and with so fair a hope of restoration for themselves and of deliverance for their country.2 It is more important to note that, from this time, we are expressly told that all systematic ravaging ceased; provisions however were freely taken wherever need demanded. But as the united fleet steered its course eastward towards Sandwich, the true feeling of the nation showed itself more and more plainly. the deliverer sailed along the South-Saxon coast, the sea-faring men of every haven hastened to join his banthe men of ners. From Kent, from Hastings,3 even from comparatively distant Essex,4 from those purely Saxon lands, whence the Briton had vanished, and where the Dane had never settled, came up the voice of England to welcome the men who had come to set her free. At every step men pressed to the shore, eager to swell the force of the patriots, with one voice pledging themselves to the father at Portland. We need hardly stop to dwell on the mutual joy of father, sons, and brothers, meeting again

&lt;sup>1</sup> See Appendix R. <sup>2</sup> Vita Eadw. 405.

&lt;sup>3</sup> On Hastings, as distinct from Sussex, see vol. i. p. 382.

<sup>4 &</sup>quot;Eallne beene east ende," says the Abingdon Chronicle (of. the words " ofer ealne bisne nord ende" in the Worcester Chronicle, 1052 or 1051), which Florence translates by "East-Saxones."

national cause, and raising the spirit-stirring cry, "We offer ix. will live and die with Earl Godwine."1 At Pevensey, at Hythe, at Folkestone, at Dover, at Sandwich, provisions were freely supplied, hostages were freely given,2 every ship in their havens was freely placed at the bidding of their lawful Earl. The great body of the fleet They enter sailed round the Forelands, entered the mouth of the the Thames Thames, and advanced right upon London. A detach-towards London. ment, we are told, lagged behind, and did great damage Unexin the Isle of Sheppey, burning the town of King's plained ravages in They then sailed after the Earls towards Sheppey. Middleton. The language of our story seems to imply London.3 that neither Godwine nor Harold had any hand in this seemingly quite wanton outrage. Needlessly to harm the house or estate of any Englishman at such a moment was quite contrary to Godwine's policy, quite contrary to the course which both he and Harold had followed since they met at Portland. The deed was probably done by some unruly portion of the fleet, by some Englishman who seized the opportunity to gratify some local jealousy, by some Dane who, consciously or unconsciously, looked with a pirate's eye on the corner of Britain where his race had first found a winter's shelter.4

The fleet was now in the Thames. Strengthened by Godwine the whole naval force of south-eastern England, the Earl Fouthwark. had now a following which was formidable indeed. river was covered with ships; their decks were thick

The September 14, 1052.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Chron. Ab. "pa cwædon ealle þæt hi mid him woldon licgan and lybban." I transfer these emphatic words hither from the earlier place which they have in the Abingdon and Worcester Chronicles, and in Florence. See Appendix 8.

That hostages should have been taken from such a friendly population is a speaking comment on the inveterate custom of taking hostages on all occasions.

&lt;sup>3</sup> Chron. Petrib., where see Mr. Earle's note (p. 346), and Appendix R. · ·

<sup>4</sup> See vol. i. pp. 46, 427.

CHAP. IX. with warriors harnessed for the battle.1 In such guise the Earl advanced to Southwark, and paused there, in London declares for Godwine.

sight doubtless of his own house, of the house whence he and his sons had fled for their lives a year before.2 He had to wait for the tide, and he employed the interval in sending messages to the citizens of London.3 The townsfolk of the great city were not a whit behind their brethren of Kent and Sussex in zeal for the national cause. The spirit which had beaten back Swend and Cnut, the spirit which was in after times to make London ever the stronghold of English freedom, the spirit which made its citizens foremost in the patriot armies alike of the thirteenth and of the seventeenth centuries, was now as warm in the hearts of those gallant burghers as in any earlier or later age. With a voice all but unanimous, the citizens declared in favour of the great Earl; a few votes only, the votes, it may be, of strangers or of courtiers, were given against the emphatic resolution that what the Earl would the city would.4

The King hastens to London with an army.

But meanwhile where was King Eadward? At a later crisis of hardly inferior moment we shall find him taking his pleasure among the forests of Wiltshire, and needing no little persuasion to make him leave his sport and give a moment's thought to the affairs of his Kingdom. He must have been engaged at this time in some such absorbing pursuit, as he appears to have heard nothing of

&lt;sup>1</sup> Vita Eadw. 405. "Pelagus operiebatur carinis, cœlum densissimis resplendebat armis." If this was so when they were in the open sea, it must a fortiori have been so when they were in the river.

&lt;sup>2</sup> See above, p. 150.

* Chronn. Ab. and Wig. "He gefadode wib ta burhwaru."

<sup>4 &</sup>quot;pet hi woldon mæst ealle best best he wolde," say the Abingdon and Worcester Chronicles. This answer to a message sounds to me like the vote of an assembly of some kind, in which we may also discern the opposition of a small minority. The Biographer (406) also witnesses to the good disposition of the Londoners; "Sed omnis civitas Duci obviam et auxilio processit et przesidio, acclamantque illi omnes una voce prosperè in adventu suo."

Godwine's triumphant progress along the southern coast CHAP. IX. till the Earl had actually reached Sandwich. The news awakened him to a fit of unusual energy. The interests at stake were indeed not small; the return of Godwine might cut him off from every face that reminded him of his beloved Normandy; he might be forced again to surround himself with Englishmen, and to recall his wife from her cloister to his palace. In such a cause King Eadward did not delay. He came with speed to London, accompanied by the Earls Ralph and Odda, and surrounded by a train of Norman knights and priests, and sent out orders for the immediate gathering in arms of such of his subjects as still remained loyal to him.1 But men had no heart in the cause; the summons was slowly and imperfectly obeyed. The King contrived however, before the fleet of Godwine actually reached the city, to get together fifty ships, those no doubt whose crews had forsaken them a few weeks earlier. And he contrived, out of his own housecarls, strengthened, it would seem, by the levies of some of the northern shires, to gather a force strong enough to line the northern shore of the Thames with armed men.3

The day on which Godwine and his fleet reached South-Godwine The day on auspicious one. It was the Feast of the London.

&quot; pa sende he up sefter maran fultume," says the Abingdon Chronicle, which Florence rather pathetically expands into "Nuntiis propere missis, which Florence rather pathetically expands into "Nuntiis propere missis, which Florence rather pathetically expands into "Nuntiis propere missis, omnibus qui a se non defecerant mandavit ut in adjutorium sui venire omnibus qui a sent."

maturarent.

The Peterborough Chronicle, which, just at this point, is less full than a The Peterborough Chronicle, which, just at this point, is less full than Abingdon and Worcester, gives the number; "Da hi to Lundene comon; be less se cyng and be corless calle beer ongean mid L. scipum."

Ting's shing were on the north had a scipum."

The King's ships were on the north bank of the river, "wio bees norose the King's ships were on the north bank of the river, "wio bees norose the King's ships were on the land-force ("se cyng hæfde eac mycele landfyrde landes" (Chron. Ab.); his land-force ("se cyng hæfde eac mycele landfyrde on his healfe, to eacan his scypmannum") was doubtless drawn up on the on his healfe, as the Southwark side was clearly in the hands of Godwine. Same side, as the Southwark side was clearly in the hands of Godwine. From the words in Italics, compared with the expressions quoted just before, it would seem that some at least of the northern levies came, perhaps under the command of their own Earls.

September 14, 1052.

628.

CHAP. IX. Exaltation of the Holy Cross. It was the day kept in memory of the triumphant return and the devout humility of that renowned Emperor who restored the glory of the Roman arms, who rivalled the great Macedonian in a second overthrow of the Persian power, and who brought with him, as the choicest trophy of his victories, that holiest of Christian relics which his sword had won back from heathen bondage. Harold, like Heraclius, was returning to his own, perhaps already the sworn votary of that revered relic whose name he chose as his war-cry, and in whose honour he was perhaps already planning that great foundation which was of itself enough to make his name immortal. The day of the Holy Cross must indeed have been a day of the brightest omen to the future founder of Waltham. And a memorable and a happy day it was. Events were thickly crowded into its short hours, events which, even after so many ages, may well make every English heart swell with pride. It is something indeed to feel ourselves of the blood and speech of the actors of that day and of its morrow. The tide for which the fleet had waited came soon after the Earls had received the promise of support from the burghers of London. The anchors were weighed; the fleet sailed on The bridge was passed without with all confidence. hindrance, and the Earls found themselves, as they had found themselves a year before, face to face with the armies of their sovereign. But men's minds had indeed changed since the Witan of England had passed a decree of outlawry against Godwine and his house. his fleet, Godwine now found himself at the head of a land force which might seem to have sprung out of the earth at his bidding. The King's troops lined the north bank of the Thames, but its southern bank was lined, at least as thickly, with men who had come together, like CHAP. IX. their brethren of the southern coasts, ready to live and die with the great Earl. The whole force of the neighbourhood, instead of obeying the King's summons, had come unsummoned to the support of Godwine, and stood ready in battle array awaiting his orders.1 And different indeed was the spirit of the two hosts. The Earl's men were eager for action; it needed all his eloquence, all his authority, to keep them back from jeoparding or disgracing his cause by too hasty an attack on their sovereign or on their countrymen.2 But the Englishmen who had Lukeobeyed Eadward's call were thoroughly disheartened and of the lukewarm in his cause. The King's own housecarls shrank troops. from the horrors of a civil war, a war in which Englishmen would be called on to slaughter one another, for no object but to rivet the yoke of outlandish men about their necks. With the two armies in this temper, the success of Godwine was certain; all that was needed was for the

Zeal of Godwine's followers.

&lt;sup>1</sup> The Abingdon Chronicle describes the day; "Deet was on bone Monandæg æfter Sca Marian mæsse." Florence and Roger of Wendover (i. 491) mark it as "dies exaltationis Sanctæ Crucis."

1 Chron. Ab. "And see landfyrd com ufenon, and trymedon hig be bem strande." Flox. Wig. "Venit et pedestris exercitus, ac se per oram pam strance.

disponens, spissam terribilemque fecit testudinem." "Perfluvii ordination disponens, spissam terribilemque fecit testudinem." "Perfluvii ordination disponens, spissam terribilemque fecit testudinem." fluvii ordinarius " is only accidentally an accurate rendering of "landfyrd." destris exercitus on foot, but the force of the Doubtless they were on foot, but the force of the word is that the popular Doubtiess will be militia of the shires round London, came unbidden to support levies, the militia of king had only his housesself and levies, the The King had only his housecarls and any troops that may have Godwine.

come from the north. me from Ab. "And hi hwemdon ha mid ham scypon wid hes nordlandes,

2 Chron. Ab. swylce hig woldon bees cynges scipa abutan betrymman." Vita Eadw. 406. swylce in facultas undique superiores vires administrabat, hortabantur in the tiam in insum Regent in insum Re Guam plures, ut etiam in ipsum Regem irruerent." This feeling was still quam plures, ut etiam in the day. We would remain the day. quam propers little later in the day. We must remember that, in this story, strongers not with days but with house we are dealing, not with days but with hours.

s Chron. Ab. "Ac hit was been mast eallon lab beet hig socoldon fohten with hears agenes cynnes mannum . . . Eac hig noldon best utlendiscum beodum wære bes eard burh best be swiffor gerymed be hi heom sylfe selc of erne forfore." The words doubtless simply mean men of their own nation. Roger of Wendover (i. 491) must have had this Chronicle before him, and must have taken the words to mean kinsmen in the later and narrower sense; "Angli, quorum filii, nepotes, et consanguinei cum Godwino erant, noluerunt contra eos dimicare." Florence has the intermediate expression "propinques ac compatriotas."

object of Godwine was to secure his own restoration and

CHAP. IX. Earl to insure that it should be a bloodless success. The Godwine demands tion;

Eadward hesitates: increased of Godwine's men; his restora- the deliverance of his country without striking a blow. He sent a message to the King, praying that he and his might be restored to all that had been unjustly taken from them. The King, with his Norman favourites around him, hesitated for a while. The indignation of the Earl's men indignation grew deeper and louder; fierce cries were heard against the King and against all who took part with him; no power less than that of Godwine could have checked the demand for instant battle. The result of a battle could hardly have been doubtful. Ralph the Timid and Richard the son of Scrob, even the pious Earl Odda himself, would hardly, even at the head of more willing soldiers, have found themselves a match for the warrior who had fleshed his sword at Sherstone and Assandun, and who had made the name of Englishman a name of terror among the stoutest warriors of the shores of the Baltic.<sup>3</sup> But it was not with their eager. axe and javelin that that day's victory was to be won. The mighty voice, the speaking look and gesture, of that old man eloquent could again sway assemblies of Englishmen at his will.4 His irresistible tongue now pleaded Godwine restrains ness.

- <sup>1</sup> Chron. Petrib. "Pa sendon pa eorlas to pam cynge, and gerndon to him þæt hi moston beon wurde ælc þæra þinga þe heom mid unrihte ofgenumen wæs."
- <sup>2</sup> Ib. "Da widlæg se cyng sume hwile, beah swa lange, od bet folc be mid þam eorle wes wearð swiðe astyred ongean þone cyng and ongean his folc."
- * See vol. i. p. 466. The Worcester and Abingdon Chronicles, a little way before, have a singular remark that the only good troops on both sides were English; "Fordan par wess lyt elles be aht mycel myhton buton Englisce men on æger healfe." This sounds like a slur on the military prowess alike of the King's Frenchmen, of Harold's Irish Danes, and of any Flemings who may have come with Godwine.
- 4 Chron. Petrib. "Swa bæt se eorl sylf earfoblice gestylde bæt folc." So the Biographer, in his more rhetorical way; "Verum fidelis et Deo devotus Dux verbis et nutu admodum abhorruit." William of Malmesbury, a little later, pays a fine tribute to Godwine's eloquence, which is rather a favourite subject of his; "Senex ille et lingus potens [some read "et fams clarus et lingua potens"] ad flectendos animos audientium."

with all earnestness against any hasty act of violence or CHAP. IX. disloyalty. His own conscience was clear from any lack of faithfulness; he would willingly die rather than do, or allow to be done on his behalf, any act of wrong or irreverence towards his Lord the King.1 The appeal was successful in every way. The eagerness of his own men was checked, and time was given for wiser counsels to resume their sway on the other side. Bishop Stigand and Embassy other wise men, both from within and from without the hostages city, appeared on board the Earl's ship in the character of exchanged mediators. It was soon agreed to give hostages on both ters resides, and to defer the decision of all matters to a solemn Gemot. Gemót to be holden the next morning.2 Godwine, Harold, and such of their followers as thought good, now left their ships, and once more set foot in peace on the soil of their Godwine native island.3 The Earl and his sons no doubt betook and Harold themselves to his own house in Southwark, and there waited for the gathering of the next day with widely different feelings from those with which they had last waited in that house for the decisions of an Assembly of the Wise.

But there were those about Eadward who could not with the like calmness await the sentence of the great with was to give judgement on the morrow. There were those high in Church and State who knew Fears of There well what would be the inevitable vote of a free Norman assembly of Englishmen. There were Thegas and Prelates favourites. in Eadward's court who saw in the promised meeting of s Chron. Ab. "And Godwine for upp, and Harold his sunu, and heora lið swa mycel swa heom þa geþuhte."

1 Vite Eadw. 406. "Dum," inquit, "fidelitatis sum in corde meo habeam hodie testem, me scilicet malle mortem, quam aliquid indecens et iniquum hodie word agam, vel me vivo agi permittam in dominum meum Regem egerim, vel agam, William of Malmorh. egermi, William of Malmesbury is certainly justified in saying of [cynesisted personally, if not of all Godwine's followers, "pacifico animo repatriantes."

<sup>3</sup> See Appendix 8.

I land only a gathering of men eager to the Witars the righteous punishment of their evil CHAP. IX. the Witars First foremost among them was the Norman monk whom the blind partiality of Eadward had thrust into the highest place in the English Church. Robert of Jumièges, the man who, more than any other one man, had stirred up strife between the King and his people, the man who, more than any other one man, had driven the noblest sons of England into banishment, now felt that his hour was come. He dared not face the assembled nation which he had outraged; he dared not take his place in that great Council of which his office made him the highest member. The like fear fell on Ulf of Dorchester, the Bishop who had done nought bishoplike, on William of London, and on all the Frenchmen, priests and knights alike, who had sunned themselves in the smiles of the court, but who shrank from meeting the assembly of the people. Flight was their only hope. As soon as the news came that peace was made, and that all matters were referred to a lawful Gemót, the whole company of the strangers who had been the curse of England mounted their horses and rode for their lives. Eastward, westward, northward, Norman knights and priests were seen hurrying. Godwine and Harold, in the like case, had been treacherously pursued; but these men, criminals as they were fleeing from the vengeance of an offended nation, were allowed to go whither they would unmolested. Whatever violence was done was wholly the act of the strangers. Some rode west to the castle in Herefordshire, Pentecost's castle, the original cause of so much mischief; some rode towards a castle in the north, belonging to the Norman Staller, Robert the son of Wymarc.<sup>2</sup> The Bishops, perhaps the objects of a still fiercer of the foreigners.

General flight

&lt;sup>1</sup> Harold certainly, perhaps Godwine also. See above, p. 154.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Chron. Petrib. "Sume west to Pentecostes castele, sume nor6 to Rodbertes castele." Pentecost, as we gather from Florence, who speaks of "Osbernus cognomento Pentecost"—what can be the meaning of so popular indignation than even the lay favourites, undertook OHAP. IX. * still more perilous journey by themselves. What became Flight of is not quite plain, but we have bishop a graphic description of the escape of the Prelates of Bishop Ulf. Canterbury and Dorchester. Robert and Ulf, mounted and sword in hand, cut their way through the streets, wounding and slaying as they went; 2 they burst through the east gate of London; they rode straight for the haven of Eadwulisness; 3 there they found an old crazy ship; 4 they went on board of her and so gat them over sea. Never again did those evil Prelates trouble England with their personal presence; but the tongue of Robert was still busy in other lands to do hurt to England and her people. The patriotic chromicler raises an emphatic note of triumph over the ignominious Hight of the stranger Primate. "He left behind his pall and all Christendom here in the land, even as God it willed; for that he had before taken upon him that worship, as God willed it not."5 strange a surname 1-is the same as Osbern, the son of Richard's castle, of whom we have already heard so much. Robert's castle must be Castle, of whom we to Robert the son of Wymarc, as distinctly the most some castle belonging to the country after Debut in notable man of his name in the country after Robert the Archbishop. Most notable man of the East of England; but he had also property in the of his lands lay in Huntingdon, and Cambridge Alexandra an of his lands and Huntingdon, and Cambridge, though I do not find any shires of Hertford, Huntingdon, and Cambridge, though I do not find any mention of a castle on any of his estates there.

ention of a Chronicle, followed by Florence, makes William accom-1 The Bullet and Ulf on their desperate ride; "Rodbeard biscoop and pany Robert and Ulf biscoop uneage sethmenter and the biscoop and biscoop uneage sethmenter and the biscoop and biscoop uneage sethmenter and the biscoop uneage sethmenter and the biscoop and biscoop uneage sethmenter and the biscoop uneage setmenter and the biscoop unea pany Kouer and Ulf biscoop unease atburstan mid bam Frenciscum Willem biscoop mid wæron, and swa ofer an han in heem mid wæron. Willem be heom mid weron, and swa ofer see becomen." But the Petermannum be head only of Robert and IIIf and Willem mannum writer speaks only of Robert and Ulf, and William's restoration to borough wanter of which there is no kind of doubt, could hardly have his see, a matter of which there is no kind of doubt, could hardly have his see, and any share in the murderous adventure of his brethren. 110 Weu Petrib. "And Rodbert arcebisceop and Ulf bisceop gewendon at set sest geste, and heors geferen, and ofslogon and elles amyrdon manige it so men." One might almost fancy London apprentices, as in after times, zealous for the popular cause.

walton-on-the-Naze in Essex; see above, p. 110.

4 Chron. Petrib. "And weard him beer on anon unwreste scipe, and ferde him on an ofer see." See Mr. Earle's note on "unwreste," p. 346.

• Chron. Petrib. "And forlet his pallium and Christendom ealne her CHAP. IX. Meeting of the Mycel Gembt. Tuesday, September 15th.

In the morning the great Assembly met.1 The great city and its coasts were now clear of strangers, save such as had come in the train of the deliverers.2 The people of England—for such a gathering may well deserve that name —came together to welcome its friends and to pronounce sentence upon its enemies. The two armies and the citizens of London formed a multitude which no building could

It meets in contain. the open air.

That Mickle Gemôt, whose memory long lived in the minds of Englishmen, came together, in old Teutonic fashion, in the open air without the walls of London.3 The scene was pictured ages before by the pencil of Tacitus and sung in yet earlier days by the voice of Homer. It may still be seen, year by year, among the character.

Its popular mountains of Uri and in the open market-place of Trogen. Other Assemblies of those times may have shrunk up into Councils of a small body of Thegns and Prelates; but on that great day the English people appeared, in all the fulness of its ancient rights, as a coordinate authority with the English King.4 Men came armed to the place of meeting; our fathers did so in their old homes beyond the > on lande, swa swa hit God wolde; bee he zer begeat bone wurdscipe swa swa hit God nolde." English has not gained by dropping the negative verb, which survives only in the saying "will he, nill he."

- <sup>1</sup> Chron. Petrib. "Da cwæð mann mycel gemôt wiðutan Lundene;" "Statutum est magnum placitum" is the translation in the Waverley Annals, p. 186 Luard. Flor. Wig. "Mane autem facto, concilium Rex habuit." Chron. Ab. "And was ba Witenagemot." But it is the Peterborough writer only who dwells with evident delight on the popular character of the Assembly.
- <sup>2</sup> Compare the position of the Dutch Guards and other foreign troops who accompanied William of Orange.
- "Wibutan Lundene," says the Peterborough Chronicler. Appendix 8.
- 4 Chron. Petrib. "per ber Godwine Eorl up his mal, and betealde hine peer wid Eadward cyng his hlaford and wid ealle landleodan."
- <sup>5</sup> We shall presently see that Godwine and Eadward were both armed; it is not at all likely that they were singular in being so. We have already heard enough of votes passed by the army and the like to make an armed Gemot nothing wonderful.

sea, and our distant kinsmen still preserve the same im- CHAP. IX. memorial use in the free assemblies of Appenzell.1 But the enemy was no longer at hand; in that great gathering of liberated and rejoicing Englishmen sword and axe were needed only as parts of a solemn pageant, or to give further effect to the barangue of a practised orator. There, girt with warlike weapons, but shorn of the help and countenance of Norman knights and Norman churchmen,2 sat the King of the English, driven at last to meet face to face with a free assembly of his people. There were all the Earls and all the best men that were in this land;3 there was the mighty multitude of English freemen, gathered to hail the return of the worthiest of their own blood. And there, surrounded by his four valiant sons, stood the great Godwine deliverer, the man who had set the King upon his throne, at the Gemot. the man who had refused to obey his unlawful orders, who had cleared the land of his unworthy favourites, but who had never swerved in his true loyalty to the King and his Kingdom. The man at whose mere approach the foreign knights and Prelates had fled for their lives,4 could now afford to assume the guise of humble supplication towards He supplianoru w and who had received his Crown at his hands. King;

1 I saw the armed Landesgemeinde of Appenzell-ausser-rhoden in 1864. In Uri the custom of heaving ausser-ruogen in 1864. The Law rould In Uri the custom of bearing arms has been given up. Cf. to be drawn. huc. 1. 5, ...
2 Vita Eadw. 406. "Destitutus inprimis fugs Archipræsulis et suorum 2 Vita Eadw. 406. "Destitutus inprimis fugs Archipræsulis et suorum Thuc. i. 5, 6.

multorum verentium adspectum Ducis." on bison lande weron on bam gemote." Does this merely mean the Earls "And ealle be eorles and be betsten menn be weeron on bison been already spoken of, Godwine and Harold on the one side, who mad Odds on the other? Or does it imply the presence of Leofric, Raipin and Siward! Their presence is perfectly possible; but, if they had had any share either in this Gemot or in the earlier military proceedings, it is odd that they are not spoken of.

<sup>4</sup> II. Z. 198; άλλ' αδτως έπλ τάφρον ίὼν, Τρώσσσι φάνηθι, αί κε σ' ὑποδδείσαντες ἀπόσχωνται πολέμοιο. "Verentes adspectum Ducis," says the Biographer just above.

CHAP. IX. Godwine stood forth; he laid his axe at the foot of the throne, and knelt, as in the act of homage, before his Lord the King. By the Crown upon his brow, whose highest and brightest ornament was the cross of Christ, he conjured his sovereign to allow him to clear himself before the King and his people of all the crimes which he speaks to the had been laid against him and his house.2 The demand people. could not be refused, and the voice which had so often swayed assemblies of Englishmen, was heard once more, in all the fulness of its eloquence, setting forth the innocence of Godwine himself and of Harold and all his sons.3 Few 4 and weighty were the words which the great Earl spoke that day before the King and all the people of the land.5 But they were words which at once carried the whole Assembly with them. Those who have heard the most spiritstirring of earthly sounds, when a sovereign people binds itself to observe the laws which it has itself decreed, when thousands of voices join as one man in the repetition of one

&lt;sup>1</sup> Vita Eadw. 406. "Viso Rege protinus abjectis armis ejus advolvitur-pedibus." I conceive the weapon borne to have been the axe, as a sort of official weapon. It appears in the Bayeux Tapestry in the hands of the attendants upon Eadward; so also in the scene where the Crown is offered to Harold, both Harold himself and one of those who make the offer to him bear axes.

<sup>2</sup> Ib. "Orans suppliciter ut in Christi nomine, cujus signiferam regni coronam gestabat in capite, annueret ut sibi liceret purgare se de objecto crimine, et purgato pacem concederet gratiæ suæ." This surviving fragment of Godwine's eloquence shows how well he could adapt himself to every class of hearers. But what was the Crown like? The allusion seems to point to something like the Imperial Crown with a cross on the top, but the crowns in the Tapestry are quite different.

&lt;sup>3</sup> Chron. Petrib. "pet he wæs unscyldig bæs be him geled wæs, and on Harold his sunu and ealle his bearn." This is the "purgatio" of the Biographer. So Will. Malms. ii. 199. "Probè se de omnibus quæ objectabantur expurgavit." Compurgators seem not to have been called for.

&lt;sup>4</sup> Will. Malms. u. s. "Tantum brevi valuit ut sibi liberisque suis honores integros restitueret."

* Ealle landleodan." We have lost this, and so many other expressive words. "Landleute" is the old official name of the people of the democratic cantons of Switzerland; but Land is there used in its ordinary opposition to Stadt.

solemn formula, can conceive the shout of assent with CHAP. IX. which the assembled multitude agreed to the proposal that Godwine should be deemed to have cleared himself of every charge. The voice of that great Assembly, the voice The Assemof the English nation, at once declared him guiltless, his acquitat once decreed the restoration of himself, his sons, and tal and restoration. all his followers, to all the lands, offices, and honours which they had held in the days before his outlawry. The old charges were thus again solemnly set aside, and an amnesty was proclaimed for all the irregular acts of the last three months of revolution. The last year was as it were wiped out; Godwine was once more Earl of the West-Saxons, Harold was once more Earl of the East-Angles, as if Eustace and Robert had never led astray the simplicity And yet more; it was not enough It decrees of the royal saint. merely to put England again into the state in which she lawry and stood at the moment of the banishment of Godwine. was needful to punish the authors of all the evils that bishop had happened, and to guard against the possible recur- and many rence of such evils in days to come. The deepest in guilt Normans. of all the royal favourites was felt to be the Norman Archbishop. He had taken himself beyond the reach of justice; but, had he been present, the mildness of English political warfare would have hindered any severer sentence than that which was actually pronounced. "He had done most to cause the strife between Earl Godwine and the King, 2 the words of the formal resolution peep out,

1 I refer to the oath of the people of Appenzell-ausser-rhoden in their to obey the laws; he then administers the oath to the vast multitude The newly elected Landammann first himself swears The effect of their answer is something overwhelming in its before him.

grandeur. 2 Chron. Petrib. "And cweb mann titlaga Rotberd arcebisceop fullice, and celle be Frencisce menn, forcan be hi macodon must bet unseht betweenan Godwine Eorle and bam Cynge." So William of Malmesbury; "Prolata sententia in Robertum archiepiscopum ejusque complices quòd statum regni conturbarent, animum regium in provinciales agitantes."

It deprivation of Arch-

often do, in the words of the Chronicler—and, as they clared an outlaw deprived of his see, and was on this clared an outlaw deprived of his see, and was solemnly words of the French received was prosolemnly words of the sentence was pronounced indged unit sentence was prowords of the sentence." who had reared up nounced judged unjust judge-"who had reared up reading the land." But the sentence live sounselled evil Norman him the sentence live reading the bad law, a land." But the sentence did not extend to counsel in counsel in Norman birth or of French speech who were counsel in country. It was intended only to strike extension. Normana excepted all the men at the men from the extension, those were excepted "whom the and danger and formular true to him whom the sentence. actual offer.

A who were true were excepted "whom the King liked,

Tood la Which to him and all his folk."2 Id formula which we have so often already King liked,

Good law was decreed for all folk."

As expression refers far more to administrain other cases, to the observance of old laws 44 Good law" the enactment of new. The Frenchmen decreed. law; that of new. The Frenchmen is, they had been guilty had reared up of corrupt and no Do format is, they had been guilty no Do format of format in the good law, that rather than to of corrupt and no need to remer times, was now to be other be to remer times, was now to be of corrupt and no need former times, was now to be restored. There patriot at renew the Law of Eadgar restored. There or of Cnut or of Assemble 19 Assemble or of Cnut or of Assembly Sht have called it, was not, Assembly But have cause.

of the vision of past times, as in the eyes of the of their a vision of the old time tradition of the tradition of the difference of the old times, a before them. It before them. It the days before Robert, and men nember for himself tlageden be before Robert, and men to expressed readdon into a unlage member for ministration of the experience of the negative words, and member for member for member for member of the negative words, and member for member for members of the negative words, and members members of the negative words.

reerdon, and undom designation only partially be power of the negative words, which modern High Germania judicia on erant for the power of the negative words, which modern High Germania for the power of the negative words, which modern High Germania for the power of the negative words, which modern High Germania for the negative words, and undom designation of the negative words, which modern High Germania for the negative words, and undom designation of the negative words, which modern High Germania for the negative words, and undom designation of the negative words, which modern High Germania for the negative words, and undom designation of the negative words, and undom designation of the negative words, and undom designation of the negative words, and the negat iquas adiny preserves. So Florence; "Omnes judicia judicia perant [a poor substitute for which modern High Germ judicia judicia por substitute for unlage rærdon"] et injudicia pour substitute for unlage rærdon de la pour substitute for nultage rærdo the Teutopic Degative to the Latin] adversus unlage rærdon"] et inj [an attempt at transferring | I shall bederant, multaque Anglos [a touch from Peters | Gode lage | Let exbegaverunt." 1 shall have to speak of this exception again.

nglos [a touch from Peter.]

2 Chron. Ab. and Fl. Will gode lage be to special to the special touch folds.

3 Ib. "And eallum folds."

like Robert, had obtained exclusive possession of the royal CHAP. IX. There was no need to go back to any more distant standard than the earliest years of the reigning King. Good Law was decreed for all folk. Things were to be once more as they had been in the days when Earl Godwine had been the chief adviser of the King on whom he had himself bestowed the Crown.

The work of the Assembly was done; the innocent Personal had been restored, the guilty had been punished; the tion of nation had bound itself to the maintenance of law and Godwine and the right. Godwine was again the foremost man in the King. realm. But though the political restoration was perfect, the personal reconciliation seems still to have cost the It required the counsel of wise men, King a struggle. 1 and a full conviction that all resistance was hopeless, before Eadward again received his injured father-in-law to his personal friendship. At last he yielded; King and Earl walked unarmed to the Palace of Westminster, and there, on his own hearth, Eadward again admitted Godwine to the kiss of peace. To receive again to his friendship the wife and sons of Godwine, Gytha, Harold, Tostig, Gyrth, and Leofwine, probably cost him no special struggle. They had never personally offended him, and struggie.

even before their outlawry, to have won his they seem, even But the personal affection. But the complete restoration of the personnel its former honours required another step which may perhaps have caused Eadward a pang. When God-Restoramay possible to were restored to their old Lady honours, it was impossible to refuse the like restitution to Eadgyth. his daughter. The Lady Eadgyth was brought back with all royal pomp from her cloister at Wherwell; she received again all the lands and goods of which she had been deprived, and was restored to the place, whatever that

&lt;sup>1</sup> See Appendix S.

OHAP. IX. place may have been, which she had before held in the court and household of Eadward.1

Absence of Swegen;

The restoration of the house of Godwine to its rank and honours was thus complete, so far as the members of that house had appeared in person to claim again that which they had lost. But in the glories of that day the eldest born of Godwine and Gytha had no part. Swegen had shared his father's banishment; he had not shared his father's return. His guilty, but not hardened, soul had been stricken to the earth by the memory of his crimes. his pilgrim- The blood of Beorn, the wrongs of Eadgifu, lay heavy

Jerusalem, upon his spirit. At the bidding of his own remorse, he had left his father and brothers behind in Flanders, and had gone, barefooted, on a pilgrimage to the Holy Tomb. He fulfilled his vow, but he lived not to return to his Earldom or to his native land. While his father and brothers were making their triumphant defence before their assembled countrymen, Swegen was toiling back, slowly and wearily, through the dwelling-places of men of other tongues and of other creeds. The toil was too great for a frame no doubt already bowed down by remorse and penance. Cold, exposure, and weariness were too much for him, and fourteen days after Godwine's solemn restoration in London, the eldest son of Godwine breathed his last in some unknown spot of the distant land of Lykia.2 and death in Lykia. September 29, 1052.

> <sup>1</sup> Chron. Petrib. 1052. "And se Cyng geaf bære Hlæfdian eall bet heo ær ahte." Chron. Ab. "And Godwine Eorl and Harold and seo Cwen [This title is unusual, but not unique] secton on heora are." She had just before come in incidentally in the list of Godwine's family; "his sunum . . . and his wife and his dehter." Flor. Wig. "Filiam quoque Ducis, Eadgitham Reginam, digniter Rex recepit et pristinæ dignitati restituit." The Biographer (406) of course waxes eloquent; "Modico exinde interfluente tempore mittitur æquè regio, ut par erat, apparatu ad monasterium Wiltunense [on this confusion see p. 156] et [I omit metaphors about the sun, &c.] reducitur Regina, ejusdem Ducis filia, ad thalumum Regis." This last expression should be noticed, and compared with the account in R. Wendover.

<sup>3</sup> On the pilgrimage of Swegen, see Appendix T.

There is no doubt that the three great decrees, for CHAP. IX. the restoration of Godwine and his family, for the outlawry of the Archbishop and the other Normans, and for the renewal of the good laws, were all passed in the great Gemót of this memorable Tuesday.1 Other measures which were their natural complement may well have been dealt with in later. perhaps in less crowded and excited, assemblies. Some of the greatest offices in Church and State Disposition had to be disposed of. Godwine and Harold received their of Earlold Earldoms back again. The restoration of Harold im-Ælfgar plied the deposition of Ælfgar. It is singular that we gives way find no distinct mention either of him or of his father, or yet of Siward, through the whole history of the revolution. The only hint which we have on the subject seems to imply that they at least acquiesced in the changes which were made, and even that Ælfgar cheerfully submitted to the loss of his Earldom.2 As Swegen did not return, there was no Ralph. need to disturb Ralph in his Earldom of the Magesætas. Odda must have given up that portion of Godwine's Earl-Odda. dom which had been entrusted to him,3 but he seems to have been indemnified by the Earldom of the Hwiccas, held most probably with the reservation of a superiority on the part of Leofric.4 The disposal of the Bishopricks which had become vacant The vacant by the flight of their foreign occupants was a more ricks. by matter, at least it led to more important consequences in the long run. At the moment of Godwine's restoration, it probably did not occur to any Englishman to doubt that they were vacant both in fact and in law. Robert and Ulf had fled from their sees; they had been declared outlaws by the highest authority of the nation, on bone Tiwesdæg hi gewurden sehte, swa hit her beforan stent," says the Abingdon Chronicle.

See the passage of William of Malmesbury quoted above, p. 161.

s See above, p. 160.

CHAP. IX. or rather by the nation itself. Our forefathers most likely thought very little about canonical subtleties. They would hardly argue the point whether the Bishops had resigned or had been deprived, nor would they doubt that the nation had full power to deprive them. In whatever way the vacancies had occurred, the sees were in fact vacant; there was no Archbishop at Canterbury and no Bishop at Dorchester. That the King and his Witan would be stepping beyond their powers in filling those sees was not likely to come into any man's head. We must remember how thoroughly the English nation and the English Church were then identified.

Relation of Church and State Identity of the two bodies.

at the time. No broad line was drawn between ecclesiastical and temporal causes, between ecclesiastical and temporal offices. The immediate personal duties of an Earl and of a Bishop were undoubtedly different; but the two dignitaries acted within their shire with a joint authority in many matters which, a hundred years later, would have been divided between a distinct civil and a distinct ecclesiastical tribunal. In appointing a Bishop, though we have seen that canonical election was not shut out, we have also seen that the Witan of the land had their share in the matter, and that it was by the King's writ that the Bishoprick was formally bestowed.1 What the King and his Witan gave, the King and his Witan could doubtless take away, and they accordingly proceeded to deal with the sees of the outlawed Bishops exactly as they would have dealt Vacancy of with the Earldoms of outlawed Earls. It might almost Canterbury seem that the see of the chief offender, the Norman filled by Primate, was at once bestowed by the voice of the great Stigand. 1052. Assembly which restored Godwine.2 It was at all events bestowed within the year, while the Bishopricks of London GHAP. 1X. and Dorchester were allowed to remain vacant some time It may perhaps be thought that the appointment which was actually made to the see of Canterbury bears signs of being an act of the joyous fervour with which the nation welcomed its deliverance. It might have been expected that the claims of Ælfric to the Primacy would have revived on the expulsion of Robert. Ælfric had been canonically elected by the monks of Christ Church; no one seems to have objected to him except the King and his Frenchmen; he possessed all possible virtues, and he was moreover a kinsman of Earl Godwine. But, in the enthusiasm of the moment, there was one name which would attract more suffrages than that of any other Prelate or Priest in England. On that great Holy Cross Day the services of Stigand to the national cause had been second only to those of Godwine himself. As Robert had been the first to make strife, so Stigand had been the first to make peace, between the King and the great Earl. For such a service the highest place in the national Church would not, at the moment, seem too splendid a reward. Would now, accordingly forgotten, and Stigand was, either in the great Gemot of September or in the regular Gemot of the following Christmas, appointed to the Archbishoprick of Canterbury. With the Primacy, according to a practice vicious enough in itself, but which might have been defended by abundance of precedents, he continued to hold the see of Winchester in plurality.

<sup>1</sup> See above, p. 66.

1.

* The Peterborough Chronicle seems to record his appointment in the same breath with the other acts of September 15th. Immediately after the outlawry of Richard and the French follow the words, "And Stigand Bisceop feng to bam arcebisceoprice on Cantwarabyrig." The Chronicler then turns to other matters.

This appointment of Stigand was one of great moment Importance of this appointment applies. Amongst other things, it gave an pointment. excellent handle to the wily Duke of the Normans, and Handle given to thus became one of the collateral causes of the Norman the Nor-Conquest. The outlawed Robert retired in the end to his Robert's own monastery of Jumièges, and there died and was expulsion. buried. But he did not die till he had made Europe resound

CHAP. 13. with the tale of his wrongs. The world soon heard how a Norman Primate had been expelled from his see, how an Englishman had been enthroned in his place, by sheer secular violence, without the slightest pretence of canonical form. Robert told his tale at Rome; we may be sure that he also told it at Rouen. William treasured it up, and knew how to use it when the time came. In his bill of indictment against England, the expulsion of Archbishop Robert appears as a prominent count.2 It is bracketted with the massacre of Saint Brice, with the murder of Ælfred, and with all the other stories which, though they could not make William's claim to the Crown one whit stronger, yet served admirably to discredit the cause of England in men's minds. No one knew better than William how to make everything of this sort tell. The restoration of Godwine was an immediate check to all his plans; it rendered his hopes of a peaceful succession far less probable. But the expulsion of Robert and the other Normans was a little sweet in the cup of bitterness. The English, and Earl Godwine himself, in their insular recklessness of canonical niceties, had unwittingly put another weapon into the hands of the foe who was carefully biding his time.

Doubtful ecclesiastical position of Stigand. Even in England the position of Stigand was a very doubtful one.<sup>3</sup> He was de facto Archbishop, he acted as such in all political matters, and was addressed as such in royal writs. We hear of no opposition to him, of no attempt at his removal, till William himself was King.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Will. Malms. Gest. Reg. ii. 199. "Romam profectus et de caussâ suâ sedem apostolicam appellans." In Gest. Pont. 116, he adds that he returned "cum epistolis innocentiæ et restitutionis suæ allegatricibus."

Hen. Hunt. M. H. B. 761 D. Of William's three causes for his invasion two are, "Primo, quia Alfredum cognatum suum Godwiffus et filli sui dehonestaverant et peremerant; secundo, quia Robertum episcopum et Odonem consulem [see Appendix G.] et omnes Francos Godwinus et filii sui arte sua ab Anglia exsulaverant." The third count is of course the perjury of Harold. So, in nearly the same words, Bromton, X Scriptt. 958.

<sup>3</sup> On the ecclesiastical position of Stigand see Appendix U.

He was undoubtedly an able and patriotic statesman, CHAP. IX. and his merits in this way doubtless prevented any direct move against him. And yet even Englishmen, and patriotic Englishmen, seem to have been uneasy as to his ecclesiastical position. For six years he was an Archbishop without a pallium; it was one of the charges against him that he used the pallium of his predecessor Robert. At Hereceives last he obtained the coveted ornament from Rome, but it from the was from the hands of a Pontiff whose occupation of the Antipope Benedict. Holy See was short, and who, as his cause was unsuccess- 1058. ful, was not looked on by the Church as a canonical Pope. In fact, in strict ecclesiastical eyes, Stigand's reception of the pallium from Benedict the Tenth seems only to have made matters worse than they were before. At any rate, His minisboth before and after this irregular investiture, men seem commonly to have avoided recourse to his hands for any great ecclesiastical rite. Most of the Bishops of his province were, during his incumbency, consecrated by other hands. Even Harold himself, politically his firm friend, preferred the ministry of other Prelates in the two great ecclesiastical ceremonies of his life, the consecration of Waltham and his own coronation. One of our Chroniclers, not indeed the most patriotic of their number, distinctly and significantly denies Stigand's right to be called Archbishop.2 One cannot help thinking that all this canonical precision must have arisen among the foreign ecclesiastics who held English preferment, among the Lotharingians favoured by Godwine and Harold, no less than among the King's own Nor-But at all events the scruple soon became prevalent among Englishmen of all classes. An ecclesiastical punctilio which led Harold himself, on the occasion of two of the most solemn events of his life, to offer a distinct slight to

<sup>1</sup> We shall find many examples as we go on, and the general fact is asserted in the Profession of Saint Wulfstan to Lanfranc. See Appendix U.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Chron. Ab. 1053. See Appendix U.

CHAP. IX. a political friend of the highest rank, must have obtained a very firm possession of the national mind.

Ulf succeeded by Wulfwig.

The case of Stigand is the more remarkable, because no such difficulties are spoken of as arising with regard 1053-1067. to the position of another Prelate whose case seems at first sight to have been just the same as his own. was irregularly deprived, Ulf was equally so. Yet no objection seems to have been made to the canonical character of Wulfwig, who, in the course of the next year, succeeded Ulf in the see of Dorchester.1 It is possible that the key to the difference may be found in the fact of the long vacancy of Dorchester. This suggests the idea of some application to Rome, which was successful in the case of Wulfwig and unsuccessful in the case of Stigand. We can well conceive that the deprivation of Ulf may have been confirmed, and that of Robert, as far as the Papal power could annul it, annulled. It must be remembered that Ulf, on account of his utter lack of learning, had found great difficulty in obtaining the Papal approval of his first nomination. The sins of Robert, on the other hand, seem to have been only sins against England, which would pass for very venial errors at Rome. This difference may perhaps account for the different treatment of their two successors. At any rate, Wulfwig seems to have found no opposition in any quarter to his occupancy of the great Mid-English Bishoprick. And he seems to have himself set the example of the scruple which has been just mentioned against recognizing Stigand in any purely spiritual matter. Along with Leofwine, who in the same year became Bishop of Lichfield, he went beyond 1053-1067. sea to receive consecration, and the way in which this journey is mentioned seems to imply that their motive Leofwine Bishop of Lichfield.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Unless indeed some such feeling lurks in the words of the Abingdon Chronicler, 1053; "Se Wulfwi feng to 5am biscoprice be Ulf hæfde be him libbendum and of adræfdum."

ras a dislike to be consecrated by the hands of the new CHAP. IX. Aetropolitan.<sup>1</sup>

The see of London was treated in a different way from William of hose of Canterbury and Dorchester, and a way certainly retains his most honourable to its Norman occupant. We have seen Bishoprick. that it is not certain whether Bishop William accompanied Robert and Ulf in their escape from England.<sup>2</sup> It is certain that, if he left England, he was before long invited to return and to reoccupy his see. This may have been the act of Harold after the death of his father. It is an obvious conjecture that Harold would be somewhat less strict in such matters than his wary and experienced parent, and that he would listen with somewhat more favour to the King's requests for the retention or restoration of some of his favourites.3 But it is certain that a Norman whom either Godwine or Harold allowed either to retain, or to return to, the great see of London must have been a man of a very different kind from Robert and Ulf. We are expressly told that William's Bishoprick was restored to him on account of his good character.4 .Indeed the character which could obtain such forbearance for a Norman at such a moment must have been unusually good, when we remember that he actually had an English competitor for the see. Spearhafoc, it will not be forgotten, had been regularly nominated to the Bishoprick, and though refused consecration, had held its temporalities

&lt;sup>1</sup> Chron. Ab. 1053. See Appendix U. <sup>2</sup> See above, p. 331.

&lt;sup>3</sup> Thierry (i. 202) makes Godwine resist the retention of any Normans, especially of Bishop William and of the Lotharingian Hermann, Bishop of Ramsbury! For his authority he quotes "Godwinus Comes obstiterat (Ranulphus Higden, p. 281)." To say nothing of going to B. Higden on such a point, any one who makes the reference will find that the words have nothing to do with the matter. They refer to a supposed opposition on the part of Godwine to the union of the sees of Ramsbury and Sherborne, of which more anon.

&quot;Willelmus, propter suam bonitatem, parvo post <sup>4</sup> Flor, Wig. in anno. tempore revocatus, in suum episcopatum recipitur."

CHAP. IX. till the outlawry of Godwine allowed a Norman to be put in his place.1 But the claims of Spearhafoc on the see of London seem to have been as wholly forgotten as the claims William retained the of Ælfric on the see of Canterbury. Bishoprick throughout the reigns of Eadward and Harold, and he died, deeply honoured by the city over which he ruled, four years after the accession of his namesake. 1070.

Normans allowed to remain or to return.

William was the only Norman who retained a Bishoprick, as Ralph was the only stranger of any nation—for we can hardly count Siward as a stranger ho retained an Earldom, after the restoration of Godwine. But, under the terms of the exception to the general outlawry of Normans, a good many men of that nation retained or recovered inferior, though still considera 1-1e, offices. We have a list of those who were thus excepted, which contains some names which we are surprised to find there. The exception was to apply to those only who had been true to the King and his people. et among the Normans who remained we find Richard the son of Scrob, and among those who returned we find his son Osbern.

Osbern of Richard's Castle.

These two men were among the chief an thors of all evil. Osbern was so conscious of guilt, or so feefful of popular vengeance, that, in company with a comrade named Hugh. he threw himself on the mercy of Earl Leofric. Osbern and Hugh surrendered their castles, and passed with the Earl's safe-conduct into Scotland, where, along with other exiles, they were favourably received by the reigning King Macbeth.3 Yet it is certain that Osbern afterwards returned, and held both lands and offices in Herefordshire.

&lt;sup>1</sup> See above, p. 122.

<sup>2</sup> Flor. Wig. Flor. Wig. 1052. "Osbernus verò, cognomento Pentecost, et socius ejus Hugo sua reddiderunt castella, et Comitis Leofrici licentia, per suum ejus riugo sus reduluciones a Rege Scottorum Macbeothá suscepti sunt."

<sup>4</sup> In the writ of 1060 (Cod. Dipl. iv. 194), announcing the nomination of Walter to the see of Hereford, the King greets "Haroldum Comitem et Osebarnum et omnes meos ministros in Herefordensi comitatu amicabiliter." Osebarnum et omnes meso managemently Sheriff; he is not indeed directly called

Others mentioned are Robert the Deacon, described as the CHAP. IX. father-in-law of Richard, and who must therefore have been an old man, Humphrey Cocksfoot, whom I cannot further identify, and Ælfred the King's stirrup-holder.2 The list might be largely extended on the evidence of Domesday and the Charters. Some of the most remarkable names are those of the Stallers, Robert the son of Wymarc and Ralph,3 and the King's Chamberlain, Hugh or Hugolin, a person who has found his way from the dry entries in the Survey and the Charters into the legend of his sainted master.4 Altogether the number of Normans who remained in England during the later days of Eadward was clearly not small. And, as some at least Some of were evidently restored after flight or banishment, the them prosuggestion again presents itself that their restoration was stored after Godwine's owing to special entreaties of the King after the death of death. Godwine. Harold, in the first days of his administration, may hardly have been in a position to refuse such entreaties. And, in any case, though we may call it a weakness to allow so, but the position in the writ in which his name occurs is one which generally belongs to the Sheriff. The appearance of a French Sheriff in this particular shire may be accounted for by the presence of a French Earl. It is more remarkable if Robert the son of Wymarc was Sheriff of Essex, as might be inferred from the similar position of his name in a writ in Cod. Dipl. iv. 214.

- <sup>1</sup> Flor. Wig. 1052. "Robertum diaconem et generum ejus Ricardum filium Scrob."
- <sup>2</sup> Several Ælfreds occur in Domesday, as the great landowners, Ælfred of Marlborough and Ælfred of Spain, but it is not easy to identify their possessions with any holder of the name in Eadward's time. The names Ælfred and Eadward, and the female name Eadgyth, seem to have been the only English names adopted by the Normans. The two former would naturally be given to godsons or dependants of the two Æthelings while in Normandy, and Eadgyth would gain currency as the name of the wife of the sainted King.
- The possessions of Ralph the Staller were very large. He signs an English document of Abbot Ælfwig of Bath in Cod. Dipl. iv. 172, as "Roulf steallere."
- 4 He signs as "Huhgelin minister." Cod. Dipl. iv. 173. Cf. Domesday, Hunt. 208, where his title is "Camerarius." Æth. Riev. X Scriptt. 376.

CHAP. IX. men, some of whom at least were dangerous, to remain in, or return to, the country, yet for a subject newly exalted to give too willing an ear to the prayers of his sovereign, is a weakness which may easily be forgiven.

The revolution was thus accomplished, a revolution of Estimate of which England may well be proud. In the words of a contemporary writer, the wisdom of Godwine had redressed conduct. all the evils of the country without shedding a drop of blood.1 The moderation of the Earl, the way in which he kept back his ardent followers, the way in which he > all praise. He had delivered his country, he and his had been restored to the favour of their prince, and he now again entered on his old duties as Earl of the West-Saxons and virtual ruler of the Kingdom of England. We may > preserved his personal loyalty to the King,2 are beyond be sure that his popularity had never been so high, or his general authority so boundless, as it was during the short For Godwine was not destined remainder of his life.

to any long enjoyment of his renewed honour and prosperity; England was not destined to look much longer Godwine's upon the champion who had saved her. Soon after his > tinued his attention to public affairs, and we can see the working of his vigorous hand in the energetic way in which a Welsh marauder was dealt with at the Christmas > restoration the Earl began to sicken; but he still con-

Gloucester. Gemót of this year, held as usual at Gloucester.

<sup>1</sup> Vita Eadw. 406. "Unde post tam grande malum absque sanguine sedatum Ducis sapientia, sollennis celebratur lætitia tam à palatinis quam ab omni patris."

<sup>2</sup> On this point the Biographer becomes enthusiastic, and bursts forth, after his manner, into no less than forty hexameters. Godwine suffering under false accusations had been likened to Joseph and Susanna; now that he spares and honours a King whom he has in his power, he is likened to David doing the like towards Saul. Altogether the comparison is not a very lucky one for either Godwine or Eadward.

<sup>3</sup> Chron. Ab. 1052. "Godwine þa gesiclode hraðe þæs þe he upcom."

illness.

Christmas Gemót at 1052-1053. the brother of Gruffydd King of the South Welsh, had CHAP. IX. been guilty of many plundering expeditions at a place called Bulendún, the position of which seems to be unknown. Early in the year the Northern Gruffydd had ravaged the border at pleasure; now we read, as if it were the most ordinary thing in the world, that a decree of the Witan a bill of attainder we may call it—was passed for the execution of the Welsh prince. The decree was duly Rhys becarried out, and the Christmas festivities were not over, his head when the head of Rhys was brought to King Eadward, on Endward. the vigil of the Epiphany, exactly thirteen years before his January 5, own death.2 It was seemingly in the same Gemot that Arnwig Arnwig, Abbot of Peterborough, resigned his abbey, "and resigns the gave it to Leofric the monk by the King's leave and that Peterof the monks." This expression is remarkable, as illus- Leofric trating that union of royal, capitular, and we may add succeeds. parliamentary, action, which we have already noticed as prevailing in the appointment of English Prelates in those days.4 The process was no doubt the same as that by headed and borough.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Chron. Wig. 1053. "And man rædde þæt man sloh Rís þæs Wyliscean cynges brober, fordy he hearmas dyde." Florence more fully; "Griffini Regis Australium Wallensium frater, Res nomine, propter frequentes prædas quas egit in loco qui Bulendun dicitur, jussu Regis Eadwardi, occiditur." There are Bullingdons both in Oxfordshire and in Hampshire, but Welsh ravages could hardly reach to either of them.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Chron. Wig. "And man brobte his heafod to Glewcestre ["Glawornam ad Regem" Fl. Wig.] on Twelftan &fen." William of Malmesbury (ii. 196) makes Harold the agent, which is quite possible, but he mixes the matter up in a strange way with the fate of Gruffydd of North Wales, ten years later. "Haroldum West-Saxonum [Comitem], filium Godwini, qui duos fratres Reges Walensium Ris et Griffinum sollertiå suå in mortem egerit." . William, perhaps pardonably, confounds the two Gruffydds.

<sup>3</sup> Chron. Petrib. 1052. "And on bis ilean tyme forlet Arnwi abbot of Burh abbotrice be his halre life, and geaf hit Leofric munec be bes cynges leafe and be beere munece." The local writer, Hugo Candidus, seems (Sparke, 41) to place Leofric's appointment in 1057. So John of Peterborough, a. 1057, who calls him "egregius pater Leofricus." Hugo is loud in his praises; among his other merits he was so high in the favour of the King and the Lady that he held five abbeys at once, Burton, Coventry, Crowland, and Thorney, besides Peterborough. <sup>4</sup> See above, p. 67.

CHAP. IX. which it had been attempted to raise Ælfric to the see of Leofric Abbot of Peterborough. 1053-1066

Canterbury. The monks, at the suggestion of Arnwig, elected Leofric as his successor. They petitioned the King and his Witan to confirm the election. In this case the confirmation was granted, whereas in the case of Ælfric it had been refused. Abbot Leofric, a nephew of his namesake the Earl, was a man of high birth and of high spirit.1 He ruled the great house of Saint Peter with all honour for thirteen years; he enriched the monastery with lands and ornaments of all kinds, and won for it the favour of the King and all the great men of the land. borough, under his rule, became so rich in the precious metals that men called the house Gildenborough.2 But, in the eyes of English patriots, Abbot Leofric has won a still higher fame by an act less clearly coming within the range of his ecclesiastical duties. He was one of those great Lords of the Church who did not feel that they were hindered by their monastic vows from marching by the side of Harold to the great battle.3

Easter Gemót at Winchester. 1053.

The next great festival of the Church, the next great assembly of the English Witan, beheld the death of the most renowned Englishman of that generation. The King kept the Easter festival at Winchester, and on the Monday of that week of rejoicing, the Earl of the West-Saxons, with his sons Harold, Tostig, and Gyrth, were admitted to the royal table. During the meal Godwine fell from his seat speechless and powerless. His sons lifted him from the ground, and carried him to the King's own bower, in hopes of his recovery. Their hopes were in vain; the Earl and death, never spoke again, and, after lying insensible for three days, he died on the following Thursday. Such is the illness. April 12,

April 15.

Godwine's

&lt;sup>1</sup> Hugo Candidus, ap. Sparke, 42.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Chron. Petrib. 1052. "And se abbot Leofric gildede þa þæt mynstre swa beet man hit cleopede ba gildene Burh; ba weex hit swife on land and on gold and on seolfer." Cf. 1066. <sup>3</sup> Chron, Petrib, 1066.

simple, yet detailed, account which a contemporary writer CHAP. IX. gives us of an event which has, perhaps even more than any other event of these times, been seized upon as a subject for Norman romance and calumny. was undoubtedly something striking and awful in the sight of the first man in England, in all the full glory of his recovered power, thus suddenly smitten with his death-blow. He had been, as we have seen, ailing for some months, but the actual stroke, when it came, seems to have been quite unlooked for. It is not wonderful that, in such a death at such a moment, men saw a special work of divine judgement. It is not wonderful Norman that Norman enemies brought the old scandals up again, about the and decked out the tale of the death of the murderer of death of Godwine. Ælfred with the most appalling details of God's vengeance upon the hardened and presumptuous sinner. elsewhere discuss their romantic inventions, which in truth belong less to the province of the historian than to that of the comparative mythologist. It is more important to note here that one English writer seems to see in Godwine's death the punishment of his real or supposed aggressions on the property of the Church.2 On this last Bounty of score however the bounty of his widow did all that she Gytha. could to make atonement for any wrongdoings on the part of the deceased. The pious munificence of Gytha is acknowledged even by those who are most bitter against her husband, and it now showed itself in lavish offerings for the repose of the soul of Godwine.3 His place of burial

· ¹ See Appendix W. <sup>2</sup> See Chron. Ab. 1052, and Appendix E. and W. <sup>3</sup> Liber de Hyda, 289. "Porro uxor ejus [she is "Geta, genus, ut aiunt, ex insula Norwegia ducens"], magnæ sanctitatis multæque religionis tramitem incedens, omni die duas ad minus missas studiose see above. p. 28] audiebat, omnique fere sabbato per duo aut amplius miliaria nudis pedibus vicina ambiebat monasteria, largis muneribus cumulans altaria, largisque donis pauperes recreans." Of her gifts for her husband's soul we read in the Winchester Annals, p. 26; "Githa, uxor Godwini, fœmina multas habens facultates, pro anima ejus multis ecclesiis in eleemosyna

CHAP. IX.
Godwine buried in the Old Minster.

need hardly be mentioned. The man who was greater than a King, the maker and the father of Kings, found his last resting-place among Kings. His corpse was laid by that of the King under whom he had risen to greatness, by that of the Lady whose rights he had so stoutly defended, by that of the first King whom he had placed on the West-Saxon throne, by that of the murdered nephew whose death had cast the first shade of gloom upon his The Earl of the West-Saxons, dying in the West-Saxon capital, was buried with all pomp in the greatest of West-Saxon sanctuaries, in the Old Minster of Winchester.1 That renowned church was enriched with lands and ornaments in memory of the dead. But the noblest offering of all was the grief of the nation which he had saved. His real faults, his imaginary crimes, were all forgotten. Men remembered only that the greatest man of their blood and speech was taken from them. thought of the long years of peace and righteous government which they had enjoyed under his rule; they thought of the last and greatest of his great deeds, how he had chased the stranger from the land, and had made England England once again. Around the bier of Godwine men wept as for a father; they wept for the man multa contulit, et Wintonise ecclesise dedit duo maneria, scilicet, Bleodonam et Crawecumbam et ornamenta diversi generis." Of these lordships, Bleadon and Crowcombe in Somersetshire, Bleadon still remained to the Church at the time of the survey (Domesday, 87 b), but Crowcombe had been alienated to Count Robert of Mortain (91 b). Another gift for her husband's soul made by Gytha to the church of Saint Olaf at Exeter is found in Cod. Dipl. iv. 264. This charter, signed by her sons Tostig and Gyrth as Earls, must be of a later date (1057-1065), and shows that her pious anxiety still continued. Of Gytha's religious scruples a specimen will be found in Appendix E. She is said (Tanner, Notitia Monastica, Devon. xxv. New Monasticon, vi. 435) to have founded a College at Hartland in Devon. A secular establishment founded by Harold's mother should be noted.

General grief of the nation.

<sup>1</sup> Chron. Ab. 1053. "And he lit beer binnan ealdan mynstre." Vita Eadw. 408. "Tumulatur ergo condigno honore in monasterio quod nuncupant veteri Wintonise, additis in eadem ecclesia multis ornamentorum muneribus et terrarum reditibus pro redemptione ipsius animse."

whose hand had guided England and her people through CHAP. IX. all the storms of so many years of doubt and danger.1 They little deemed that, ages after his death, calumnies would still be heaped upon his name. They deemed not that the lies of the stranger would take such root that the deliverer for whom they mourned would live in the pages of pretended history as Godwine the traitor. The time is now come to redress the wrong, and to do tardy justice to the fair fame of one of the greatest of England's worthies. To know what Godwine was, we have but to cast away the True estifables of later days, to turn to the records of his own time, Godwine's to see how he looked in the eyes of men who had seen and character. heard him, of men who had felt the blessings of his rule and whose hearts had been stirred by the voice of his mighty eloquence. No man ever deserved a higher or a more lasting place in national gratitude than the first man who, being neither King nor Priest, stands forth in English history as endowed with all the highest attributes of the statesman. In him, in those distant times, we can revere the great minister, the unrivalled parliamentary leader, the man who could sway councils and assemblies at his will, and whose voice, during five and thirty years of political life, was never raised in any cause but that of the welfare of England. Side by side with all that is worthiest in our later history -side by side with his own counterpart two ages afterwards, the second deliverer from the yoke of the stranger, the victor of Lewes, the martyr of Evesham—side by side with all who, from his day to ours, have, in the field or in the senate, struggled or suffered in the cause of English freedom—side by side with the worthies of the thirteenth and the worthies of the seventeenth century—will the voice of truthful history, rising above the calumnies of ages, place the name of the great deliverer of the eleventh, unar. II. the Earl of happy memory, whose greatness was ever the greatness of England, whose life was one long offering to her welfare, and whose death came fittingly as the crown of that glorious life, when he had once more given peace and freedom to the land which he loved so well.

A A

VOL. II.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Vita Eadw. 408. "Exsequiis suis in luctum decidit populus, hunc patrem, hunc nutricium suum regnique, memorabant suspiriis et assiduis fletibus."

§ 2. From the Accession of Harold to the Earldon of the West-Saxons to his first War with Gruffydd. 1053—1056.

The great Earl was dead, and the office which he had held, an office which no man had ever held before him, was again at the disposal of the King and his Witan. As Godwine's death had happened at the Easter festival, the Great Council of the nation was doubtless still in session. We may therefore assume, with perfect safety, that the appointments which the Earl's death rendered needful were made at once, before the Assembly dispersed. The nature of the succession to these great governments must by this time be perfectly well understood. The King and his Witan might nominate whom they would to a vacant Earldom; but there was a strong feeling, whenever there was no special reason to the contrary, in favour of appointing the son of a deceased Earl. In Earldoms, like those of Mercia and Northumberland, where an ancient house had been in possession for several generations, this sort of preference had grown into the same kind of imperfect hereditary right which existed in the case of the Crown itself. It would have required a very strong case indeed for King and Witan to feel themselves justified in appointing any one but a son of Leofric to succeed

Nature of the succession to Earldoms.

Leofric in the government of Mercia. But in the case of

&lt;sup>1</sup> Vita Eadw. 408. "Dux felicis memorise."

&lt;sup>2</sup> See vol. i. p. 470.

Wessex and East-Anglia no such inchoate right could be CHAP. IX. put forward by any man. The old East-Anglian house had Special position probably become extinct, either through the slaughter of of East-Assandun, or through the executions in the early days of Anglia. Cnut. If not extinct, it had, at all events, sunk into insignificance, and had become lost to history. The Danish Thurkill had founded no dynasty in his Earldom. We cannot even make out with certainty the succession of Earls between him and Harold. The Earldon of the West-Saxons was a and Wesmere creation of Cnut himself. It would have broken sex. in upon no feeling of ancient tradition, if the office had been abolished, and if the King had taken into his own hands the immediate government of the old cradle of his house. But such a step would have been distinctly a Reasons backward step. The King of the English was now King ing the in every part of his realm alike. Certain parts of his West-Saxon realm might enjoy more of his personal presence than Earldom. others; certain parts might even be practically more amenable to his authority than others; each great division of the Kingdom might still retain its local laws and customs; but there was still only one English Kingdom; no part of that Kingdom was a dependency of any other part; the King was King of the West-Saxons in no other sense than that in which he was King of the Northum-But, if the local West-Saxon Earldom had been abolished, instead of a King of the English, reigning over one united Kingdom, there would again have been a King of the West-Saxons, holding East-Anglia, Mercia, and Northumberland as dependent provinces. Here then were good political reasons for retaining the institution of the Great Cnut, and for again appointing an Earl of the West-Saxons. Reverence also for the memory of the great man who was gone pleaded equally for the same course.

&lt;sup>1</sup> See vol. i. p. 432: cf. 456.

OHAP. IX. Earl of the West-Saxons had done more for England than any other subject had ever done. With Godwine and his great deeds still living in the minds and on the tongues of men, there could be little doubt as to giving him a successor; there could be hardly more of doubt as to who that successor should be.

Harold Earl of the West-Saxons. Easter, 1053.

The choice of the King and his Witan fell upon the eldest surviving son of the late Earl. Harold was removed from the government of the East-Angles to the greater government of the West-Saxons. This was, under such a King as Eadward, equivalent to investing him with the practical management of the King and his Kingdom. then, when he could not have passed the age of thirtytwo,2 became the first man in England. His career up to this time had been stained by what in our eyes seems to be more than one great fault, but it is clear that, in the eyes of his contemporaries, his merits far outweighed his errors. He had perhaps been guilty of selfishness in the matter of his brother Swegen; 3 he had certainly been guilty of needless violence in the affair at Porlock. But the universal joy of the nation at his new promotion4 shows that the general character of his East-Anglian government

Joy of the nation.

Character of his government, for the loss of Godwine was tempered by rejoicing at the elevation of one who at once began to walk in his father's steps. From henceforth, as Earl and as King, the career of Harold is one of vigorous and just government, of skill and valour in the field, of unvarying moderation towards political foes. He won and he kept the devoted love of must have given the brightest hopes for the future. Grief

&lt;sup>1</sup> Chron. Petrib. 1053. "And feng Harold Eorl his sunu to cam eorldome and to eallum pam be his fæder ahte." So the others in other words.

&lt;sup>2</sup> See above, pp. 37, 43.
<sup>3</sup> See above, p. 101.

&lt;sup>4</sup> Vita Eadw. 408. "Subrogatur autem regio favore in ejus [Godwini] ducatu filius ejus major natu et sapientia Haroldus, unde in consolationem respirat universus Anglorum exercitus." Then follows the panegyric quoted in Appendix D.

the English people. And, what was a harder task, he won one. ix. and kept, though in a less degree than another of his house, the personal confidence and affection of the weak and wayward prince with whom he had to deal.

The translation of Harold to the greater government of Ælfgar Wessex made a vacancy in his former Earldom of the East-East-Angles. It would probably have been difficult to Angles. refuse the post to the man who had already held it for a short space, Ælfgar, the son of Leofric of Mercia. His appointment left only one of the great Earldoms in the House of Godwine, while the House of Leofric now again ruled from the North-Welsh border to the German Ocean. But it quite fell in with Harold's conciliatory policy to raise no objection to an arrangement which seemed to reverse the positions of the two families. The possession of Wessex was an object paramount to all others, and all the chances of the future were in favour of the rising House. Ælfgar accordingly became Earl of the East-Angles.<sup>2</sup> His career was turbulent and unhappy. Character The virtues of Leofric and Godgifu seem not to have and his been inherited by their descendants.3 We hear of Ælfgar sons. and of his sons mainly as rebels in whom no confidence could be placed, as traitors to every King and to every cause, as men who never scrupled to call in the aid of any foreign enemy in order to promote their personal objects. Rivalry towards Harold and his house was doubtless one great mainspring of their actions, but the Norman Conqueror. and the last male descendant of Cerdic found it as vain as ever Harold had found it to put trust in the grandsons of Leofric.

&lt;sup>1</sup> See Appendix G.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Chronn. Ab. Wig. Petrib. Cant. in anno.

We have one panegyric on Ælfgar in Orderic (511 Å), but it is a panegyric by misadventure. Orderic clearly confounded Ælfgar with his father. William of Malmesbury however (see above, p. 161) speaks well of his government of East-Anglia during Harold's banishment.

CHAP. IX. Probable restoration of Bishop William and other Normans.

I have already suggested that it was probably in consequence of the death of Godwine and the succession of Harold that the restoration of some of the King's Norman favourites, especially of William Bishop of London, was allowed.1 This may have taken place at this same Easter festival; but it is more natural to refer it to some later Gemôt of the same year. It is certain that, during this second portion of the reign of Eadward, a considerable the Normans in the later days of Eadward.

number of Normans, or others bearing Norman or French Position of names, were established in England.2 It is equally certain that their position differed somewhat from what it had been before the outlawry of Godwine. The attempts to put them in possession of the great offices of the Kingdom were not renewed. Ralph retained his Earldom, William was allowed to return to his Bishoprick. The royal blood of the one, the excellent character of the other, procured for them this favourable exception, which, in the case of Ralph > the Timid, proved eminently unlucky. But we hear of no other Norman or French Earls, Bishops, or Abbots. Excepting a few of the favoured natives of Lotharingia, > none but Englishmen are now preferred to the great posts

Political office forbidden, but Court office allowed.

of Church and State. No local office higher than that of Sheriff, and that only in one or two exceptional cases,3 was now allowed to be held by a stranger. But mere Court preferment, offices about the King's person, seem to have been freely held by foreigners to whom there was no manifest personal objection. The King was allowed to have about him his Norman stallers, his

&lt;sup>1</sup> See above, p. 347.

&lt;sup>2</sup> That the number of Frenchmen who remained in England was considerable is shown, as Lappenberg says (p. 514. ii. 255 Thorpe), by a passage in the so-called Laws of William (Thorpe, i. 491. Schmid, 354), by which it appears that many of them had become naturalized English subjects; "Omnis Francigena, qui tempore Eadwardi propinqui nostri fuit in Anglia particeps consustudinum Anglorum, quod ipsi dicunt an hlote et an scote, persolvat secundum legem Anglorum."

&lt;sup>3</sup> See above, p. 346.

Norman chaplains, and, an officer now first beginning CHAP. IX. to creep into a little importance, his Norman chancellor. And those Normans who were tolerated at all seem to have been looked on with less suspicion than they had been during the former period. They are now freely allowed to witness the royal charters, which implies their acting as members of the national assemblies.1 Their position is now clearly one of personal favour, not of political influence. They are hardly mentioned in our history; we have to trace them out by the light of entries in Domesday and of signatures to Charters. Once only English shall we have any reason to suspect that the course of character events was influenced by them. And in that one case ward's later their influence is a mere surmise, and if it was exercised at all, it must have been exercised in a purely underhand way. The policy of Eadward's reign is from henceforth distinctly an English policy. In other words, it is the policy of Harold.

It is easy to understand that the feelings of Harold with Difference regard to the foreigners differed somewhat from those of between the position his father. They belonged to different generations. God- of Godwine wine's whole education, his whole way of looking at Harold. things, must have been purely English. It is hardly needful to make any exception on behalf of influences from Denmark. The rule of Cnut was one under which Danes became Englishmen, not one under which Englishmen became Danes. We can hardly conceive that Godwine understood the French language. Such an accomplishment

&lt;sup>1</sup> I quote, as one example of many, the signatures to the foundation charter of Harold's own church at Waltham (Cod. Dipl. iv. 158). seemingly Norman names, besides Bishop William, are "Rodbertus Regis consanguineus, Radulphus Regis aulicus [the two Stallers], Bundinus Regis palatinus (7). Hesbernus Regis consanguineus, Regenbaldus Regis cancellarius, Petrus Regis capellanus, Baldewinus Regis capellanus." But the deed is also signed by many English courtiers, as well as Earls, Prelates, and Thegns.

CHAP. IX. would in his early days have been quite useless. We can well believe that, along with his really enlightened and patriotic policy, there was in the old Earl a good deal of mere sturdy English prejudice against strangers as strangers. But every act of Harold's life shows that this last was a feeling altogether alien to his nature. travels of inquiry abroad, his encouragement of deserving foreigners at home, all show him to have been a statesman who, while he maintained a strictly national policy, rose altogether above any narrow insular prejudices. That he understood French well it is impossible to doubt.1 erred at all, he was far more likely to err in granting too much indulgence to the foreign fancies of his wayward master. His policy of conciliation would forbid him to be needlessly harsh even to a Norman, and he had every motive for dealing as tenderly as possible with all the wishes and prejudices of the King. Harold stood towards Eadward in a position wholly different from that in which Godwine had stood. Godwine might claim to dictate as a father to the man to whom he had given a crown and a wife. Harold could at most claim the position of a younger brother. That Harold ruled Eadward there is no doubt, but he very distinctly ruled by obeying.2 Habit, temper, policy, would all lead him not to thwart the King one jot more than the interests of the Kingdom called for. The position of the strangers during the remaining years of Eadward's reign is a manifest compromise between Eadward's foreign weaknesses and Harold's English policy.

Compromise between Harold and the King.

&lt;sup>1</sup> I do not ground this belief on the well-known saying of the false Ingulf (Gale, i. 62), how in Eadward's days "Gallicum idioma omnes magnates in suis curiis tamquam magnum gentilitium [linguam gentilitiam !] loqui [coeperunt]." Harold's foreign travels, and his sojourn at the Norman court, seem to imply a knowledge of French, and I can well believe that at home King Eadward looked more favourably on a counsellor who could frame his lips to the beloved speech.

&lt;sup>2</sup> This seems implied in the famous poetical panegyric on Eadward and Harold in the Chronicles for 1065.

They were to be allowed to bask in the sunshine of the CHAP. IX. court; they were to be carefully shut out from political power. If Harold erred, his error, I repeat, lay in too great a toleration of the dangerous intruders.

The remaining events of the year of Godwine's death are Ecclesiassome ecclesiastical appointments, which must have been tical appoint. made at the Christmas Gemót, and a Welsh inroad, which ments.
Christmas, seems to have happened about the same time. In the one 1053-1054. month of October three Prelates died, Wulfsige, Bishop of Lichfield, and the Abbots Godwine of Winchcombe and Æthelweard of Glastonbury. The see of Lichfield was be-Leofwine stowed on Leofwine, Abbot of Earl Leofric's favourite monas-field. tery of Coventry.<sup>2</sup> In this appointment we plainly see the <sup>1053</sup>. hand of the Mercian Earl, of whom, considering his name, the new Bishop is not unlikely to have been a kinsman. At the same time, it would seem, the see of Dorchester Wulfwig was at last filled by the appointment of Wulfwig, and the chester. two Bishops, as we have seen, got them beyond sea for con- 1053. secration.4 The new Abbot of Glastonbury was Æthelnoth, Æthelnoth a monk of the house, who bears an ill character for dila-bury. pidation of the revenues of the monastery, but who con-1053-1082. tinued to weather all storms, and to die in possession of his Abbey sixteen years after the Norman invasion.<sup>5</sup> The Bishop disposition of Winchcombe is more remarkable. Ealdred, holds the Bishop of the diocese, who seems never to have shrunk Winch-combe.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Chron. Wig. 1053. "And bees ylcan geres, foran to alra halgena messan, fortiferde Wulsyg bisceop æt Licetfelda, and Godwine abbod on Wincelcumbe, and Ægelward abbod on Glestingabyrig, ealle binnan anum monbe."

<sup>2</sup> Chron. Ab. and Flor. Wig.

&lt;sup>3</sup> Leofric, it will be remembered, was the son of an Ealdorman Leofwine. See vol. i. p. 456.

<sup>4</sup> See above, p. 344.

On Abbot Æthelnoth see William of Malmesbury, Glastonbury History, ap. Gale, ii. 324. Æthelweard spoiled the lands, Æthelnoth the ornaments, of the house. "Ex illo res Glastonise retro relabi et in pejus fluere." He has much to tell about the miracles wrought by King Eadgar about this time—Eadgar, it must be remembered, passed at Glastonbury, in defiance of all legends, for a saint—specially in healing a mad German, "furiosus Teutonicus genus." Was he one of the suite of the Ætheling?

CHAP. IX. from any fresh duties, spiritual or temporal, which came in his way, undertook the rule of that great monastery in addition to his episcopal office.1 This may have been mere personal love of power or pelf; but it may also have been a deliberate attempt, such as we shall see made in other cases also, to get rid of a powerful, and no doubt often troublesome, neighbour, by annexing an abbey to the Bishoprick. If such was the design of Ealdred, it did not prove successful.

it to Godric. July 17, 1054.

He resigns After holding Winchcombe for some time, he next year, willingly or unwillingly, resigned it to one Godric, who is described as the son of Godman, the King's Chaplain.2

> Of the Welsh inroad, recorded by one Chronicler only, all that is said is that many of the "wardmen" at Westbury were slain.3 This is doubtless Westbury in Gloucestershire, on the Welsh side of the Severn. The expression seems to imply the maintenance of a permanent force to guard that exposed frontier.

Position of Macbeth in Scotland.

The next year was marked by a military and a diplomatic event, both of which were of high importance. The former is no other than the famous Scottish expedition of Earl Siward, an event which has almost passed from the domain of history into that of poetry. Macbeth, it will be remembered, was now reigning in Scotland.4 Like

&lt;sup>1</sup> I infer that Ealdred's holding of Winchcombe was something more than a mere temporary holding till a successor could be found. The Worcester Chronicle (1053) speaks of it in the same form of words as the appointments of Leofwine and Æthelnoth; "And Leofwine feng to bam bisceoprice at Licedfelde, and Aldret bisceop feng to bam abbodrice on Wincelcumbe," &c. Florence however says, after mentioning the appointments of Leofwine and Æthelnoth, "Aldredus vero Wigorniensis episcopus abbatiam Wincelcumbensem tamdiu in manu sua tenuit, donec Godricum, Regis capellani Godmanni filium abbatem constitueret."

&lt;sup>1</sup> Fl. Wig. 1054.

Chron. Ab. 1053. "Eac Wylsce menn geelogan mycelne dæl Englisces folces őzra weardmanna wiő Wzestbyrig."

&lt;sup>4</sup> See above, p. 53.

Siward himself,1 he had risen to power by a great crime, CHAP. IX. the murder of his predecessor, the young King Duncan. And, like Siward, he had made what atonement he could by ruling his usurped dominion vigorously and well. We have seen that there is no reason to believe that Macbeth had, since he assumed the Scottish Crown, renewed the fealty which he had paid to Cnut when he was under-King,<sup>2</sup> or, in more accurate Scottish phrase, Maarmor of Moray. We have also seen that he had been striving, in a remarkable way, to make himself friends of the mammon of unrighteousness in the quarter where that mammon was believed to have the greatest influence, namely at the threshold of the Apostles.3 We may be Siward's sure that Earl Siward, the kinsman, probably the guardian, designs of the young prince whom Macbeth shut out from the Macbeth. Scottish Crown,4 had all along looked on his formidable northern neighbour with no friendly eye. It is not easy to see why the attack on Macbeth, if it was to be made at all, was so long delayed. It may be that the internal troubles of England had hitherto forbidden any movement of the kind, and that Siward took advantage of the first season of domestic quiet to execute a plan which he had long cherished. It may be that the scheme fell in better with the policy of Harold than with the policy of Godwine. Between Godwine and Siward, between the West-Saxon and the Dane, there was doubtless a standing rivalry, partly national, partly personal. But it would fall in with the conciliatory policy of Harold to help, rather than to thwart, any designs of the great Northern Earl which were not manifestly opposed to the public welfare. all events, in this year the consent of Eadward 5 was given, a consent which certainly implies the decree of a Witena-

&lt;sup>1</sup> See vol. i. p. 588.

&lt;sup>3</sup> See vol. i. p. 499.

&lt;sup>3</sup> See above, p. 55.

<sup>4</sup> See above, p. 54.

<sup>5 &</sup>quot;Jussu Regis," says Flórence, 1054.

CHAP. IX. gemót, and which almost certainly implies the good will of Siward's expedition against Macbeth. 1054.

Earl Harold. An expedition on a great scale was undertaken against the Scottish usurper.1 That it was undertaken on behalf of Malcolm, the son of the slain Duncan, can admit of no reasonable doubt. To restore the lawful heir of the Scottish Crown was an honourable pretext for interference in Scottish affairs on which any English statesman would gladly seize. And to Siward it was more than an honourable pretext; it was asserting the rights and avenging the wrongs of a near kinsman. The Earl of the Northumbrians accordingly attacked Scotland at the head of a great force both by land and by sea. The army was largely composed of the Housecarls of the King and of the Earl, picked and tried soldiers, Danish and English.

Macbeth's Macbeth was supported 2 by a Prince who had now bewith Thor. come a neighbour of England, and one probably quite as finn.

1054.

Defeat of Macbeth. July 27, dangerous as himself. This was Thorfinn, the famous Earl of the Orkneys, who had established his power over the whole of the Western Islands, and even over the coast of Scotland and Strathclyde as far south as Galloway. With his help, the Scottish King ventured to meet the host of Siward in a pitched battle. He was encouraged by the presence of a body of the Normans who had been driven out of England at the return of Godwine. They are spoken of as if their number was large enough to form a considerable contingent of the Scottish army. The fight was an obstinate one. The Earl's son Osbeorn and his sister's son Siward were slain, and with them a large number of the Housecarls, both those of the Earl himself and of the The slaughter on the Scottish side was more fearful still. Dolfinn, seemingly a kinsman of the Earl of Orkney, was killed,3 and the Norman division, fighting no doubt with all the gallantry of their race, enhanced by all CHAP. IX. the desperation of exiles, were slaughtered to a man. We ' thus see that the battle was a most stoutly contested one, and that, as usual, the slaughter fell mainly on the best troops on both sides, the Normans on the Scottish side and the Housecarls on the English. But the fortune of England prevailed; the Scots, deprived of their valiant allies, were utterly routed, and King Macbeth escaped with difficulty from the field. The plunder was of an amount which struck the minds of contemporary writers with wonder.1

&lt;sup>1</sup> On the war with Macbeth, see Appendix X.

&lt;sup>3</sup> See Munch, Chron. Regum Mannise, 46 et seqq. Burton, History of <sup>3</sup> Annals of Ulster, 1054. See Appendix X. Scotland, i. 374.

Siward was a hero whose history has had a mythical Legends of element about it from the beginning; 2 it would have been wonderful indeed if this, the last and greatest exploit of so renowned a warrior, had not supplied the materials for song and legend. The tale is told how Siward, hearing of the death of his son, asked whether his wounds were in front or behind. Being told that all were in front, the old warrior rejoiced; he wished no other end for either his son or himself. The story is eminently characteristic; but, as it is told us, it is difficult to find a place for it in the authentic narrative of the campaign. But fiction has taken liberties with the facts of Siward's Scottish campaign in far more important points. As we have seen, the English victory was complete, but Macbeth himself escaped. Malcolm was, as King Eadward had commanded, Malcolm proclaimed King of Scots, and a King of Scots who was Scots. put into possession of his Crown by an invading English force most undoubtedly held that Crown as the sworn man of the English Basileus. It took however four years The war before Malcolm obtained full possession of his Kingdom. by Mac-Macbeth and his followers maintained their cause in the beth. North, being, it would seem, still supported by help from

7

&lt;sup>1</sup> Chron. Wig. 1054. "And lædde þonan micele herehuþe, swilce nan man ær ne begeat."

&lt;sup>2</sup> See vol. i. p. 586.

Mac' eth finally defeated and slain. 1058.

reign of Lulach, and final establishment of Malcolm. 1058.

CHAP. IX. Thorfinn. Malcolm, on the other hand, was still supported by help from England, and we shall find that he decome it expedient to enter into a very close relation was Siward's successor in the Northumbrian Earldom. At Macbeth was finally defeated and slain at Lumnfanan a Aberdeenshire. An attempt was made to perpetuate Moray dynasty in the person of Lulach, a kinsman, a perhaps a step-son, of Macbeth, a son of his wife Great Ephemeral by a former marriage. But this prince, who bears the surname of the Fool, could not long resist the power of Malcolm; in a few months' time he was hunted down and slain. The rival dynasty was now crushed; all Scotland came into the hands of Malcolm, who was solemnly crowned The power of Thorsian was broken no less than the power of Macbeth, and Malcolm apparently recovered the full possession of Cumberland, possibly on the death of Thorsing, when Malcolm married his widow Ingebiorg, a marriage of whose results we shall hear again.

Erroneous belief that Macbeth was killed in Siward's campaign.

These Scottish affairs had but little interest for our English writers, who were satisfied with recording the brilliant victory of Siward and the rich booty which he won, without going on to dwell on events which were almost purely Scottish. As their narrative ends with the defeat of Macbeth and Malcolm's first proclamation as King, it naturally passed out of mind that that proclamation did not at once give him full possession of all Scotland. The two defeats of Macbeth were confounded together, and it was believed that the usurper met his death in the battle which he fought against Siward The error began very early, and it obtained prevalence enough to become enshrined in the poetry which, far more than any historical record, has made the name of Macbeth immortal.

In the course of this year, seemingly at a Gemót held at Midsummer, possibly that in which the expedition CHAP. IX. against Macbeth was decreed,1 a most important step was State of taken with regard to the succession to the Crown. It was cession. a step which proved altogether fruitless, but it is most 1054. important as showing what men's feelings and wishes were at the time. It proves incontestably that now, two years after the return of Godwine, the idea of the succession of William had quite passed away, and that the idea of the succession of Harold had not yet occurred to men's minds. The state of the royal house was such as to cause the deepest anxiety. The English people, though they cared little for any strict law of succession, still reverenced the blood of their ancient princes, and had ever been wont, save under the irresistible pressure of foreign conquest, to choose their Kings only from among the descendants of former Kings. But now the line of their former Kings seemed to be altogether dying out. Eadward was without children or hopes of children. There was no man in the land sprung from the male line of Æthelred and Eadgar. It is quite possible that there may have been men descended from earlier Kings; but, if so, they could only have been distant kinsmen, whose royal descent was well nigh forgotten, and who were no longer allowed to count as Æthelings. There was indeed a grandson of Æthelred dwelling in the Kingdom in the person of Ralph of Hereford. Ralph would very likely have been the successor Posttion of to whom Eadward's personal inclinations would have led Ralph. him. He shared with William of Normandy the merit of being a stranger speaking the French tongue, and he had the advantage over William of being really a descendant of English royalty. And the tie which bound

&lt;sup>1</sup> Now that the Housecarls are an established institution, wars are carried on with much greater speed than they were in Æthelred's time. If the expedition was voted at the end of June, Siward could easily have met Macbeth in the field before the end of July.

CHAP. IX. Ralph to Eadward was a very close one. Old Teutonic feelings held the son of a sister to be hardly less near and dear than a son of one's own loins, and we have seen some indications that this feeling was not wholly forgotten in England in the eleventh century. The sister's son of Brihtnoth and the sister's son of Siward's are mentioned in a special way among the chosen companions of their uncles, around whose banners they fought and died. Eadward, in his heart of hearts, would naturally fall back upon Ralph, his own nephew, the son of the daughter of Æthelred and Emma, as a candidate whom the English people might perhaps be persuaded to accept, when the cause of the Norman became hopeless after Godwine's revolution. But however sacred was the relation between a man and his No prefersister's son, it was not one which by the Law of England ence given by female descent.

conferred any right to the royal succession. The preference attaching to kingly blood was confined to those who were of kingly blood by direct male descent; it does not appear that the son of a King's daughter had any sort of claim in a royal election beyond any other man in the realm. And, as for Ralph himself, his foreign origin and his personal conduct were, either of them, quite enough to make him thoroughly distasteful to the English people. Men had had quite enough of him as Earl, and they certainly had no wish to have any further experience of him as In the present lack of heirs, men's thoughts turned to a branch of the royal family whose very existence

The sons of was perhaps well nigh forgotten. Seven and thirty years Eadmund before, the infant sons of Eadmund Ironside, Eadmund and Ironside. Eadward, had found a shelter from the fears of Cnut under 1017.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Tac. Mor. Germ. c. 20. "Sororum filiis idem apud avunculum, qui apud patrem honor. Quidam sanctiorem arctioremque hunc nexum sanguinis arbitrantur, et in accipiendis obsidibus magis exigunt."

&lt;sup>2</sup> See above, p. 364, for Siward nephew of Siward, and vol. i. p. 300 for Wulfmær nephew of Brihtnoth.

the protection of the sainted Hungarian King Stephen. 1 CHAP. 1X. Eadmund died, seemingly while still young. Eadward Eadward was still living. He had, seemingly through the influence ing; his of Stephen's Queen Gisela, sister of the Emperor Henry marriage and childthe Second, obtained in marriage a lady of royal descent ren. named Agatha, who seems most probably to have been a niece of the Hungarian Queen and of the sainted Emperor.2 This marriage would seem to show that, in those distant lands, Eadward was acknowledged as a prince, perhaps looked to as one who might some day reign in his native island. And the fact that the son of Eadward and Agatha bore the renowned English name of Eadgar, shows that the Ætheling himself cannot have wholly forgotten his native land. Yet, banished, as he was, in his cradle, he could have retained hardly anything of the feelings of an Englishman, and it is hardly possible that he could have spoken the English tongue. Eadward must have been even less of an Englishman than his royal namesake and uncle. Eadward the King had left England when he was many years older than Eadward the Ætheling, and he had lived in a land which had a much closer connexion with England. Still Normandy was dangerous, and Hungary was not. Whatever the Ætheling was, at least he was not a Frenchman; his connexions, though foreign, were in every way honourable and in no way formidable. gary was too distant a land to do England either good or harm, but the fame of the youngest Christian Kingdom, and of its renowned and sainted King, was doubtless great throughout Europe. And the connexion with the Imperial House, the distant kindred of the Ætheling's children with the illustrious Cæsar, the friend and brother-in-law of King Eadward, was, of all foreign ties, that which it most became Englishmen to strengthen. In default there-

&lt;sup>2</sup> See Appendix Y.

&lt;sup>1</sup> See vol. i. p. 455.

CHAP. 1X. fore of any member of the royal house brought up and dwelling in the land, it was determined to recall the banished Ætheling with his wife and family. Besides he son Eadgar, he had two daughters, who bore the foreign names of Margaret and Christina. We shall hear of all three again. Eadgar lived to be in an especial manner Eadgar. the sport of fortune; a King twice chosen, but never crowned, the last male descendant of Cerdic dragged on a sluggish and contented life as the friend and pensioner Margaret. of Norman patrons. One of his sisters won a worthier fame. Margaret obtained the honours alike of royalty and of saintship; she became one of the brightest patterns of every virtue in her own time, and she became the source through which the blood and the rights of the Imperial House of Wessex have passed to the Angevin, the Scottish,

and the German sovereigns of England.2

ing invited land: the invitation to succesto Eng-

Crown.

It is impossible to doubt that the resolution to invite the Ætheling was regularly passed by the authority of the King and his Witan. No lighter authority could have justified such a step, or could have carried any weight with The Æthel-foreign courts. Such an invitation was equivalent to declaring the Ætheling to be successor to the Crown, so far as English Law allowed any man to be successor before equivalent the Crown was actually vacant. It is possible that, as sion to the in some other cases, an election before the vacancy may have been attempted; but it is perhaps more likely that all that was done was to guarantee to Eadward that same strong preference which naturally belonged only to a son of a reigning King. Such a preference, in favour of one who was the last remaining member of the royal family, would in practice hardly differ from an exclusive right.

&lt;sup>1</sup> See Appendix Y.

&lt;sup>2</sup> It is only through Margaret that our Kings from Henry the Second onward were descended from Eadward the Elder, Eadmund, or Eadgar. But it must not be forgotten that every descendant of Matilda of Flanders was a descendant of Ælfred. <sup>3</sup> See vol. i. pp. 118, 533.

Vi

33

ZIE.

ri y

Wes

E &

die.

એ 🗷

R.

414

24 1

3 3

12.

山:

€.

訂.

سأ

1

K

3

The resolution in short placed the Ætheling in the same CHAP. IX. position as if his father and not his uncle had been on the His position would thus be the same as that of Eadwig and Eadgar during the reign of Eadred.1 But, when we consider what followed, it is important to remember that the preference which undoubtedly belonged to Eadward would not belong to his son. Eadward, though so long an exile, was an Englishman born, the son of a crowned King and his Lady.2 The young Eadgar was a native of a foreign land, and was not the son of royal parents. This quasi designation of Eadward to the Import of Crown involves, as I before said, two things. It implies tion of that the King had learned that the succession of William Eadward. was a thing which he never could bring about.3 It implies also that neither Harold himself nor the English people had as yet formed any serious idea of the possible succession of one not of royal descent. Indeed one can hardly doubt that the resolution to send for the Ætheling, if it was not made at Harold's own motion, must at any rate have had his full approval. No proposal could be more contrary to the wishes and interests of the Norman courtiers, who must either have unsuccessfully opposed it or else have found it their best wisdom to hold their peace. It was therefore, seemingly at the Whitsun Gemot,

<sup>1</sup> See vol. i. pp. 65, 117, 118. <sup>2</sup> See vol. i. pp. 117, 291.

<sup>3</sup> I rely far more on the probability of the case than on the account given by William of Malmesbury under the influence of those Norman prejudices against which he sometimes struggles, but to which he sometimes yields. He tells us (ii. 228), "Rex Edwardus, pronus in senium [fifty, or a year or two older], quod ipse non susceperat liberos, et Godwini videret invalescere filios, misit ad Regem Hunorum ut filium fratris Edmundi, Edwardum, cum omni familis sus mitteret; futurum ut aut ille aut filii sui succedant regno hæreditario Angliæ; orbitatem suam cognatorum suffragio sustentari debere." He then goes on to describe the Ætheling ("vir neque promptus manu neque probus ingenio"), his family, his return, and his death. He then adds, "Rex itaque, defuncto cognato, quia spes prioris erat soluta suffragii, Willelmo Comiti Normannise successionem Anglise dedit." I believe exactly the reverse to be the truth.

GHAP, IX. resolved to send an embassy to obtain the return of the And about the time that Earl Siward was warring in Scotland, the English ambassadors set forth on their errand.

Embassy to the Emperor Henry. July, 1054.

A direct communication with the court of Hungary. seems to have been an achievement beyond the diplomatic powers of Englishmen in that age. The immediate com-

Ealdred and Ælfwine ambausadors. mission of the embassy was addressed to the Emperor Henry, with a request that he would himself send a further embassy into Hungary. At the head of the English legation was the indefatigable Bishop Ealdred, and with him seems to have been coupled Abbot Ælfwine of Ramsey. 1 Both these Prelates had already had some experience of foreign courts. Ealdred had gone on the King's errand to the Apostolic throne,2 and Ælfwine had been one of the representatives of the English Church at the famous Council of Rheims.3 The Bishop of Worcester clearly reckoned on a long absence, and we get some details of the arrangements which he made for the discharge of his ecclesiastical duties during his absence. The Abbey of Winchcombe, which he had annexed to his Bishoprick the year before, he now resigned,4 and the general government of the see of Worcester he entrusted to a monk of Evesham named Æthelwig.5 The church of that famous monastery, raised by the skill of its Abbot Mannig,6 was now awaiting consecration. For that ceremony he deputed his neighbour Bishop Leof-

&lt;sup>1</sup> See Appendix Y.

&lt;sup>2</sup> See above, p. 115.

&lt;sup>3</sup> See above, p. 113.

<sup>4</sup> See above, p. 362. <sup>5</sup> So I understand the passage in the Evesham History, p. 87, about

Æthelwig's appointment to the Abbey of Evesham in 1059. He is there spoken of as one "qui multo antea tempore episcopatum Wigornensis ecclesise sub Aldredo archiepiscopo laudabiliter rexerat." See Mr. Macray's note. That Ealdred is called Archbishop need be no difficulty. It is the old question about the days of Abiathar the Priest.

<sup>6</sup> On Mannig, see above, p. 70. The Evesham History, p. 86, describes him as skilful in all arts, and as practising them for the adornment of the churches of Canterbury and Coventry as well as of his own Evesham.

wine of Lichfield.1 He then set forth for the court of CHAP. IX. Augustus. The Emperor was then at Köln, on his return from the consecration of his young son Henry as West-Frankish or Roman King in the Great Charles's minster at Aachen.<sup>2</sup> The immediate tie between Eadward and Henry had been broken by the death of Queen Gunhild; the King who was now to be crowned was the child of Henry's second wife, the Empress Agnes of Poitiers.3 But the interchange of gifts and honours between the Roman and the insular Basileus was none the less cordial and magnificent. Eng. Splendid lish writers dwell with evident pleasure on the splendid given to reception which the English Bishop met with both from Ealdred. the Emperor and from Hermann, the Archbishop of the city where Ealdred had been presented to Henry.4 But His long the immediate business of his embassy advanced but köln. slowly. The time was ill chosen for an Imperial interven- 1054-1055. tion with the Hungarian court. Andrew, the reigning King of Hungary, was about this time abetting the rebellious Duke Conrad of Bavaria against the Emperor.5 We have no details of the further course of the negotiation. Ealdred abode a whole year at Köln, probably waiting for a favourable opportunity. His embassy was in the end successful; for the Ætheling did in the end return to England. But we have no further details, and

&lt;sup>1</sup> Chron. Wig. 1054. "And he lofode Leofwine bisceop to halgianne bæt mynster æt Eofeshamme, on vi. Id. Oct."

&lt;sup>3</sup> Young Henry was crowned at the age of five at Aachen, July 17th, 1054, by Hermann, Archbishop of Köln. Lambert in anno.

Agnes, daughter of William the Great, Duke of Aquitaine, married King Henry in 1043 (Lambert and Chron. And. ap. Labbe, i. 276) or 1045 (Hugo Flav. ap. Labbe, i. 187) or 1049 (Chron. S. Maxent. in anno). Her father being dead, she is described as "filia Agnetis," the Agnes so famous in the history of Geoffrey Martel (see above, p. 276). Abbot Hugh, in recording the marriage, cannot refrain from the strange comment, "Quum enim esset [Heinricus] alias bonus, et omnes ejus sitirent dominium, carnis tamen incontinentiam frænare non potuit." Was Henry the Third bound to imitate Henry the Second?

&lt;sup>4</sup> See Appendix Y.

CHAP. IX. Eadward did not return to England till long after Ealdred had gone back, and till at least a year after the death of the Emperor.

Death of Osgod Clapa. 1054. The year of Ealdred's mission was marked also by the sudden death of a somewhat remarkable person, namely Osgod Clapa, whose movements by sea had been watched with such care five years before. The Chronicler remarks, seemingly with some little astonishment, that he died in

Death of Earl Siward, 1055. seemingly with some little astonishment, that he died in his bed.<sup>2</sup> Early in the next year death carried off a far more famous man, no other than the great Earl of the Northumbrians.<sup>3</sup> The victory of the last year, glorious as it was, had been bought by the bitterest domestic losses, which may not have been without their effect even on the iron spirit and frame of the old Earl. His nephew and his elder son had fallen in the war with Macbeth, and was still a child.<sup>4</sup> Siward's first wife Æthelfæd was dead, and he had in his old age married, and survived, a widow named Godgifu.<sup>5</sup> We might have fancied that Waltheof was her son, but we know for certain that he was the son of the daughter of the old Northumbrian Earls, and that he unhappily inherited all the deadly feuds of his mother's his only surviving son, afterwards the famous Waltheof, house.6 Siward died at York, the capital of his Earldom.

His son WALTHEOF.

&lt;sup>1</sup> See above, p. 100. We have no account of the time or circumstances of his return from banishment.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Chron. Ab. 1054. "Swa swa he on his reste læg." Chron. Wig. "on his bedde."

<sup>8</sup> All the Chronicles and Florence, in anno.

&lt;sup>4</sup> Hen. Hunt. M. H. B. 760 C. "Adhuc parvulus." So Bromton, 946. But he could hardly be "in cunis jacens" (R. Higden, lib. vi. Gale, ii. 281), when we consider his importance twelve years later.

&lt;sup>5</sup> We know her through a document in Cod. Dipl. iv. 265. "Godgiva vidua" gives lands to Peterborough "pro redemptione anime suse per consensum Regis Eaduuardi." She then married Siward; "Postea accepit eam Siuuardus Comes in conjugio; poet tempus non multum mortua est." The singular story about these lands will be best told when discussing the character of Waltheof.

See vol. i. p. 587. Sim. Dun. X Scriptt. 81, "Nepos Aldredi Comitis

A tale, characteristic at least, whether historically true or CHAP. IX. not, told how the stern Danish warrior, when he felt death Story of Siward's approaching, deemed it a disgrace that he should die, not death. on the field of battle, but of disease, "like a cow." If he could not actually die amid the clash of arms, he would at least die in warrior's garb. He called for his armour, and, harnessed as if again to march against Macbeth, the stout Earl Siward breathed his last. But this fierce spirit was His founnot inconsistent with the piety of the time. Saint Olaf, dation and burial at the martyred King of the Northmen, had by this time Galmanho. become a favourite object of reverence, especially among men of Scandinavian descent. In his honour Earl Siward had reared a church in a suburb of his capital called Galmanho,<sup>2</sup> a church which, after the Norman Conquest, developed into that great Abbey of Saint Mary, whose ruins form the most truly beautiful ornament of the Northern metropolis. In his own church of Galmanho Siward the Strong, the true relic of old Scandinavian times, was buried with all honour.

The death of Siward led to most important political consequences. The direct authority of the House of Godwine was now, for the first time, extended to the land beyond the Humber. This fact marks very forcibly how fully the Comes Waltheof, erat enim filius filize illius." Simeon (ib. 82) seems to imply that Waltheof held Bernicia under his father ("filio suo Waltheofo comitatum Northymbrorum dedit"); but he clearly was not in possession in 1065. See Simeon's own account, X Scriptt. 204. On the question whether he received Northamptonshire on his father's death or ten years later, see Appendix G.

- <sup>1</sup> Hen. Hunt. M. H. B. 760 C. Bromton, 946. Ann. Wint. 26.
- <sup>2</sup> Chronn. Ab. and Wig. 1055. "And he liged at Galmanho, on pam mynstre be he sylf let timbrian and halgian on Godes and Olafes naman [Gode to lofe and eallum his halgum"]. Bromton, 946, using the language of later times, says, "Sepultus est in monasterio sanctæ Mariæ apud Eboracum in claustro." There is still a parish church of Saint Olaf in that part of the city.

CHAP. IX. royal authority was now acknowledged throughout the whole realm. The King and his Witan could now venture to appoint as the successor of Siward an Earl who had absolutely no connexion with any of the great families of Northumberland. Cnut, in the moment of victory, had given the Northumbrians the Dane Eric as their Earl.1 But this was the act of a conqueror, and such was the strength of the Danish element in Northumberland that the appointment of a Dane from Denmark probably seemed less irksome than the appointment of an Englishman from any other part of the Kingdom. This last was the act, one wholly without a parallel, on which Eadward now ventured.

Tostic appointed Earl of the Northum-brians.

1055.

Influences on behalf of Tostig.

The vacant Earldom of Northumberland, including also the detached shires of Northampton and Huntingdon,2 was conferred on Tostig the son of Godwine. The novelty of the step is perhaps marked by the elaborate description of the influences which were brought to bear on the mind of Eadward to induce him to make the appointment. We hear, not only of Tostig's own merits, but of the influence employed by his many friends, especially by his sister the Lady Eadgyth and by his brother Earl Harold, whom Norman calumny has represented as depriving Tostig of his hereditary rights.3 We may suspect that we have here an account of influences which it was more necessary to bring to bear on the minds of the Witan than on that of the King.4 For there is no appointment of Eadward's reign which is more likely to have been the King's personal act. Tostig, rather than Harold, was Eadward's personal favourite. He was the Hêphaistiôn, the friend of Eadward, CHAP. IX. while Harold was rather the Krateros, the friend of the Eadward's personal King.1 He also stood higher in the good will of their affection common sister the Lady Eadgyth. Cut off in a great for Tostig. measure from his Norman favourites, the affections of Eadward had settled themselves on the third son of Godwine. He would therefore naturally desire to raise Tostig to the highest dignities in his gift, or, if he felt hesitation in doing so, it could only be from the wish to keep his favourite always about his own person. In fact we shall find that Eadward could not bring himself to give up the society of Tostig to the degree which the interests of his distant Earldom called for. And this frequent absence of the Earl from his government seems to have been among the causes of the misfortunes which afterwards followed.2

&lt;sup>1</sup> See vol. i. pp. 416, 449. <sup>3</sup> See Appendix G.

&lt;sup>3</sup> Vita Eadw. 408. "Agentibusque amicis potissimum autem et pro merito hoc ejus fratre Haroldo Duce et ejus sorore Regina, et non resistente Rege ob innumera ipsius fideliter acta servitia, ducatum ejus suscepit Tostinus, vir scilicet fortis et magna præditus animi sagacitate et sollertia."

&lt;sup>4</sup> The Biographer, essentially a courtier, always likes to attribute as much as possible to the personal action of the King, and to keep that of the Witan, as far as may be, in the back ground.

This appointment of a West-Saxon to the great Northern Novelty of Earldom was, as I have already implied, a distinct novelty. Saxon Earl Ever since Northumberland had ceased to be ruled by in North-Kings of her own, she had been ruled by Earls chosen land. from among her own people. The ancient Kingdom had sometimes been placed under one, sometimes under two, chiefs; but they had always been native chiefs. The rule of the stranger Eric had been short, and he seems to have allowed the line of the ancient princes to retain at least a subordinate authority.3 Siward, a stranger by birth, was connected with the ancient family by marriage. 4 And

&lt;sup>1</sup> Plutarch. Apophth. Alex. 29. Τιμάν μέν έδόκει Κρατερόν μάλιστα πάντων, φιλείν δε 'Ηφαιστίωνα' Κρατερός μέν γάρ, έφη, φιλοβασιλεύς έστιν, 'Ηφαιστίων δε φιλαλέξανδρος. Eadward's affection for Tostig is also marked by William of Malmesbury, iii. 252; "Quia Tostinum diligeret, ... ut dilecto auxiliari non posset."

&lt;sup>2</sup> This seems implied in the Biographer's description of the state of things when the Northumbrian revolt broke out in 1065 (421); "Erat . . Tostinus in curia Regis, diutiùsque commoratus est cum eo, ejus detentus amore et jussis in disponendis regalis palatii negotiis."

&lt;sup>3</sup> See vol. i. p. 416.

<sup>4</sup> See vol. i. p. 587.

CHAP. 1x. both Eric and Siward were Danes; Tostig came of a line which most probably sprang from the most purely Saxon part of England: The experiment was a hazardous one, yet it was one which was not only dictated by sound policy,

Mode of appointment to the great Earldoms. but which circumstances made almost unavoidable. The great Earldoms, I may again repeat, were neither strictly hereditary nor strictly elective. They were in the gift of the King and his Witan, but there was always a strong tendency, just as in the case of the Kingdom itself, to choose out of the family of the deceased Earl, whenever there was no obvious reason to do otherwise. But on the Impossibility of a native Earl on the death of Siward.

appointing death of Siward there was such an obvious reason to do otherwise, just as there was in the case of the Kingdom when it became vacant by the death of Eadward. The eldest son of Siward had fallen in the Scottish war, and the one survivor of his house was still a child.1 Oswulf, seemingly the only male representative of the ancient Earls,2 was probably still a mere boy.3 There was therefore no available candidate of the old princely line. And, when we think of the state of the country, of the deadly feuds and jealousies which prevailed even between the reigning Earls and other powerful men,4 we shall see that the nomination of any private Northumbrian would have been a still more hazardous experiment than the nomination of a stranger. The Northumbrians themselves seem to have felt this, when, ten years later, the choice of their Earl was thrown into their own hands. They then chose, not a Northumbrian, but a Mercian. But it may well be doubted whether it was good policy to appoint a West-

Doubtful policy of the appointment of Tostig.

Saxon, and especially a member of the House of Godwine.

&lt;sup>1</sup> See above, p. 374. <sup>2</sup> See vol. i. p. 588.

&lt;sup>8</sup> He is called "adolescens" by Simeon of Durham (X Scriptt. 204) ten years later. His father had now been dead fourteen years; Oswulf was therefore probably a mere babe at the time of his death.

&lt;sup>4</sup> See vol. i. p. 585.

This was perhaps going too far in the way of reminding CHAP. IX. the proud Danes of the North of their subjection to the Southern King. It could not fail to suggest the idea of an intention to monopolize all honours and all authority in a single family. And, as events showed, the personal character of Tostig proved unfitted successfully to grapple with the difficult task which was now thrown upon him.

In weighing the character of the third son of Godwine, Character we must be on our guard against several distinct sources of error. We are at first tempted to condemn without mercy one who became the antagonist of his nobler brother, who waged open war with his country, and whose invasion of England, by acting as a diversion in William's favour, was one main cause of the success of William's expedition. We read the account of his crimes as set forth by his Northumbrian enemies, and we think that no punishment could be too heavy for the man who wrought them. On the other hand, though Tostig, as an adversary of Harold, comes in for a certain slight amount of Norman favour, there was also a temptation, which for the most part was found irresistibly strong, to blacken both sons of the Traitor equally. The opposition between Harold and Legends of Tostig during the last two years of their joint lives has Tostig. thus supplied the materials for a heap of legends of revolting absurdity. The two brothers, who clearly acted together up to those two last years, are described as being full of the most bitter mutual rivalry and hatred, even from their childhood. The effect of these two different pictures is that both admirers and depreciators of Harold are alike led to look on the acts of Tostig in the most unfavourable light. The crimes of his later years cannot be denied. He died a traitor, in arms against his country, engaged in an act of treason compared to which Harold's

&lt;sup>1</sup> See Appendix Z.

with

t de

⊾o his share

s, the

are so which Inour. s

liand Orian CHAP. IX. ravages at Porlock, and even Ælfgar's errors, Gruffydd, sink into insignificance. government too was evidently stained with seemingly with great crimes.

But it is reput for the last two years anything which puts him in anything which puts him in an unfavourable light. there is nothing in his few recorded earlier actions which is at all inconsistent with the generally high character Witness of given of him by the biographer of Eadward.

pher of Eadward.

compares him with Harold in elaborate picture of two which I have already made large use of in describ Harold. And it is clear that, whether from his actual convictions or from a wish to please his patro the Lady Eadgyth, it is Tostig rather than Harold partizan he is to be reckoned, and it is Tostig actions he is most anxious to Put in a favourable But the two are the two noblest of mortals; no last But the two are uncomment forth two such men at the same He makes a comparison of virtues between the two,

His description of Tostig. hardly ventures to make the balance decidedly well than his elder brother, but in strength and decidedly well single sing than his elder brother, but in strength and daring he equal. But he seems to have lacked all it equal. But he seems to have lacked all Harold's with an of set before the lacked all Harold's with an of the set before the lacked all Harold's with an of the lacked all Harold's with a lacked all Haro and popular qualities. He is set before us as a strong will, of stern and inflexible purpose, faithful promise, grave, reserved, admitting few or none his counsels, so that he often surprised men by the suddenness of his actions.<sup>2</sup> His zeal against wrong-do denness of his actions.

His stern and unyielding character.

virtue of the ruler for which his father and brother loudly extolled, amounted in him to a passion carried him beyond the bounds of justice and

See above, p. 38.

Vita Eadw. 409. "At Dux Tostinus et ipae et continentia, sed acrior paullisper in persequende malitica, virili etrivina

The whole picture describes him as a man of honest and CHAP. IX. upright intentions, but of an unbending sternness which must have formed a marked contrast to the frank and conciliatory disposition of his brother. Such a man, placed as a ruler over a turbulent and refractory people, might, almost unconsciously, degenerate into a cruel tyrant. Northumberland, we are told, was, at the time when he Disturbed undertook its government, in a state to which it is Northimpossible to believe that either Normandy or southern humber-England afforded any likeness. Siward's strong arm had done something to bring its turbulent inhabitants into order; yet thieves and murderers still had so completely the upper hand that travellers had to go in parties of twenty and thirty, and even then were hardly safe. Tostig Tostig's set himself vigorously, evidently too vigorously, to work restore to put an end to this state of things. His severity was order. merciless and impartial; death and mutilation were freely dispensed among all disturbers of public order. His efforts, we are told, were effectual; it is said, in a proverbial form of speech, that under his administration, any man could safely travel through the whole land with all his goods.2

make out a case for Tostig, the words in Italics mean a great deal. We shall see, as we go on, reason to justify infinitely stronger expressions; but the point is that Tostig was not a mere wanton oppressor, but a ruler who carried a severe justice to such a degree as to become injustice. This is the impression conveyed by the no doubt flattering, but still very carefully drawn, portrait given by the Biographer.

<sup>1</sup> Vita Eadw. 421. "Licet antecessor ejus Dux Siwardus ex feritate judicii valdė timeretur, tamen tanta gentis illius crudelitas et Dei incultus habebatur ut vix triginta vel viginti in uno comitatu possent ire, quin aut interficerentur aut deprædarentur ab insidiantium latronum multitudine."

<sup>2</sup> Ib. 422. "Quos pacis deificæ filius et amator eximius Dux adeò illo adtenuaverat tempore, patriam scilicet purgando talium cruciatu vel nece, et nulli quantumlibet nobili parcendo qui in hoc deprehensus esset crimine, ut quivis solus etiam cum quâvis possessione ad votum possent commeare, absque alicujus hostilitatis formidine." This last is the proverbial saying which is applied to the strict police of William (Chron. Petrib. 1087); "Swa þæt án man þe himsylf aht wære mihte faran ofer his rice

Explanation of his

later crimes.

CHAP. IX. Even powerful Thegas were not spared, and here comes the point in which Tostig most deeply erred. Putting our various accounts together, we shall find that, when offenders were too powerful to be reached by the arm of the law, Tostig did not scruple to rid the land of then by treacherous assassination. We can well understand that a man of Tostig's disposition, bent on bringing his province into order at any price, may have persuaded himself that the public good was superior to all other considerations, and may have blinded himself to the infamy of the means by which the public good was to be compassed. Very similar conduct in public men of our own day has been condoned by large bodies of men, and by some has iver even been warmly applauded. The unswerving dictate of justice is that he who, in any age, sheds blood without sentence of law, deserves the heaviest condemnation and the heaviest punishment. Still such conduct does not necessarily imply any original corruption of heart in the offender. Tostig richly deserved all that afterwards fell upon him. Like most sinners, he went on from bad to worse; but there is no reason to believe that he undertook the government of Northumberland with any less sincere intention of doing his duty there than Harold had when he undertook the government of Wessex. Tostig in the end became a great criminal; but he clearly was not a monster or a villain from the beginning of his career.

His per-Eadward.

The strange thing is that a man of this disposition, favour with whose virtues were all of the sterner sort, should have become a personal favourite with a feeble King like Eadward. One may perhaps explain it by the principle which often makes men, both in love and in friendship, prefer those who are most unlike themselves.

> mid his bosum full goldes ungederad." It is essentially the same as the story told of the vigilant administration of the Bretwalda Radwine; Bæda, Hist, Eccl. ii. 16.

like Eadward would cling to a man like Tostig as his CHAP. IX. matural protector, and, after all, weak as Eadward was, there were elements in his character to which the extreme severity of Tostig would not be unacceptable or even unlike. The King who had commanded Godwine to march against the untried citizens of Dover would not be likely to condemn the harshness of Tostig's rule in Northumberland. And there were other points in Tostig's Tostig's character which would naturally and rightly commend virtues. him to the favour of the saintly King. Tostig, like William, practised some virtues which Harold neglected. While Harold's affections seem to have dwelt wholly on an English mistress, Tostig set an example of strict fidelity to his foreign wife.1 The husband of Judith would thus on every ground be more acceptable to Eadward than the lover of Eadgyth. Tostig too was of a bountiful disposition, and Judith, who was a devout woman, directed a large share of his bounty to pious objects.2 Through all these causes Tostig easily won the highest place in the affection of his royal brother-in-law. With his sister the Lady he stood only too well. There is too much reason to fear that Eadgyth did not scruple to become something more than the accomplice of one of his worst deeds.3

&lt;sup>1</sup> Vita Eadw. 409. "Propter eamdem regize stirpis uxorem suam omnium abdicans voluptatem, calebs moderatius corporis et oris sui prudenter regere consuetudinem." On this singular use of the word calebs, see Appendix B.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Vita Eadw. 409. "Quum largiretur, liberali effundebat munificentia, et frequentiùs hoc hortatu religiosse conjugis suse in Christi fiebat honore quam pro aliquo hominum labili favore." Tostig and Judith had much reverence for Saint Cuthberht, and were bountiful in their gifts to his church at Durham. But Judith chafed under the discipline which forbade women to pay their personal devotions at his shrine. She accordingly, before venturing herself, sent a handmaid to try her luck. The poor girl was sadly buffeted by the indignant saint, on which Tostig and his wife offered a splendid crucifix with the usual accompanying figures. Sim. Dun. Hist. Eccl. Dun. iii. 11.

&lt;sup>3</sup> See above, p. 46. We shall come to the details in the next Chapter.

CHAP, IX.

Such was the man to whom, probably at about the age of thirty-two,1 was entrusted the rule of the ancient realm beyond the Humber. The general picture of his government I have already given; but for nine years no domestic details are supplied. We shall find him, like his brother, making the fashionable pilgrimage to Rome, and aiding his brother in his wars with the Welsh. Notwithstanding Norman legends, there is, at this stage of their history, not the slightest sign of any dissension between them.

Tostic becomes the sworn brother of Malcolm.

One fact however we learn quite incidentally which touches, not indeed the internal administration of his Earldom, but the measures taken at once for its external 10,5-1061. defence, and for the maintenance of the supremacy of the Imperial Crown over the great Northern dependency of England. At some time during the first six years of his government, Earl Tostig became the sworn brother of Malcolm, the restored King of Scots.2 This was a tie by which reconciled enemies often sought to bind one another to special friendship. It was the tie by which Cnut had been bound to Eadmund, and by which Tostig's predecessor Ealdred had been bound to the faithless Carl.4 But there is nothing to show that the establishment of this tie between Tostig and Malcolm Probable reference of the engagement to the war with Macbeth.

> <sup>1</sup> I have no means of reckoning save the vague one which I have had to follow throughout. As Godwine and Gytha were married in 1019, their third or fourth child would probably be born about 1023 or 1024.

> had been preceded by any hostilities between them. It is far more probable, considering the date of Tostig's appointment to his Earldom, that the engagement took place early in Tostig's government, and that it was made with a view to the joint prosecution of hostilities

&lt;sup>2</sup> Simeon of Durham (Gest. Regg. in anno) speaks of Malcolm being Tostig's "conjuratus frater" in 1061. The engagement must therefore have been entered into before that year and after 1055. Tostig would not become Malcolm's sworn brother till he found himself his neighbour.

<sup>3</sup> See vol. i. p. 436.

<sup>4</sup> See vol. i. p. 585.

against a common enemy. When Tostig succeeded Siward, OHAP. IX. Malcolm was still struggling for his crown against Macbeth, and we cannot doubt that Tostig continued to support the man of King Eadward against the usurper.1 Then doubtless it was that the King of Scots and the Earl of the Northumbrians entered into this close mutual relation. But the tie of sworn brotherhood was one which was seldom found strong enough to bind the turbulent spirits of those times. It sat almost as lightly on the conscience of Malcolm as it had sat on the conscience of Carl. The engagement was observed as long as it happened to be convenient, and no longer. While Tostig was the guardian of the English border, Malcolm's brotherhood with Tostig did not hinder him from violating the frontiers of Tostig's Earldom. When Tostig was an exile in arms against his country, the tie was remembered, and it procured him a warm welcome at the Scottish Court.

The appointment of Tostig to the Earldom must have Ælfgar been made in the Gemót which was held in London in the March 20, Lent of this year. In the same Assembly, Ælfgar, Earl 1055. of the East-Angles, was banished. The accounts which we have of this transaction are not very intelligible. The fullest narrative that we have, that of the Chronicler who is most distinctly a partizan of Harold's, tells us that he was charged with treason towards the King and all his people, and that he publicly confessed his guilt, though the confession escaped him unawares. The other accounts are satisfied with saying that he was guiltless or nearly &lt;sup>1</sup> See Appendix X.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Chron. Petrib. 1055. "pa bead man ealre witena gemót vii. nihton ær midlenctene." Flor. Wig. "Habito Lundoniæ consilio."

* Ib. "Utlagode mann Ælfgar eorl, forton him man wearp on best he was bes cynges swica and ealra landleoda. And he bes geanwyrde wes setforan eallum bam mannum be best gegaderode weron, beah him best word ofscute his unnbances." So Chron. Cant.

CHAP. 1X. guiltless.1 With such evidence as this, we are not in a position to determine on the guilt or innocence of Ælfgar. We do not even know what the treason was with which he was charged. But a charge to which the accused party, even in a moment of confusion, pleaded guilty, could hardly have been wholly frivolous on the part of the accuser. This point is important; for, though we have no direct statement who the accuser was, the probability is that a charge against one who stood so high in the rival family could have been brought only by Harold or by some one acting in his interest. At any rate, if Ælfgar was not a traitor before his condemnation, he became one speedily after it. In seeking a forcible restoration, he did but follow the least justifiable act in the career of his rival. But, if Harold had set a bad example, Ælfgar improved upon it. Harold had endeavoured to force his way into the country at the head of mercenaries hired in a foreign land. But he had not allied himself with the enemies of his country; he had not carried on a war against England in the interest of an ever restless foe of England. To this depth of infamv Ælfgar did not scruple to sink. He went over, as Harold had done, to Ireland, and gathered a force of eighteen

Ælfgar hires ships in Ireland, ships, besides the one in which he had made his own

> 1 "Butan ælcan gylte," Chron. Ab. "Forneh butan gylte," Chron. Wig. "Sine culps," Florence. Just as in the case of the ballad charging Godwine with the murder of Ælfred (vol. i. p. 546), these differences look very much as if the Worcester writer had seen the Abingdon text, and had altered a passage which might be construed into a representation of Harold as a false accuser. One can hardly conceive any other motive for the change. And care on such a point seems to show that Harold had some hand in the accusation, whether true or false. It is singular however that Henry of Huntingdon, who is generally most bitter against Harold, should be the writer who expresses the most distinct conviction of the guilt of Ælfgar (M. H. B. 760 D); "Eodem anno Algarus consul Cestrice [a confusion of his present and later offices] exsulatus est, quia de proditione Regis in consilio convictus fuerat." On the other hand, a later writer, John of > Peterborough (1055), commits himself to the banishment being done both

"sine caussa" and "per Haroldi consilium."

5

£

*_

X

Z

3

These ships were doubtless manned by the CHAP. IX. voyage. Scandinavian settlers in that country. With this fleet he sailed to some haven in Wales, probably of North Wales, where he met Gruffydd and made an alliance with him.2 and makes The Welsh Prince was now at the height of his power. with Gruf-He had this very year overthrown and slain his South-fydd. Welsh rival, Gruffydd the son of Rhydderch.<sup>8</sup> He seems now to have been master of the whole Cymrian territory, and, at the head of such a power, he was more dangerous, and probably more hostile, to England than ever. Nothing then could be more opportune for his purposes than the appearance of a banished English Earl at the head of a powerful force of Irish Danes. Ælfgar at once asked for Gruffydd's help in a war to be waged against King Eadward.<sup>4</sup> The plan of a campaign was speedily settled. Gruffydd summoned the whole force of the Cymry 5 for a great expedition against the Saxons. Ælfgar, with his Irish or Danish following, was to meet the Welsh King at some point which is not mentioned, and the combined host was to march on a devastating inroad into Herefordshire. The plan was successfully carried out, and the forces of Gruffydd and Ælfgar entered the southern part of the shire, the district known as Archenfeld, and

¹ Chron. Ab. 1055. "He gewende on to Irlande, and begeat him over lio; but wees xviii. scipa butan his agenan." So "xviii. piraticis navibus acquisitis" in Florence. The part of Ireland whence they came is not mentioned, but Diarmid, the protector of Harold, was still reigning at Dublin, and he would doubtless be equally ready to protect Ælfgar. I can find no mention of the matter in the Irish Chronicles.

&lt;sup>2</sup> The language of the three Chronicles and of Florence is singularly varied, but they all assert the same fact.

* Ann. Camb. 1055. "Grifinus filius Lewelin, Grifud filium Riderch occidit et Herefordiam vastavit." So Brut y Tywysogion, 1054.

&lt;sup>4</sup> Fl. Wig. "Petivit [Algarus] ut contra Regem Eadwardum sibi esset in auxilium."

&lt;sup>5</sup> Fl. Wig. "De toto regno suo copiosum exercitum congregans." The Welsh Chronicler says that "Gruffydd raised an army against the Saxons," but he takes care to say nothing of his English, Irish, or Danish allies.

ravage Herefordshire,

CHAP. IX. there harried the country. The border land which they and Ælfgar entered was one bound to special service against British enemies. The Priests of the district had the duty of carrying the King's messages into Wales; its militia claimed the right, in any expedition against the same enemy, to form the van in the march and the rear in the retreat.1 To ravage this warlike district was no doubt a special object with the Welsh King, one which would be carried out with special delight. He did his work effectually. The effects of the harrying under Gruffydd were still to be seen at the time of the Norman survey.2 and meet Earl Ralph ford. October 24, 1055.

The work of destruction thus begun seems to have been carried on by Gruffydd and his allies without opposition, till they came within two miles of the city of Hereford.3 There they were at last met by a large force under Ralph, near Here the Earl of the country, consisting partly of the levies of the district, and partly of his own French and Norman following. Richard the son of Scrob, it will be remembered, was among the Normans who had been allowed to remain in England,4 and no doubt the forces of Richard's Castle swelled the army of Ralph. The timid Earl 5 thought himself called upon to be a military reformer. The English, light-armed and heavy-armed alike, were

&lt;sup>1</sup> Domesday, 179. "In Arcenefelde habet Rex tres ecclesias; presbyteri harum ecclesiarum ferunt legationes Regis in Wales. . . . Quum exercitus in hostem pergit, ipsi per consuetudinem faciunt Avantwarde et in reversione Redrewarde. Hæ consuctudines erant Walensium T. R. E. in Arcenefelde." These customs are described at length, and they give a curlous picture of a border district, largely inhabited by Welshmen living under English allegiance and bound to service against their independent brethren.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Domesday, 181. "Rex Grifin et Blein vastaverunt hanc terram T. R. E. et ideo nescitur qualis eo tempore fuerit." Blein is doubtless Blethgent the brother of Gruffydd, to whom his kingdom was given by Harold in 1063.

* Fl. Wig. 1055. "Duobus miliariis a civitate Herefordâ."

<sup>4</sup> See above, p. 346.

&lt;sup>5</sup> It is now that Florence introduces him as "timidus Dux Radulfus, Regis Eadwardi sororis filius."

always accustomed to fight on foot. The Housecarl, CHAP. IX. the professional soldier, with his coat of mail and his Ralph battle-axe, and the churl who hastened to defend his field the Engwith nothing but his javelin and his leathern jerkin, alike on horselooked on the horse only as a means to convey the warrior back. to and from the field of battle. The introduction of cavalry into the English armies might perhaps have been an improvement, but it was an improvement which could not be carried into effect with a sudden levy within sight of the enemy. But Ralph despised the English tactics, and would have his army arrayed according to the best and newest continental models. A French prince could not condescend to command a host who walked into action on their own feet, according to the barbarous English fashion. The men of Herefordshire were therefore required to meet the harassing attacks of the nimble Welsh, and the more fearful onslaught of Ælfgar's Danes, while still mounted on their horses. The natural consequences fol- The battle lowed; before a spear was hurled, the English took to fore lost. flight.1 Nothing else could have been reasonably looked for; however strong may have been the hearts of their riders, horses which had not gone through the necessary training would naturally turn tail at the unaccustomed sights and sounds of an army in battle array.2 But in one account we find a statement which is far stranger and more disgraceful. If Ralph required his men to practise an unusual and foreign tactic, he and his immediate companions should at least have shown them in their own persons an example of its skilful and valiant carrying out. But we are told that Ralph, with his French and Normans, were the first to fly, and that the English in their flight

<sup>1</sup> Chron. Ab. 1055. "Ac sér þær wære ænig spere gescoten, ær fleah væt Englisce folc, forcan be hig weeran on horsan." Florence is more explicit; "Radulfus . . Anglos contra morem in equis pugnare jussit."

&lt;sup>2</sup> See Macaulay's remarks on Monmouth's raw cavalry at Sedgemoor. Hist. Eng. i. 588, 604.

CHAP. 1x. did but follow the example of their leader. I suspect some exaggeration here. Whatever may have been the case with the timid Earl himself, mere cowardice was certainly not a common Norman, or even French, failing. For a party of French knights to take to flight on the field of battle without exchanging a single spear-thrust, is something almost unheard of. It is far more likely that we have here a little perversion arising from national dislike. It is far more likely that, whatever Ralph himself may have done, the Normans in his company were simply carried away by the inevitable, and therefore in no way disgraceful, flight of the English. Anyhow, the battle, before it had begun, was changed into a rout. enemy pursued. The light-armed and nimble Welsh were probably well able to overtake the clumsily mounted English. Four or five hundred were killed, and many more wounded. On the side of Ælfgar and Gruffydd we are told that not a man was lost.2

Ælfgar and Gruffydd sack and burn Hereford. Story of Æthelberht of East-Anglia. 792. The Welsh King and the English Earl entered Hereford the same day<sup>3</sup> without resistance. The chief object of their wrath seems to have been the cathedral church of the diocese, the minster of Saint Æthelberht. The holy King of the East-Angles, betrothed to the daughter of the famous Offa, had come to seek his bride at her father's court. He was there murdered by the intrigues of Cyne-

&lt;sup>1</sup> Fl. Wig. 1055. "Comes cum suis Francis et Nortmannis fugam primitus capessit. Quod videntes Angli ducem suum fugiendo sequuntur." But the Chronicles do not necessarily imply this.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Chron. Ab. "And man sloh there mycel wel, abutan feower hund manna of the fife, and hig nænne agean." The Annales Cambrise (1055) have simply, "Grifinus.. Herfordiam vastavit," without mention of the battle. The Brut (1054) is much fuller. It makes no mention of Ælfgar and his contingent, but it speaks of Reinolf or Randwlf as the commander of the English. It says nothing of the special reason for the flight of the English, which it says happened "after a severely hard battle."

&lt;sup>3</sup> The battle, according to the Abingdon Chronicle and Florence, the "harrying" according to the Worcester Chronicle, was on the 24th of October, ix. Kal. Nov.

::

--:

į.

1

zi z

T 🚩

7

T:

٣

Y.

F

ĵ.

thryth, the wife of the Mercian King.1 He became the CHAP. IX. local saint of Hereford, and the minster of the city boasted of his relics as its choicest treasure. That church was now Æthelstan, Bishop of ruled by Æthelstan, an aged Prelate, who had already Hereford. sat for forty-three years.<sup>2</sup> But, for the last twelve years, 1012-1056. blindness had caused him to retire from the active government of his diocese, which was administered by a Welsh Bishop named Tremerin.<sup>3</sup> Æthelstan is spoken of as a man of eminent holiness, and he had, doubtless in his more active days, rebuilt the minster of Saint Æthelberht, and enriched it with many ornaments. The invaders attacked the church with the fury of heathers; indeed among the followers of Ælfgar there may still have been votaries of Thor and Odin. Seven of the Canons attempted to defend the great door of the church, but they were cut down without mercy.4 The church was burned, and all its relics and ornaments were lost. Of the citizens many were slain, and others were led into captivity.<sup>5</sup> The whole town was sacked and set fire to, and the Welsh account specially adds that Gruffydd destroyed the fort or citadel.6 The history which follows seems to imply that the town itself was not fortified, but merely protected by this fortress. At its date or character we can only guess. Hereford is not spoken of among the fortresses raised by Eadward the Elder and his sister Æthelflæd. It

&lt;sup>1</sup> So all the Chronicles under 792.

<sup>2</sup> See Appendix AA.

&lt;sup>3</sup> Chronn. Ab. and Wig. and Fl. Wig. 1055.

Flor. Wig. 1055. "Septem canonicis qui valvas principalis basilicas defenderant occisis." Chron. Wig., without mentioning the number, "Forbærnde [Ælfgar] best mære mynster be Æthelstan bisceop getimbrode, and ofsloh be preostas innan ban mynstre."

&quot;Nonnullis è civibus necatis, multisque captivatis," says Florence, but the Worcester Chronicle, after mentioning the slaughter of the clergy, adds, "and manege berto eacan;" while Abingdon says, "and best folc slogan, and sume onweg læddan."

• The Brut y Tywysogion plainly distinguishes the "gaer," or castle, which was demolished, from the town, which was burned. The castle was doubtless of stone, while the houses of the town would be chiefly of wood.

CHAP. IX. is an obvious conjecture that the fortress destroyed by Gruffydd was a Norman castle raised by Ralph. A chief who was so anxious to make his people conform to Norman ways of fighting would hardly linger behind his neighbour at Richard's Castle, in at once providing himself with a dwelling-place, and his capital with a defence, according to the latest continental patterns. If so, we may easily form a picture of the Hereford of those days. By the banks of the Wye rose the minster, low and massive, but crowned by one or more of those tall slender towers, in which the rude art of English masons strove to reproduce the campaniles of Northern Italy. Around the church were gathered the houses of the Bishop, the Canons, the citizens, the last at least mainly of wood. Over all rose the square mass of the Norman donjon, an ominous presage of the days which were soon to come. All, church, castle, houses, fell before the wasting arms of Ælfgar and Gruffydd. They went away rejoicing in their victory and in the rich booty which they carried. The blow seems to have broken the hearts of the two Prelates whose flock suffered so terribly. Tremerin died before the end of the year, and Æthelstan early in the year following.1

Deaths of Tremerin 1055, and Æthelstan, February 10, 1056.

> King Eadward was now in his usual winter-quarters at Gloucester. Either the time of the Christmas Gemót was hastened, or the King, in such an emergency, acted on his own responsibility. The defence of the country and the chastisement of the rebels could no longer be left in the hands of his incapable nephew. The occasion called for the wisest head and the strongest arm in the whole realm. Though his own government had not been touched, the Earl of the West-Saxons was bidden to gather a force from all England, and to attack the Welsh in their own land. It is not unlikely that his brother was, as in a later war with the same enemy, summoned from Northumber-<sup>1</sup> Chronn. Ab. and Wig. and Fl. Wig. 1055, 1056.

Harold sent against the Welsh.

1063.

land to his help. 1 Late as was the season of the year, CHAP. IX. Harold did not shrink from the task.2 This seems to have Comparibeen his first experience of Welsh warfare, and we do not earlier and know whether he now adopted those special means of later Welsh adapting his operations to the peculiar nature of the country, which he tried so successfully in his later and more famous campaign. He then, as we shall see, caused his soldiers to adopt the light arms and loose array of the Welsh, and so proved more than a match for them at their own weapons. The story seems rather to imply that he did not do so on this occasion, and that the later stroke of his genius was the result of the lessons which he now learned. In neither case did a Welsh enemy dare to meet Harold in a pitched battle, but there is a marked difference between the two campaigns; in the earlier one, the Welsh successfully escaped Harold's pursuit, while, in the later one, they were unable to do so. Harold gathered his army at Gloucester; he passed the Welsh border, and pitched his camp beyond the border district of Straddele.3 But the main point is that Gruffydd and Ælfgar, who had marched so boldly to the conflict with Ralph, altogether shrank from giving battle to Harold. They escaped into South Wales. Harold, finding it vain to pursue such an enemy, desisted from the attempt.

&lt;sup>1</sup> See Appendix Y.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Florence, at this point, seems quite to boil over with admiration for "Quod ubi Regi innotuit, de tots mox Anglis exercitum congregari jussit, cui Glawornæ congregato strenuum Ducem Haroldum præfecit, qui, devotè jussis obtemperans, Griffinum et Algarum impigrè insequitur, ac fines Walanorum audacter ingressus, ultra Straddele castrametatus est; sed illi, quia virum fortem et bellicosum ipsum sciebant, cum so committere bellum non audentes, in Suth-Waliam fugerunt."

&lt;sup>3</sup> See Flor. Wig. u. s. "Straddele" or "Stratelei" (see Domesday, 187) is a border district reckoned along with Herefordshire in Domesday. Roger of Wendover (i. 494), in a fine fit of exaggeration, carries Harold as far as Snowdon; "Castra usque ad Snaudunam perduxit." Mr. Woodward (History of Wales, 210) makes Straddele to be Ystrad-clwyd, the southern Stratholyde of Denbighshire, but the witness of Florence and Domesday seems decisive.

Harold fortifice

Hereford.

CHAP, IX. He dismissed the greater part of his army, that is probably the militia of the shires, merely bidding them keep themselves in readiness to withstand the enemy in case of any sudden inroad. With the rest of his troops, that is probably with his own following, he proceeded to take measures for securing the important post of Hereford against future attacks. The castle had been levelled with the ground, the church was a ruin, the houses of the townsmen were burned. Harold set himself to repair the mischief, but his notions of defending a city were different from those of the Frenchman Ralph. The first object of the English Earl was to secure the town itself, not to provide a stronghold for its governor. It does not appear that he rebuilt the castle, but he at once supplied the city itself with the requisite defences. important a border town was no longer to be left open to the incursions of every enemy or rebel. As a military measure, to meet a temporary emergency, he surrounded the town with a ditch and a strong wall. This wall, in its first estate, though strengthened by gates and bars, seems to have been itself merely a dyke of earth and rough stones. But, before the reign of Eadward was ended, Harold, then Earl of the shire, followed the example of Eadward at Towcester and Æthelstan at Exeter, and surrounded the town with a wall of masonry.2 The wooden houses of the citizens could soon be rebuilt. Hereford was CHAP. IX. soon again peopled with burghers, both within and without the wall, some of them the men of the King and others the men of Earl Harold.1 The minster had been burned, but we must remember how laxly that word is often taken. All its woodwork, all its fittings and ornaments, were of course destroyed, the walls would be blackened and damaged, but it was capable of at least temporary repair, as Bishop Æthelstan was buried in it next year.2 Under the care of Earl Harold, Hereford was again a city.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Fl. Wig. 1055. "Majorem exercitus partem ibi dimisit, mandans eis ut suis adversariis, si res exposceret, viriliter resisterent."

&lt;sup>2</sup> I infer this from a comparison of the Chronicles, Florence, and Domesday. The Abingdon Chronicle says, "And Harald Eorl let dician & dic abutan best port ba hwile." Florence says more distinctly, "Herefordam rediens, vallo lato et alto illam cinxit, portis et seris munivit." These accounts, as well as the probability of the case, point to a mere "vallum." But in Domesday, 179, we read of there being a "murus" at Hereford in the time of King Eadward, which seems to imply a stone wall. Nothing is more likely than that Harold should throw up a hasty mound now, and afterwards make a more elaborate fortification, when, as I shall presently show, Hereford came under his immediate government. On the walls of Exeter and Towcester see vol. i. pp. 338, 346.

Meanwhile Ælfgar and Gruffydd sued for peace. Mes-Peace of sages went to and fro, and at last a conference was held Billingsley. between them and Harold at Billingsley in Shropshire, a little west of the Severn. Harold was never disposed to press hardly on an enemy, and he may possibly have felt that he was himself in some sort the cause of all that had happened, if he had promoted any ill-considered charges against his rival. In fact, rude and ferocious as those General times were in many ways, the struggles of English poli-of English tical life were then carried on with much greater mildness political than they were in many later generations. Blood was often lightly shed, but it was hardly ever shed by way of judicial sentence. A victorious party never sent the vanquished leaders either to a scaffold or to a dungeon. Banishment was the invariable sentence, and banishment in those days

One hundred and three burghers held of the King, twenty-seven of Earl Harold, whose customs were the same as those of the King's men. The customs are detailed at great length. The burghers were liable to military service against the Welsh, and paid a fine of forty shillings to the King in case of disobedience to the Sheriff's summons for that purpose. Some served with horses. The Reeve paid twelve pounds to the King and six to Earl Harold, that is the Earl's third penny. The King had a mint, and also the Bishop. The whole details are exceedingly curious, and I shall probably have to refer to them again.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Chronn. Ab. and Wig. Flor. Wig. 1056. "Cujus corpus Herefordam delatum, in ecclesia quam ipse a fundamentis construxerat, est tumulatum." Yet he had the year before said, "monasterio quod . . . Æthelstanus construxerat . . . combusto."

CHAP. IX. commonly supplied the means of return. Thus when Gruffydd and Ælfgar sought for peace, it was easily granted to them; Ælfgar was even restored to the Earldom which he had forfeited. It was probably thought that he was less dangerous as Earl of the East-Angles, than as a banished man who could at any time cause an invasion of the country from Wales or Ireland. His fleet sailed to Chester, and Ælfgar there awaited the pay which he had promised the crews.1 Whether the payment was defraved out of the spoils of Herefordshire we are not told. Ælfgar now came to the King, and was formally restored to his dignity.2 This was done in the Christmas Gemót, in which we may suppose 1055-1056. that the terms of the peace of Billingsley were formally confirmed.

Invasion of England by Gruffydd and Magnus. 105Ğ.

restored

Christmas.

to his Earldom.

> Peace with Gruffydd was easily decreed in words, but it was not so easily carried out in act. The restless Briton eagerly caught at any opportunity of carrying his ravages beyond the Saxon border. The Welsh Annals here fill up a gap in our own, and make the story more intelligible. With the help of a Scandinavian chief whom it is not easy to identify, but who is described as Magnus the son of Harold,3 Gruffydd make a new incursion into Hereford-We may well believe that the restoration and fortification of Hereford was felt as a thorn in his side. time the defence of the city and shire was not left in the hands of any Earl, fearful or daring, but fell to one of the CHAP. IX. warlike Prelates in whom that age was so fertile. Bishop Death of Æthelstan, as I have already said, died early in the year Æthelstan. at Bosbury, an episcopal lordship lying under the western February 10, 1056. slope of the Malvern Hills.1 His burial in Saint Æthelberht's minster must have been the first great public ceremony in the restored city. In the choice of a successor, Eadward, or rather Harold, was actuated at least as much by military as by ecclesiastical considerations. The see of Leofgar, the venerable and pious Æthelstan was filled by a Prelate of Bishop of Hereford. whom, during a very short career, we hear only in the March 27, character of a warrior. This was Leofgar, a chaplain of the Earl's, whose warlike doings seem to have been commemorated in popular ballads. He laid aside his chrism and his rood, his ghostly weapons, and took to his spear and his sword and went forth to the war against Gruffydd the Welsh King.<sup>2</sup> But the warfare of this valiant churchman was unfortunate. He had not been three months His death a Bishop before he was killed, and with him his priests, as June 16, also Ælfnoth the Sheriff 3 and many other good men. Chronicler goes on to complain bitterly of the heavy

&lt;sup>1</sup> Chron. Ab. 1055. "And best sciplif gewende to Legeceastre, and beer abiden heora males be Ælfgar heom behét." So Florence.

&lt;sup>2</sup> The Worcester Chronicle, which, as well as (still more strangely) that of Peterborough, wholly leaves out Harold's exploits, seems to record Ælfgar's restoration with some degree of sarcasm; "And ba ba hi hæfdon mæst to yfele gedón, man gerædde bone ræd, bæt man Ælfgar Eorl geinnlagode, and ageaf him his corldom, and call best him ofgenumen wass."

&lt;sup>3</sup> The Annales Cambrise has "Magnus filius Haraldi vastavit regionem Anglorum, auxiliante Grifino Rege Britonum." The Brut gives him the strange description, "Magnus uab Heralt, brenhin Germania," which I do not understand. Was he Ælfgar's Irish ally, defrauded of his pay! The entry the year before, about waiting at Chester, looks like it.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Fl. Wig. 1056. "In episcopali villa que vocatur Bosanbyrig decessit." A fine thirteenth century church and some remains of the episcopal manor still exist.

&lt;sup>2</sup> The Abingdon and Worcester Chronicles here get poetical; Peterborough is, just here, strangely meagre; "And man sette Leofgar to biscupe; se was Haroldes Eorles masse-precet; se werede his kenepas on his precethade, offer he was biscop. Se forlet his crisman and his brode, his gastlican wæpna, and feng to his spere and to his sweorde æfter his biscuphade, and swa for to fyrde ongean Griffin bone Wyliscan Cing." Yet a fighting Bishop was not so wonderful a thing in those times. See vol. i. p. 432. William of Malmesbury, Gest. Pont. 163, makes some confusion, when he says, "Leovegar. Hunc tempore Regis Edwardi Grifin Rex Walensium urbe crematâ expulit sede et vitâ." And Roger of Wendover makes some further confusion or other when he writes (i. 495), "Ethelstanus Herefordensis præsul obiit, et Levegarus, Ducis Haroldi capellanus, successit; hunc pressulem, in omni religione perfectum, Griffinus Rex Walensium, Herefordensi civitate cremata, peremit."

Was Ælfnoth succeeded by Osbern! See p. 346.

CHAP. IX. grievances attending on a Welsh war. It is clear that the way had not yet been found out how really to quell the active sons of the mountains, when their spirits were thoroughly aroused by an able and enterprising prince like Gruffydd. The complaint does not dwell on losses in actual fight, which were probably comparatively small. The Welsh would seldom venture on an actual with Gruf. battle with the English, even when commanded by captains very inferior to Harold. They would not run such a risk, except when they were either supported by Scandinavian allies, or else when they were able to take the Saxons at some disadvantage. What the Chronicler paints is the wearing, cheerless, bootless kind of warfare which is carried on with a restless enemy who can never be brought to a regular battle. It is not ill success in fighting that he speaks of, but the wretchedness of endless marching and encamping, and the loss of men and horses, evidently by weariness rather than by the sword.1 The wisest heads in the nation agreed that a stop must, at any cost, be put to this state of things. On the death of Leofgar, the see

Character of the war fydd.

Ealdred holds the see of Hereford with that of Worcester.

Gruffydd reconciled to Eadward.

1056.

energy seems to have shrunk from no amount of burthens, ecclesiastical, military, or civil.2 By the counsel of this Prelate, and of the Earls Leofric and Harold, the Welsh King was reconciled to his English overlord.3 This expression may be only a decorous way of attributing to the King personally a measure which was really the act of the of Hereford was committed to Bishop Ealdred, whose

&lt;sup>1</sup> Chron. Ab. 1056. "Eaforolic is to atellanne see gedrecednes, and see fare eall, and see fyrdung, and best geswine and manna fyll and eac horsa, be call Englahere dreah."

&lt;sup>2</sup> See above, pp. 153, 362, 372. The Chronicles distinctly say, "Ealdred bisceop feng to bam bisceoprice be Leofgar hæfde." Florence rather softens this into, "Aldredo Wigornensi præsuli, donec antistes constitueretur, commissus est episcopatus Herefordensis." He kept it for four years, holding also the see of Ramsbury during part of the time.

&lt;sup>3</sup> Fl. Wig. "Idem episcopus et Comites Leofricus et Haroldus cum Rege Eadwardo Walanorum Regem Griffinum pacificaverunt."

three able statesmen who are represented as intervening CHAP. IX. between him and his dangerous vassal. But Eadward did sometimes exert a will of his own, and when he did so, his will was often in favour of more violent courses than seemed wise or just in the eyes of his counsellors. It is quite possible then that Eadward was, as he well might be, strongly incensed against Gruffydd, and that it needed all the arguments of Leofric and Harold, and of Ealdred so renowned as a peacemaker, to persuade the King to come to any terms with one so stained with treason and sacrilege. And undoubtedly, at this distance of time, there does seem somewhat of national humiliation in the notion of making peace with Gruffydd, after so many invasions and so many breaches of faith, on any terms but those of his complete submission. We must take the names of Harold, Leofric, His oath and Ealdred as a guaranty that such a course was neces- of homage. sary. Gruffydd did indeed so far humble himself as to swear to be for the future a faithful under-King to Eadward.2 It would also seem that the rebellious vassal was mulcted of a small portion of his territories. Eadward He loses had, at some earlier time, granted to Gruffydd certain his lands in Cheshire. lands, seemingly that portion of the present shire of Chester which lies west of the Dee. These lands were now forfeited, and restored to the see of Lichfield and other English possessors from whom they had been originally taken.3 We know not whether the grant was an original act of Eadward, or whether it was a convenient legal confirmation of some irregular seizure made by the Welsh King. Gruffydd was perhaps bought off in this

&lt;sup>1</sup> See above, p. 86.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Chron. Ab. 1056. "Swa best Griffin swor abas best he weolde beon Eadwarde Kinge hold Underkinge and unswicigende."

Domesday, 263. "Rex Eadwardus dedit Regi Grifino totam terram quæ jacebat trans aquam quæ De vocatur. Sed postquam ipse Grifin forisfecit ei, abstulit ab eo hanc terram, et reddidit episcopo de Cestre [the see had been moved thither before the Survey. See Will. Malms. Gest. Pont. 164 b] et omnibus suis hominibus qui antea ipsam tenebant." A

CHAP. IX. Way after some of his former incursions, most likely at the moment of his temporary cooperation with Swegen.1

> If so, the restoration of the alienated lands was now required as a condition of peace. This homage of Gruffydd. and this surrender of lands, remind us of the homage and surrender made, under the like circumstances, by the last successor of Gruffydd to a greater Edward.2 As for the Welsh King's oath, it was kept after the usual fashion, that is, till another favourable opportunity occurred for breaking it.

Cooperation of Harold, Leofric, and Ealdred.

1051.

transaction. That is the way in which Harold, Leofric, and Ealdred are described as acting together. implies no further cooperation, it at least implies that these three took the same side in a debate in the Witena-

One other point may be noted in connexion with this last gemôt. Yet Leofric was the father of Harold's rival Ælfgar, and the last time that the names of Harold and Ealdred were coupled was when Ealdred was sent to follow after Harold on his journey to Bristol.

But now

all these old grudges seem to have been forgotten. In fact not one of the three men was likely to prolong a grudge needlessly. Harold's policy was always a policy of conciliation; if—what we can by no means affirm—his conduct with regard to the outlawry of Ælfgar was at all of another character, it was the last example in his history. Ealdred was emphatically the peace-maker. He had no doubt long ago made his own peace with Harold, and he had probably used his influence to reconcile him with any &quot;forisfactio" on the part of Gruffydd can hardly refer to his loss of his whole kingdom in 1063, and this moment of reconciliation and homage is obviously the most natural time for a partial surrender. We have here also another example of church lands being dealt with for political purposes in a way which would naturally give rise to those charges of sacrilege against Hafold and others of which I have spoken elsewhere. See Appendix E. <sup>1</sup> See above, p. 87.

&lt;sup>2</sup> See the whole account in W. Rishanger, 90, ed. Riley.

with whom reconciliation was still needful. Leofric had CHAP. IX. often been opposed to Godwine, and must have looked with uncomfortable feelings on his wonderful rise. he had never been a bitter or violent enemy; we have always found him playing the part of a mediator between extreme parties. There is no trace of any personal quarrel between him and Harold. He may have thought himself wronged in the outlawry of his son; but he could not fail to condemn Ælfgar's later conduct and to approve that of Harold. He must have admired Harold's energetic carriage in the Welsh campaign and in the restoration of Hereford. And Leofric doubtless felt, whether Ælfgar felt or not, some gratitude to Harold for his conciliatory behaviour at Billingsley, and for the restoration of Ælfgar to his Earldom. All that we know of the good old Earl of the Mercians leads us to look on him as a man who was quite capable of sacrificing the interests and passions of himself or his family to the general welfare of his country.

§ 3. From Harold's first Campaign against Gruffydd to the Deaths of Leofric and Ralph. 1055-1057.

A few detached ecclesiastical events must be mentioned Hermann. as happening in the course of these two years of war with Ramsbury, Gruffydd. The see of Wiltshire or Ramsbury 1 was, it seeks to will be remembered, now held by Hermann, one of the Abbey of Lotharingian Prelates who were favoured by Godwine and Malmes-Harold as a sort of middle term between Englishmen 1055. and Frenchmen.<sup>2</sup> This preferment was not, at least in

D d

VOL. II.

&lt;sup>1</sup> The see was at Ramsbury, but the Bishop is often called "Episcopus Wiltoniensium," that is "of the men of Wiltunscir." In Mercia and Northumberland the Bishopricks (much like the shires, see vol. i. p. 51) seem commonly to be spoken of by the names of the episcopal towns; in Wessex and East-Anglia it is as usual, or more so, to use the name of the tribe or district. See below, p. 406.

&lt;sup>2</sup> See above, pp. 79-81, and 358.

The same of the last of the la

The church of CHAP. IX. Hermann's eyes, a very desirable one. Ramsbury, unlike other cathedral churches, seems not to have been furnished with any company of either monks or himself somewhat canons,1 and the Bishop therefore found solitary. The revenues also of the see were small, an evil which seems to have pressed more heartly on a stranger than it would have done on a native. Other Bishops of Ramsbury, Hermann said, had been natives of the country, and the poverty of their ecclesiastical ne had been eked out by the bounty of English friends and kinstolk. He, a stranger, had no means of support to look to except the insufficient revenues of his Bishop ack.2 He had, it appears, been long looking forward to mexing, after the manner of the time, a second Bishopric Leofric had united Crediton and Saint G man's, Hermann hoped to unite Ramsbury and Sherborne, whenever a vacancy should occur in the latter see. Hermann, as the mission with which he had been entrus ted shows, stood high in royal favour, and the Lady Ead syth had long before promised to use her influence on his behalf, whenever the wished for opportunity should occur. But another means of increasing the episcopal wealth of Ramsbury now presented itself. The Abbot of Malmesbury was dead. Though the monasteries had not yet reached their full measure of exemption from episcopal control we may be sure that the Bishops had already begun to 100k with jealousy on those heads of great monastic houses ho had gradually

Will, Malm. Gest. Pont. ap. Scriptt. p. Bed. " Ejus animi magnitudini, vel potius cupiditati, quum non sufficeret apud Ramesberiam nec elericorum conventus noc quo sustentaretur erat."

&lt;sup>2</sup> Ib. "Antecessores suos indigenas fuisse; se alienigenam nullo parentum compendio vitam quo sustentet habere."

&lt;sup>3</sup> See above, p. 115.

<sup>4</sup> Will. Malms. u. s. "Episcopum Schireburnensern . . . cujus episcopatum suo uniendum antiquis Edgithæ Reginæ promissis operiebatur."

grown up into rival Prelates within their own dioceses. CHAP. IX. Hermann at Ramsbury felt towards the Abbey of Malmesbury, as in after days his countryman Savaric at Wells felt towards the Abbey of Glastonbury. Here was a good opportunity at once for raising his Bishoprick to a proper standard of temporal income and for getting rid of a rival who was doubtless a thorn in his side. He would forsake Ramsbury, with its poor income and lack of clerks, and fix his episcopal throne in the rich and famous minster which boasted of the burying-place of Æthelstan.2 He laid his scheme before the King, who approved of it; he went away from the royal presence already in expectation Bishop of Malmesbury. But two parties interested in the matter had not been consulted, the monks of Malmesbury and the Earl of the West-Saxons. The monks were certain to feel the utmost repugnance to any such union. They might Relation of reasonably fear that the Lotharingian Prelate might seek Bishops to reconstruct the foundation of his newly made cathedral Monks. church according to the canonical pattern of his own country. The rule of Chrodegang, which, to the Canons of Wells and Exeter, seemed to be an insufferable approach to monastic austerity, would seem to the monks of Malmesbury to be a no less insufferable approach to secular laxity. Or, even if the Bishop allowed the church to retain its ancient monastic constitution, the monks would have no desire for any such close connexion with the Bishoprick.

<sup>1</sup> On the history of Savaric and his designs on Glastonbury, see the History of Adam of Domersham in Anglia Sacra, i. 578, and Mr. J. R. Green and Professor Stubbs in the Somersetshire Archeological Proceedings for 1863, pp. 39-42.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Fl. Wig. 1055. "Offensus quia ei sedem episcopalem transferre de villa quæ Reamnesbyrig dicitur ad abbatiam Malmesbyriensem Rex nollet concedere." There is nothing in this short notice inconsistent with the fuller account given by William of Malmesbury.

<sup>3</sup> I have spoken above (p. 84) of the changes made by Leofric at Exeter, and I shall have to speak in my next Chapter of the like changes made by Gisa at Wells.

CHAP. IX. They doubtless, as the monks of Glastonbury did afterwards, greatly preferred a separate Abbot of their own. The monks of Malmesbury therefore betook themselves to the common helper of the oppressed, and laid their grievances at the feet of Earl Harold.1 As the natural protector of all men, monks and otherwise, within his Earldom, Harold pleaded their cause before the King. Within three days after the original concession to Hermann,2 before any formal step had been taken to put him in possession of the Abbey,3 the grant was revoked, and the church of Malmesbury was allowed to retain its ancient constitution.4

Manifest action of

The speed with which this business was dispatched the Witan, shows that it must have been transacted at a meeting of the Witan held at no great distance from Malmesbury. Such a change as the transfer of a Bishop's see from one church to another could certainly not have been made or contemplated without the consent of the Witan. And for the monks to hear the news, to debate, to obtain Harold's help, and for Harold to plead for them, within three days, shows that the whole took place while the Witan were actually in session. Of the places where Gemóts were usually held the nearest to Malmesbury is Gloucester, the usual scene of the Christmas Assembly. The monks. or enough of them to act in the name of the house, may

&lt;sup>1</sup> Will. Malms, Scriptt. p. Bed. 142. "Excellentis prudentise monachi. audito quid in curia actum, quid justitize surreptum esset, ad Comitem Godwinum ejusque filium summå celeritate contendunt." William is here mistaken in mentioning Godwine, who of course was dead. The story cannot be removed to a time before Godwine's death, as it is fixed to 1055 by the witness of Florence.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Ib. "Id Rex pro simplicitate, cui pronior quam prudentiæ semper erat, legitimè concedendum ratus, tertio abhinc die dissoluit."

&lt;sup>3</sup> Ib. "Antequam Hermannus in re vel saisitione inviscaretur."

<sup>4</sup> lb. "Illi [Godwine and Harold, or, more truly, Harold only], rei indigna novitate permoti, Regem adeunt, et à sententià deducunt ; facile id fuit viris summis amplissimă auctoritate præditis, quibus et causse rectitudo, et Regis facilitas suffragaretur. Ita Hermannus, necdum planè initiatus, expulsus est."

perhaps themselves have been present there, and may CHAP. IX. have determined on their course without going home to Malmesbury. But the distance between Malmesbury and Gloucester is not too great to have allowed the business, in a moment of such emergency, to have been discussed within the three days, both in the Gemót at Gloucester and in the chapter-house at Malmesbury. One can hardly doubt that this affair took place in the Christmas Gemót in Christmas, which the Peace of Billingsley was confirmed and Ælfgar 1055. reinstated in his Earldom.

The part played by Harold in this matter should also Harold's be noticed. Harold was no special lover of monks; the action in the matter. chief objects of his own more discerning bounty were the secular clergy. But he was no enemy to the monastic orders; he had, as we have seen in more than one case, approved and suggested the favours shown to them by others; he had even, once at least, appeared as a monastic benefactor himself.1 And, at any rate, monks or no monks, the brethren of Malmesbury were a society of Englishmen, who were threatened with the violation of an ancient right through what clearly was a piece of somewhat hasty legislation. To step in on their behalf was an act in no way unworthy of the great Earl, and it was quite in harmony with his usual moderate and conciliatory policy.

The remainder of the story is curious. Hermann, dis-Hermann pleased at being thus balked when he thought himself monk at so near success, gave up, or at least forsook, his Bishoprick, Saint Omer. crossed the sea, and assumed the monastic habit in the Abbey of Saint Bertin at Saint Omer.<sup>2</sup> But the fire so suddenly

&lt;sup>1</sup> See above, p. 42.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Fl. Wig. 1055. "Episcopatum dimisit, marique transfretato, apud Sanctum Bertinum monachicum habitum suscepit, ibique in ipso monasterio tribus annis mansit." Saint Omer, it must be remembered, was at this time Flemish, and Flanders, and lands south of Flanders, were still largely Teutonic.

CHAP. IX. kindled soon burned out; Hermann chafed under the fetters of monastic discipline, and wished to be again in the world.1 After three years, his earlier scheme once more presented itself to his mind, when the see of Sherborne became vacant by the death of Bishop Ælfwold. He returned to England, he pleaded his cause with the King, and found no opposition from the Earl.2 No appointment to Ramsbury returns and had been made during Hermann's absence; the administration of the diocese was entrusted to the indefatigable Bishop Ealdred, who thus had the care of three dioceses, Worcester, Hereford, and Ramsbury.3 Perhaps Hermann was looked on as still being Bishop, and the promise of the Lady with regard to the union of the sees of Ramsbury and Sherborne was held to be still binding. At all events, on Hermann's return, Ealdred gave up Ramsbury, and Hermann became Bishop of the united Sees. He held Died 1078. them for twenty years longer; he survived the Conquest twelve years,4 and he lived to merge the old diocesan names of Ramsbury and Sherborne in one drawn from an altogether new seat of episcopal authority, the waterless

Hermann Ramsbury and Sherborne. 1058.

<sup>1</sup> William of Malmesbury (Scriptt. p. Bed. 142) makes himself merry over the grievances of a Bishop who had turned monk in a momentary fit of pique; "Sed ut ferè fit talibus, repentino illo impetu relligionis frigescente. indies in Angliam reditum meditabatur. Figebat [Pigebat ?] hominem assuetum obsequiis, innutritum deliciis, carere delinimentis quæ ab ineunte fuerat expertus setate."

hill of the elder Salisbury.5

<sup>2</sup> William, strangely confounding his dates, fancies that Godwine died during Hermann's absence at Saint Omer, and that Hermann was more likely to gain his point after Godwine's death. He is followed by R. Higden, XV Scriptt. ii. 281, the passage so oddly perverted by Thierry. See above, p. 345. <sup>3</sup> See Flor. Wig. 1058.

William of Malmesbury continues to jeer at him to the last; "Accepit ergo Hermannus Schireburnensem episcopatum integrum cum tribus pagis. Edwardo Rege dante, vivacitateque sua datoris annos transcendens ad Willielmi tempora duravit." The three "pagi" are the three shires of which the united diocese was formed, Berkshire, Wiltshire, and Dorsetshire. So the Abingdon Chronicler recording his death in 1078; "Se was Biscop on Bearrucscire and on Wiltunscire and on Dorsætan." Cf. note on <sup>5</sup> See vol. i. p. 349. Will. Malma. u. s. p. 401.

The year of Bishop Leofgar's unlucky attempt to win CHAP. IX. fame as a warrior was marked by the death of Earl Odda, Earl Odda. the King's kinsman. He had been set over the western August 31, parts of Godwine's Earldom during the year of his banishment, and since his return he had probably held, under the superiority of Leofric, the Earldom of the whole or part of the old land of the Hwiccas.2 His unpatriotic conduct in those times seems, even in the eyes of our most patriotic chroniclers, to have been fully atoned for by his personal virtues and by the favour which he showed to monasteries. He is accordingly sent out of the world with a splendid panegyric.<sup>3</sup> Before his death he was admitted a monk by his diocesan Ealdred,4 who might thus, by bringing so goodly a sheep into the monastic fold, atone for having himself forsaken the cloister for the cares of government and warfare. He died at Deerhurst, under the shadow of the minster of his own building, but his own burial-place was at Pershore, another of the many Abbeys of a land which, next to the eastern fens, was the richest district of England in monasteries of early date. course of the same year, Æthelric, Bishop of Durham, Durham the successor of the simoniacal Eadred,6 resigned his see 1042-1056, resigns and became again a monk at Peterborough, in which his see-

In the Æthelric,

&lt;sup>1</sup> See above, p. 160.

See Appendix G.

&lt;sup>3</sup> Flor. Wig. 1056. "Ecclesiarum amator, pauperum recreator, viduarum et pupillorum defensor, oppressorum subventor, virginitatis custos, comes Agelwinus, id est Odda." Cf. above, p. 161.

<sup>4</sup> Ib. "Ab Aldredo Wigornensi episcopo, ante suum obitum, monachizatus." So Chronn. Ab. and Wig. 1056. "He was to munece gehadod ar his ende."

&lt;sup>5</sup> Flor. Wig. u. s. "Apud Deorhyrste decessit, sed in monasterio Persorensi honorificè sepultus quiescit." So Chronn. Ab. and Wig. "His lic lib on Perscoran." His brother Ælfric, for whose soul Deerhurst church was built (see above, p. 161), who died in 1053 (Fl. Wig. in anno), also died at Deerhurst and was buried at Pershore.

See vol. i. p. 588. According to the Worcester Chronicle under the years 1041 and 1073, and the Peterborough Chronicle under 1072, Asthelric was consecrated to York, and was unjustly deprived of the metropolitan see (hit was mid unrihte him ofgenumon), on which he took Hugo Candidus, the Peterborough writer (ap. Sparke, 46), Durham.

CHAP. IX. monastery he had spent his youth. He was, through the influence of Tostig,2 succeeded in his Bishoprick by Öct. 15, his brother alike in the flesh and in monastic profession, 1072.] Æthelwine Æthelwine, another monk of the Golden Borough.3 succeeds. 1056-1071. Both brothers survived the Norman Conquest, and we shall see each of them, alike on the throne of Durham and in the cloister of Peterborough, become victims of the watchful jealousy of the Norman Conqueror.

Eadward Ætheling. arrives from Hungary. 1057.

The next year is conspicuously a year of deaths, and a year of deaths which affected the state of England far more sensibly than the deaths of Earl Odda and Bishop Æthelric. The first recorded event of the year is the arrival of the Ætheling Eadward from Hungary.4 The attributes his loss of the see of York to the natural dislike of the seculars to a monk : "facientibus quibusdam ex canonicis vel ex clericis, quia penè naturale est eis semper invidere monachis, quia monachus erat, noluerunt pati eum archiepiscopum esse." But what vacancy was there at York in 1041 or 1042? Hugh is loud in his praise, but Simeor of Durham (Hist. Dun. Eccl. iii. 9, X Scriptt. 34) has much to say against him, charging him with robbing his church. In the third year of his episcopate he was driven out, but was restored by Earl Siward, on the receipt of a bribe (munere oblato). Digging at Chester-le-street to build a stone church on the site of the old wooden one, he found a treasure, which he spent in building churches and repairing roads near Peterborough.

- <sup>1</sup> Flor. Wig. and Chronn. Wig. 1072. Petrib, 1073. Sim. Dun. u. s.
- <sup>2</sup> Sim. Dun. u. s.
- <sup>2</sup> These two brother monks and Bishops remind one of the opening of the Ormulum;

"Nu, broberr Wallterr, broberr min Affterr be fisshess kinde : And broberr min i Crisstenndom purrh fulluhht and burrh trowwbe; And broberr min i Godess hus 3et o be bride wise."

Æthelwine, according to Simeon, had administered the Bishoprick of Durham under his brother.

<sup>4</sup> Chronn. Wig. and Petrib. 1059. The former breaks out into song, and gives us good authority for the surname of Ironside;

Irenaid was geclypod

For his snellscipe."

"Se was Eadwerdes

Brofor sunu kynges

Eadmund cing.

Florence says, "Ut ei mandârat suus patruus Rex Eadwardus, de mission of Ealdred had not failed through the death of CHAP. IX. the great prince to whom he was sent,1 and, three years [Death of after the reception of the English Bishop at Köln, the the Emperor Henry. English Ætheling, if English we may call him, set foot 1056.] on the shores from which he had been sent into banishment as a helpless babe.2 He now, at the age of forty-one, came for the first time to his native country, and he came in a character as nearly approaching to that of heir presumptive to the English Crown as the laws of our elective monarchy allowed. He came with his foreign wife Prospects and his children of foreign birth. And it can hardly fail of his succession to but that he was himself, in speech and habits, as foreign as the Crown. the Norman favourites of Eadward, more foreign than the men of kindred tongue whom Godwine and Harold were glad to encourage in opposition to them.3 The succession of such a prince, even less of an Englishman than the reigning King, promised but little good to the King-Still the succession of the Ætheling would have had one great advantage. It was hardly possible that the claims of William could be successfully pressed against him. A supposed promise of King Eadward in William's favour could hardly be maintained in the teeth of a bequest and an election in favour of an Englishman of royal birth and mature years, against whom William could have no personal complaint whatever. Incomparably inferior as Eadward doubtless was to Harold in every personal qualification, his succession could never have given William

Ungaria . . Angliam venit. Decreverat enim Rex illum post se regni hæredem constituere."

&lt;sup>1</sup> The death of the Emperor Henry the third is recorded in the Abingdon Chronicle under 1056, under the name of Cona, that is, of course, Conrad. The mistake in the name is odd, but there is no need to have recourse to Mr. Thorpe's strange conjecture, A. S. Chronicles, ii. p. 159. The Peterborough Chronicle has a Latin entry with the true name "Henricus."

&lt;sup>3</sup> See vol. i. pp. 445, 455.

The Tongues most familiar to Eadward would naturally be Magyar and High-Dutch.

CHAP. IX. the opportunities which were afterwards given him by the accession of Harold. Eadward could not have been held up as an usurper, a perjurer, a man faithless to his lord. nor, had he been the opponent, could the superstitions of the time have been appealed to to avenge the fancied insult offered to the relics of the Norman saints. We can thus fully understand why an English poet, clearly writing by the light of later experience, laments the death of the Ætheling as the cause of all the woes which came upon this poor nation.1 Even at the time, when men's eyes were not yet so fully opened, we may be sure that England rejoiced in his coming, and bitterly lamented his speedy removal. The son of the hero Ironside, the last adult male of the royal line, must, whatever were his personal qualities, have attracted to himself an interest which was not purely sentimental.

Death of the Ætheling Eadward. 1057.

The Ætheling then came to England; but he never saw his namesake the King. He died almost immediately afterwards in London,2 and was buried with his grandfather Æthelred in Saint Paul's minster. Why he was shut out from the royal presence was unknown then as well as now.3 His exclu- The fact that his exclusion was commented on at the time might seem to forbid, and yet perhaps it does not wholly forbid, the simplest explanation of all, that he was ill at the time of his landing, and that the illness which caused sion from the royal presence,

<sup>1</sup> Chron. Ab. 1057;

"Wála þæt wæs hreowlic sið And hearmlic Eallre bissere beode, þæt he swa rafe

His lif geendade. res be he to Englalande com; For ungessibbe pissere earman beode."

<sup>2</sup> Chron. Petrib. 1057. "Her . . . com Ædward æfeling, Eadmundes sunu cynges, hider to lande, and sona bees gefor." So Florence; "Ex quo venit parvo post tempore vitâ decessit Lundoniss."

<sup>3</sup> The song in the Abingdon Chronicle says;

"Ne wiston we For hwylcan intingan þæt gedón wearð, pet he ne moste His mæges Eadwardes Cynges geseón."

his death also hindered his presentation to his uncle. If CHAP. IX. the exclusion had a political object, to what party ought we to attribute it? A distinguished modern writer at-not likely tributes it, though not very confidently, to the partizans to be due to Harold, of Harold. But it is not at all clear that Harold as yet aspired to the throne; it is far more probable that it was the death of the last adult Ætheling which first suggested to Harold and his friends the possibility of the succession of a King not of the royal house. Because Harold did in the end succeed Eadward, we must beware of supposing that his succession had been looked forward to during the whole reign of Eadward. There must have been some moment when the daring thought—for a daring thought it was—of aspiring to a royal crown first presented itself to the mind of Harold or of those to whom Harold hearkened. And no moment seems so clearly marked out for that purpose by all the circumstances of the case as the moment of the death of the Ætheling. Harold had wished to thwart a design of King Eadward's in favour of his nephew, he would hardly have waited for his landing in England to practise his devices. He would rather have laboured to hinder Ealdred's mission in the first instance, or to render it abortive, in some way or other, during the long period over which the negotiation was spread. If the exclusion of the Ætheling from but rather his uncle's presence was really owing to the machina-Norman tions of any political party, there is another party on courtiers, which the charge may fall with far greater probability. There was another possible successor who had far more to fear from the good will of the King towards the Ætheling

&lt;sup>1</sup> Lappenberg, p. 517 (ii. 259 Thorpe); "Doch ehe er noch seinen königlichen Oheim erblickte, von dessen Augen eine ihm ungünstige Partei, vermuthlich Earl Harolds, des nachherigen Königs, Freunde, ihn fern zu halten wusste, starb er plötzlich zu London." He goes on however distinctly to absolve Harold from all share in his death.

CHAP. IX. than Harold had. Whether Harold had begun to aspire to the Crown or not, there can be little doubt that William had, and William was still by no means without influence at the English Court. There were still Normans about Eadward, Bishop William of London, Robert the son of Wymarc, Hugolin the Treasurer, and others whom Godwine or Harold had, perhaps unwisely, exempted from the general proscription. To excludeby some underhand means, if at all—a prince of the blood from the presence of his uncle and sovereign, sounds much more like the act of a party of this kind, than the act of a man whom both office and character made the first man in the realm. The thing, if done at all, was clearly some but, more probably than either. the result of illness.

ing the Ætheling's succession in quite another way. But after all, it is far more likely that the fact that the two Eadwards never met was not owing either to the partizans of Harold or to the partizans of William, but that it was simply the natural result of the illness of which the Ætheling presently died.

wretched court intrigue, the fitting work of a foreign faction. The Earl of the West-Saxons, had his interests been concerned in the matter, would have set about hinder-

Surmise of Sir F. Palgrave caused the death of the Ætheling.

Another, and a far worse, insinuation against the great Earl hardly needs to be refuted. Among all the calumnies that Harold with which, for eight hundred years, the name of Harold has been loaded, there is one whose suggestion has been reserved for our own times. Norman enemies have distorted every action of his life; they have misrepresented every circumstance of his position; they have charged him with crimes which he never committed; they have looked at all his acts through such a mist of prejudice that the victory of Stamfordbridge is changed under their hands into a wicked fratricide.1 But no writer of his own time, or

<sup>1</sup> See Will. Gem. vii. 36. Ord. Vit. 500 C. Still more strongly, Guy of Amiens (129 et seqq.) and Liber de Hydå, p. 293.

of any time before our own, has ever ventured to insinuate CHAP. IX. that Earl Harold had a hand in the death of the Ætheling Eadward. That uncharitable surmise was reserved for an illustrious writer of our own time, in whom depreciation of the whole House of Godwine had become a sort of passion.1 It is enough to say that, had there been the faintest ground for such an accusation, had the idea ever entered into the mind of any man of Harold's own age,2 some Norman slanderer or other would have been delighted to seize upon it.3 Nothing is more easy than to charge any man with having secretly made away with another man by whose death he profits, and the charge is one which, as it is easy to bring, is sometimes very hard to disprove. that very reason, it is a charge on which the historian always looks with great suspicion, even when it is known to have been brought at the time and to have been currently believed at the time. The general infamy of Eadric is fully established, but we need not believe in every one of the secret murders which rumour charged him with having committed or instigated. Still less need we believe the tales which charge the Great William with having more than once stooped to the trade of a secret poisoner.4

Palgrave, Hist. Ang. Sax. 352. "He was buried in St. Paul's Cathedral; and sad and ruthful [rueful?] were the forebodings of the English, when they saw him borne to his grave.—Harold gained exceedingly by this event. Did the Atheling die a natural death?—The lamentations of the chroniclers seem to imply more than meets the ear." Mr. C. H. Pearson (Hist. of Eng. in the Early and Middle Ages, i. 244) does not scruple to repeat the insinuation.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Unless indeed some tradition of the sort had found its way into the confused mind of Saxo (p. 203), when he made Harold murder King Eadward? He may have been thinking of Eadward the Ætheling, or he may have been writing purely at random.

&lt;sup>2</sup> This is well put by Lappenberg in the passage quoted above, p. 411.

&lt;sup>4</sup> William was charged with poisoning Conan of Britanny (Will. Gem. vii. 33), and also Walter of Mantes (Eadward's nephew), and his wife Biota (Ord. Vit. 534 B). I shall have to speak of these matters in their proper place.

CHAP. IX. When we think how easy the charge is to bring, and how recklessly it has been brought at all times, the mere fact that no such charge was ever brought against Harold dos in truth redound greatly to his honour. Calumny itself instinctively shrank from laying such a crime to the charge of such a man. William was, as I believe, = guiltless of any such baseness as Harold himself. the charge did not seem wholly inconsistent with the crafty and tortuous policy of the Norman Duke. The West-Saxon Earl, ambitious no doubt and impetuous, but ever frank, generous, and conciliatory, was at once felt to be incapable of such a deed.

Heaca, Bishop of Selsey, dies. Æthelric succeeds. 1057.

Death of Earl Leofric. 1057.

Three other deaths followed among the great men of the land, two of which were of no small political importance. It was not of any special moment, as far as we know, when Heaca, Bishop of Selsey or of the South-Saxons, died, and was succeeded by Æthelric, a monk of Christ Church. 1 It was quite another matter when the great Earl of the Mercians, so long the honoured mediator between opposing August 31, races and opposing interests, died in a good old age in his own house at Bromley in Staffordshire.2 Of all the churches and monasteries which had been enriched and adorned by the bounty of Leofric and Godgifu, none was dearer to them than the great minster of Coventry, the city with which their names are inseparably connected in one of those silly legends which have helped to displace our early history.3 There Leofric was buried in the church which he and his wife had raised from the foundations, and had enriched with CHAP. IX. gifts which made it wealthier and more magnificent than all the minsters of England.<sup>2</sup> Godgifu survived her husband many years; she saw her son and grandsons rise and fall; she saw her granddaughter share first a vassal and then an Imperial Crown, and then vanish out of sight as a homeless widow. At last she herself died, still in the possession of some part at least of her vast estates, a subject of the Norman invader.3

&lt;sup>1</sup> Chron. Wig. 1057. Petrib. and Cant. 1058. Fl. Wig. 1057.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Fl. Wig. 1057. "Laudabilis Comes Leofricus, Ducis Leofwini filius [Earl Leofric, son of Ealdorman Leofwine, see vol. i. pp. 456, 461] in proprià villà que dicitur Bromleage, in bonà decessit senectute ii. Kal. Sept." He had been Earl at least twenty-five years, perhaps thirty-three.

&lt;sup>3</sup> Besides Bromton and Knighton quoted above (p. 48), Godgifu's ride through Coventry appears in Roger of Wendover, i. 497.

A few months after the death of Leofric came the death Death of of the stranger who had seemingly held a subordinate December Earldom under his authority. Ralph, Earl of the Mage-21, 1057. sætas, the French nephew of King Eadward, died near the end of the year, and was buried in the distant minster of Peterborough,4 to which he had been a benefactor.5 I have already started the question whether the thoughts His posof Eadward had ever turned towards him as a possible sible presuccessor.6 After the death of the Ætheling, the hopes of the Crown. Ralph and his brother Walter, if they had any, might again revive. But if so, death soon cut short any such schemes. Walter, the reigning prince of a foreign state, would have no chance. If any such prince were to be chosen, it would be better at once to take the renowned Duke of the Normans than the insignificant Count of Mantes. But Ralph, whether he was ever actually thought of or

&lt;sup>1</sup> Florence (u. s.) distinctly says that Leofric and Godgifu built the church; "de suo patrimonio à fundamentis construxerunt." But Orderic (511 A) says, "Elfgarus Comes Coventrense comobium construxit," and goes on to speak of Godgifu's gifts of ornaments; he is clearly confounding father and son.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Fl. Wig. 1057. "Adeo ditaverunt ut in Anglia tanta copia auri, argenti, gemmarum, lapidumque pretiosorum in nullo inveniretur monasterio, quanta tunc temporis habebatur in illo." The charter about Coventry in Cod. Dipl. iv. 253 can hardly be genuine as it stands. <sup>3</sup> See Appendix BB. was not reigning in 1043.

<sup>4</sup> Chron. Wig. and Flor. Wig. in anno.

&lt;sup>5</sup> Hugo Candidus, p. 44-

&lt;sup>6</sup> See above, p. 367.

CHAP. IX. not, was clearly a possible candidate; his death therefore, following so soon after the death of the Ætheling, removed another obstacle from the path of Harold.

Redistribution of Earldoms. 1057-10589

The deaths of the two Earls involved a redistribution of the chief governments of England, which would naturally Christmas, be carried out in the following Christmas Gemót. The Earldom of the Mercians, such parts of it at least as had been under the immediate authority of Leofric, was conferred on his son Ælfgar.1 It shows how vast must have been the hereditary influence of his house, when such a trust could not be refused to a man who had so lately trampled under foot every principle of loyalty and patriotism. But care was taken to make him as little dangerous as possible. Ælfgar may have hoped that, on the death of Ralph, the Earldom of the Magesætas would again be merged in Mercia, and that, excepting the shires attached to Northumberland, he might rule over the whole realm of Offa and Æthelflæd. But policy altogether forbade that the Herefordshire border should be again placed in the hands of one who had so lately acted as the ally of Gruffydd. We know not whether the Welsh King had already entered into a still closer relation with the English Earl by his marriage with Ælfgar's beautiful daughter Ealdgyth.2 The date of that marriage is not recorded; it may have already taken place, or it may have happened on the next occasion, one distant only by a few months, when we shall find the names of Gruffydd and Ælfgar coupled together. But if the Welsh King was already the son-in-law of the Mercian Earl, there was a still further reason for placing some special safeguard on that border of the realm. In short, the government of Herefordshire was so important that it could not be safely placed in any hands but those of the foremost man in England. There is distinct evidence to <sup>1</sup> See Appendix BB. '

Earl of the Mercians.

Marriage of Gruffydd and Ealdgyth.

.Ow that, within two or three years after the death of CHAP. IX. eofric, the Earldom of Herefordshire was in the hands of Herefordshire added Larold.1 We can therefore hardly doubt that, on the re- to Harold's ttlement which must have followed the deaths of Leofric Earldom. nd Ralph, the Earldom of the Magesætas was attached > the Earldom of the West-Saxons, and that Harold now ecame the immediate ruler of the district of which he ad been the deliverer, and of the city of which he might laim to be the second founder. Earl Ralph had left a son, Harold the namesake, probably a godson, of the great Earl, and Ralph. Harold the son of Ralph appears in Domesday as a landowner both before and after the Conquest. His name still survives within his father's Earldom, where it cleaves to an existing parish and to a castle which has wholly vanished. But Earldoms were not hereditary, and the son of Ralph was so young that, eight years later, he was still under wardship.2 On this ground, if on no other, Harold, the greatnephew of Eadward, the great-grandson of Æthelred, was so far from appearing as a competitor for the Crown of his ancestors that he was not even thought of as a possible successor for his father's Earldom. His name is altogether unknown to history, and but for his place in Domesday and in local tradition, his very existence might have been forgotten. His renowned namesake was now entrusted with the great border government. But it is by no means Question clear whether Harold held Herefordshire as a detached as to Gloucestershire. possession, as Northamptonshire and Huntingdonshire were held by Siward and Tostig, or whether it was connected with his West-Saxon Earldom by the possession of Gloucestershire. If so, the rule of the Earl of the West-Saxons must now have been extended over nearly all that was West-Saxon land in the days of Ceawlin.3

E e

VOL. II.

&lt;sup>2</sup> See Appendix CC. <sup>1</sup> See Appendix G.

* See vol. i. pp. 33, 34. Harold however did not command the whole Severn valley, as Worcestershire was now held by Ælfgar. See Appendix G.

in creased, the time

While the power of Harold was thus CHAP. IX. seemed to have come for raising t.I The bonne. The Godwine to a share in the honours Godwine w -East-Anglian Earldom, vacated

Elifgar to Mercia, was now confermed to the desired of Gyrth But

Changed But Gyrth Earl East-Anglian Earldom, vacated of the East-Changed But Angles, 1057-1058], and of Oxfordshire: Policy of these deteched shires.

was detached from East-Anglia.

received only the two strictly East—Anglia.

received only the two strictly East—Anglia.

The Religion of Cambridgeshire, to which the afternal probably afternal the strict of the received only the two strictly Eastaddition of Cambridgeshire, to which addition of Cambridgeshire, to which afterwards added

The afterwards added the detached shire of Oxford.

these detached shires to distant Earldon licy of attaching is not very clear. Tterwards led the distant portions of the Kinguo... no intention of weakening any of the Rose was certainly thus divided. The object

The whose govern-Cat vascals over The ere was certainly no intention of weakening any ments were thus divided. The object whose governments were thus divided. The object whose governments were thus divided. The object whose governments were thus divided. ments were thus divided.

bably to bring the influence of the country.

Some of Godwine to bear upon all parts of to some old connexion had attached Northamptonshire to Northumber. nexion had attached rouse land at an earlier time, and the example thus given was Some old conland at an earlier time, and seized on as a means for planting the authority of the it will be remembered, had formed part of the Earldom of Swegen; it was now placed in the hands of Gyrth. Swegen; it was now purch.

it was highly important that the great frontier town of it was highly important town of Mercia and Wessex, the seat of so many important town of national Mercia and Wessex, the season meetings, should be in thoroughly trustworthy hands. meetings, should be in the meetings, should be in possible the from command, but it was impossible Ælfgar's loyalty was most altogether to oust him from command, but it was expedient altogether to oust nim nome to confine his powers of mischief within the expedient to confine his powers of mischief within the expedient possible compass, and to hem him in, whenever it could be, by men who could be relied on. Unfortunately at be, by men wno could be the family at Chester, the most dangerous point of all, the family interest of the House of Leofric was too strong to allow of that important shire being put into any hands but those of CHAP. IX. Ælfgar. We shall presently see the result.

Leofwine also was apparently provided for at the same Leofwine time.1 His government, like that of Swegen at an earlier Kent, time, was carved out of several ancient Kingdoms and Essex, &c. Earldoms, but it lay much more compactly on the map than the anomalous province which took in Oxford, Taunton, and Hereford. It consisted in fact of southeastern England—of Kent, Essex, Hertford, Surrey, probably Buckinghamshire—that is of the shires round the mouth of the Thames. London, as was natural, remained London exempt from any jurisdiction but that of its Bishop and exempt. the chief officers of the city. The whole East of England was thus placed under the rule of the two younger sons of Godwine. But the evidence of the writs seems to show that Harold retained a general superintendence over their governments, whether simply as their elder brother or in any more exalted character.

The House of Godwine had thus reached the greatest The House height of power and dignity which a subject house could of Godwine reach. Whatever was the origin of the family, they had greatest won for themselves a position such as no English family greatness. ever won before or after. Four brothers, sons of a father who, whether Earl or churl by birth, had risen to greatness by his own valour and counsel, divided by far the greater part of England among them. The whole Kingdom, save a few shires in the centre, was in their hands. And three at least out of the four showed that they well deserved their greatness. To the eldest among the four there evidently belonged a more marked preeminence still. Two of his brothers, those most recently appointed to Earldoms, were clearly little more than Harold's lieutenants. And

&lt;sup>1</sup> See Appendix G.

State of the royal line.

CHAP. IX. a prospect of still higher greatness now lay open to him and his house. The royal line was dying out. No adult male descendant of Æthelred remained; no adult descendant of any kind remained within the Kingdom. The only survivors of the true kingly stock were the son and daughters of the Ætheling, children born in a foreign land. If any hopes of royalty had ever flitted before the eyes of Ralph, such hopes could not extend to his son the young Harold or to his brother the Count of Mantes. The time was clearly coming when Englishmen might choose for themselves a King from among their brethren, unfettered by any traditional reverence for the blood of Ælfred, Cerdic, and Woden. And when that day should come, on whom should the choice of England fall save on the worthiest man of the worthiest house within the realm? We cannot doubt that, from the year when the three deaths of Eadward, Leofric, and Ralph seemed to sweep away all hindrances from his path, Harold looked forward to a day when he and his might rise to a rank vet loftier than that of Earl. It was no longer wholly beyond hope that he might himself ascend the Imperial throne of Britain, and that the Earldoms of England might be held by his brothers as Æthelings of the House of Godwine. The event proves that such were the hopes of Harold, that such, we may add, were the hopes of England. Such hopes may, even at an earlier time, have flashed across the mind of Harold himself or across the minds of zealous friends of his house or zealous admirers of his exploits. But this was the first moment when such hopes could have assumed anything like form and substance; it was the first moment when the chances seemed distinctly to be rather for than against their fulfilment. That Harold from this time doubtless aspired to the Crown, that he directed all his conduct by a hope of securing the Crown, cannot be doubted. And the unanimity with which he was raised to the throne when the great day came seems to show that CHAP. IX. men's minds had long been prepared to look to him as their future sovereign. We cannot doubt that, after the death of the Ætheling Eadward, Wessex and East-Anglia at least were ready to transfer the English Crown from the line of Æthelred to the line of Godwine.

Harold's prospects of the Crown.

Two questions still remain. Did Harold, in thus look-Questions ing forward to the Crown, know, as he came to know at last, Harold's how formidable a rival was making ready for him beyond position. the sea? And was the succession of Harold merely a probability, a moral certainty it may be, to which men learned to look forward as a matter of course, or were the hopes of the great Earl confirmed by any act of the Witan or any promise of the King? Both questions are hard to answer. Both are inseparably mixed up with the most difficult questions in our whole history, the alleged promise made to William by Eadward and the alleged oath made to him by Harold. I have already expressed my belief that Eadward's alleged promise to the Norman Duke, which formed the main ground of William's pretensions to the English Crown, though exaggerated and perverted in the Norman accounts, was not a mere Norman invention. I believe that some promise really was made, and that the time when it was made was when William visited Eadward during the banishment of Godwine.1 Of the nature and form of that promise it is difficult to say anything. We may indeed unhesitatingly dismiss the notion that a settlement was made in William's favour by a decree of the Witan. Still any promise of any kind could hardly Effects of have been kept so complete a secret but that it must have Fadward's promise to got blazed abroad, and have reached the ears of the Earl and William. his countrymen. The Norman party, during their short moment of complete triumph, would have no motive to

&lt;sup>1</sup> See above, p. 296 et seqq.

CHAP. IX. keep the matter a secret. They would deem themselves to have reached the great accomplishment of all that they had been scheming for, when there seemed a prospect of the English Crown passing, without slash or blow, to the brow of the Norman. The fact of the promise would doubtless be known, and by statesmen it would be remembered. But it does not follow that it would make any deep impression on the mass of the nation. Men would hear of the promise in a vague sort of way, and would at the time be divided between wonder and indignation. But the idea of the succession of the Norman would be looked on as something which had passed away with other Norman ideas, when the English Earls came back to claim their own. Even after Harold's election as King, the prospect of the Norman invasion is spoken of in a way which seems to show that, to the mass of Englishmen, the claim of William was even then something new and surprising.1 But by a statesman like Harold, if the matter was once known, it would never be forgotten. It would hardly be a thing to talk much of openly; but to counteract any possible schemes of William must have been the main object of Harold's policy from the day when he was first called to the head of affairs. We can understand how Eadward was led to deem his promise null, and to send for the Ætheling as his destined successor. This was, under the circumstances, a great triumph of the national policy. A competitor, accepted by the voice of the nation, was candidature first of Eadward the Ætheling,

Policy of the patriotic party;

then of Harold.

> <sup>1</sup> This seems implied in the way in which William's preparations are spoken of by the Chroniclers and Florence under 1066.

> rival to William than Harold after his oath. He had not placed in William's path, a competitor whom William himself would hardly dare to attack. The death of the Ætheling made matters more difficult. There was now no such unexceptionable rival to oppose to the Norman. Harold indeed, before his oath, was a far more formidable t given his enemy that fatal advantage which the wily CHAP. IX. uke knew so well how to employ. But Harold's succeson would have all the disadvantages of a novelty. If he ould not yet be branded as a perjurer, yet he might be, a way that the Ætheling never could be, branded as an surper. Either of the Eadwards, in short, with Harold or his guide and counsellor, would be really stronger than Iarold himself as King. But the risk had now to be run. The nation at large had most likely but vague notions as to the danger. But Harold, Stigand, and all the leaders of the nation must have known that any step that they took would bring on their country the enmity of a most active and dangerous foe. Harold's main object during his whole administration clearly was to strengthen England at home and abroad, to make her powerful and united when the inevitable day should come.

It is a more difficult question whether Harold's succes- Question sion was at all guaranteed, at this or at any time before as to any Eadward's death, by any formal act either of the King or in Harold's favour. of the Witan. We know that Eadward did exercise in Harold's favour whatever influence or authority an English King had in the nomination of his successor. That nomination appears to have been finally and formally made on Eadward's death-bed. But such a death-bed nomination is in no way inconsistent with a promise to the same effect at an earlier time. Any one indeed to whom such a promise had been made would undoubtedly seek to have it confirmed with all the solemnity which attaches to the last act of a dying man. And there are several circumstances, none perhaps of any great weight singly, but having together a sort of cumulative force, which seem to point to Harold from this time as being something more than Quasi-royal an ordinary Earl, however powerful and popular, as being position of Harold.

<sup>1</sup> Flor. Wig. 1066. "Quem Rex ante suam decessionem regni successorem elegerat." I shall discuss this point at length in the third volume.

vote.

CHAP. IX. in some sort a sharer in the powers and honours of royalty.1 We find his name coupled in public documents with that of the King in a way which certainly is not usual with the name of any subject. We find vassal princes plighting their faith to the King and to the Earl, as if they were senior and junior colleagues in a common office. We find Harold appearing in the eyes of foreigners under the lofty guise of a Duke of the English. That sounding title cannot have been really borne by him at home, but it seems to show that, even among strangers, he was felt to hold the position of a prince rather than that of the most exalted private noble. Lastly, in our best Latin chronicler we find him distinctly called by a title which is nowhere else, to my knowledge, conferred on a subject, but which is the familiar designation of vassal princes.2 All these touches, coming from such different quarters, seem naturally to suggest the view that Earl Harold was, seemingly from the death of the Ætheling, publicly recognized as holding a quasi-royal position, as being, in fact, the designated successor to the Crown.

On the other hand, there are difficulties about the Difficulties in the supbelief that this position was conferred on Harold by any position of any formal formal vote of the Witan. It is plain that a perfectly free choice of the King during the actual vacancy was a right which the English people, or their leaders, prized very dearly. All attempts to limit the choice of the electors beforehand had always signally failed.3 Since the abortive scheme of Æthelwulf, nothing at all answering to a King of the Romans had been seen in England.4 And if there were

&lt;sup>1</sup> See Appendix DD.

&lt;sup>2</sup> He is "subregulus" in Florence, 1066. <sup>3</sup> See vol. i. p. 533.

&lt;sup>4</sup> Compare on the other hand the joint Kingship of Hugh and Robert in France (see vol. i. p. 269). So in England in after times we find Henry the son of Henry the Second crowned in his father's lifetime. In the Empire the cases are endless. See above, p. 373, for that of the reigning King Henry the Fourth.

me reasons which, under present circumstances, might CHAP. IX. ake such an unusual course specially desirable, there were ther reasons which told against it with nearly equal force. Vith the royal house on the verge of extinction, with such competitor as William carefully watching the course of vents, it was most desirable to settle the succession with s much certainty as the laws of an elective monarchy It was most desirable that the successor to the throne should be the man most fitted for the highest of offices, the wisest head and the stoutest arm in the land. It was, in a word, the wish of every clear-sighted patriot that the successor of Eadward should be no other than Earl Harold. But, on the other hand, the choice of Earl Harold, or of any other man not of kingly blood, was something strange and unprecedented, something which might well shock the feelings and prejudices of men. The choice of a new King would in fact be the choice of a new dynasty; it would be to wipe out a sentiment as old as the days when the first West-Saxon set foot on British ground; it would be to transfer the Crown of Wessex, of England, of Britain, from the house of Cerdic, of Ecgberht, and of Æthelstan to the house of Godwine the son of Wulfnoth. Men might not as yet be so ready for so momentous a change as they certainly were nine years later. And an irrevocable decision in favour of Harold Possible might well be looked on as a wrong done to a third pos- young sible competitor. The royal house, though on the verge of Eadgar. extinction, was not yet extinct. The Ætheling had left a son, the young Eadgar. The son was undoubtedly not entitled to the same constitutional preference as his father. But in some respects he was a more promising candidate than his father. Like the renowned Bastard himself, he was little, but he would grow. If a vacancy happened at

&lt;sup>1</sup> See above, p. 188.

OHAP. IX. once, his claims could hardly be pressed. But the King might live many years, and Eadgar might succeed his great-uncle in all the vigour of early manhood. He was not indeed, like his father, an Englishman born, the son of an English King by an English mother. But then he might be, as his father had not been, brought up with the feelings of an Englishman, of a destined ruler of England. Nine years before the death of Eadward, men might well deem that it was not expedient, by any premature declaration in favour of the great Earl, to cut off the chances of a succession in many ways so desirable as that of the young Ætheling. If King Eadward lived long enough to make Eadgar's succession possible and expedient, that succession might, like that of his father, form a better check to the ambition of William than the succession of Harold. On the whole then it is perhaps safer not to suppose act, but a general understanding in favour

Probably no formal any formal act of the Witan on behalf of Harold. The circumstances of the case may be explained by supposing that Eadward promised Harold his recommendation in of Harold, case of his own death during Eadgar's childhood. It would be a sort of understood thing that, in case of such an event, the Earl of the West-Saxons would be a candidate for the Crown with every chance of success. As Harold's renown increased, as the chances of Eadward's life grew weaker, as Eadgar's incapacity became more and more manifest, men would look with more and more certainty to the great Earl as their future King.1 Without any formal decree, he would, by common consent, step into the position, or more than the position, of a born Ætheling, and he would find himself insensibly sharing e powers, and even the titles, of royalty. And we cannot one. ix. rubt that the great rival beyond sea was carefully watchg every step of this process. If we realize that Harold-1e Duke of the English—was virtually, if not formally, the esignated successor to the Crown, we can still better nderstand the eagerness of William to obtain by any aeans the Earl's recognition of his claims. It was not nerely to bind the most powerful man in the land to his cause; it was to obtain what was virtually an abdication from one who was virtually the destined heir.

&lt;sup>1</sup> De Inv. c. 14. "Quem [Haroldum] indigense præ cæteris postulabant et ardenter sitiebant post sanctum Regem Edwardum, ipsius morum et vitæ hæredem. Quod quidem divina miseratione processu temporis videre meruerunt qui tunc presentes fuerunt." When the Waltham writer wrote. " Eadwardus Simplex " had become a canonized saint.

The famous oath of Harold is so uncertain as to its date Harold and all its circumstances that it might be treated without now chief impropriety at almost any stage of my narrative. as it is so uncertain, as it is recorded by no contemporary English writer, I prefer to put off its consideration till it is convenient to take up again the thread of Norman affairs, , to examine fully into William's claims, and to describe his preparations to assert those claims. Meanwhile we have to see how Harold ruled over England, now that he was without an equal competitor within the land. Save the shires ruled by the turbulent Ælfgar, the government of all England was now divided between himself and his brothers; and there was now nothing but the life of the reigning King between him and the English Crown.

But, England. 1057-1066.

CHAPTER X.

THE REIGN OF EADWARD FROM THE DEATH OF THE ÆTHELING

TO THE DEATH OF THE KING.<sup>1</sup>

1057-1066.

§ 1. The Ecclesiastical Administration of Earl Harold. 1058-1062.

Dominant position of Harold.

WE thus see Harold at the greatest height of real power which he ever attained while still a subject. He was Earl of the West-Saxons and principal counsellor of

<sup>1</sup> The authorities for this chapter are essentially the same as those for the last. With regard to the Chronicles, it may be noticed that the Abingdon Chronicle, which must be looked on as in some degree hostile to Godwine, is in no sort hostile to Harold. The Peterborough Chronicler, who seems rather to keep himself for great occasions, is rather meagre during this period. As Welsh matters are still prominent, the Welsh Chronicles have still to be consulted, and, towards the end of the period, the Northern Sagas again become of some little importance. But the characteristic of the period is the prominence of ecclesiastical affairs, which brings several local and legendary writers into a position of some consequence. Thus, for the history of Westminster, the tales of Æthelred of Rievaux and his followers have to be compared with the authentic narratives of contemporary chroniclers, and, as Harold's great foundation comes within these years, we now begin to make use of the local Waltham writers. The main facts and fictions belonging to the local Waltham history are found in the two tracts, De Inventione Sanctæ Crucis and Vita Haroldi, which were first published by M. Francisque Michel in his Chroniques Anglo-Normandes (Rouen, 1840). From these I endeavoured in 1857 to put together the early history of Waltham, and of Harold in relation to Waltham, in a paper in the Transactions of the Essex Archeological Society, vol. ii. p. 34. But M. Michel's editions are by no means accurate, and of the De Inventione he left out many chapters altogether. I was therefore led into some errors of detail. Since that time, a perfect edition of the De Inventione has been published, with a Preface, by Professor Stubbs (Oxford, 1861). The Vita

King, and he was, in all probability, already looked on CHAP. X. the practical heir presumptive to the Crown. Three other at Earldoms were in the hands of his three brothers. e greatness of the House of Godwine seemed now to be ly established. Save for a single moment, and that probly during Harold's absence from England, the authority Harold and his family remained untouched till quite the d of Eadward's reign. The first few years of this Predomieriod form a time of unusual quiet, a time in which, as is ecclesiastisual in times of quiet, our attention is almost wholly cal affairs. ecupied with ecclesiastical affairs. The great Earl now Harold in ppears as something like an ecclesiastical reformer, as the Church. founder, a pilgrim, the fast friend of one holy Bishop, rightful or wrongful disputant against another Prelate of less renown. But we have evidence that care for the Haroldi was written after 1205. In its essence, as regards the main facts of English history, it is a mere romance, but, like other local romances, it has its value for points of local description, and even for purely local facts. The De Inventione is a work of higher character. It was written by an anonymous Canon of Waltham, who was born in 1119, who entered the College in 1124, who was made a Canon before 1144, and who wrote after 1177, when he lost his prebend at the change in the foundation of Waltham under Henry the Second. This tract contains a good deal of legend, but no romance. The author writes in evident good faith, and with a manifest. desire to be fair and accurate. He repeats the legends of his house as he heard them from his childhood; he was inclined, like the rest of his contemporaries, to see, and even to expect, miracles where we see only natural causes. But, making the necessary deductions on these scores, he is distinctly more trustworthy than the average of local historians. On his general character as an historian, and especially on the miraculous element in his narrative, see the remarks in Professor Stubbs' Preface, p. xxvii.

As we have to deal with Westminster and Waltham, we have also to deal in a less degree with Wells and Worcester, two churches which figure prominently in the ecclesiastical history of these years. For Wells we have Gisa's own narrative of his controversy with Harold, in the "Ecclesiastical Documents" published by the Camden Society. For Worcester we have the Life of its great Bishop Saint Wulfstan, by William of Malmesbury, in the second volume of Anglia Sacra, and the shorter Life by the contemporary Heming. This last is given in Old-English in Hearne's edition of Heming's Worcester Cartulary (a book which ought to be reprinted), p. 403, and in Latin in the first volume of Anglia Sacra.

CHAP. x. Church did not occupy the whole of the attention of Earl Harold. The Earldom of Wessex and the Kingdom of England had still to be watched over; and the candidate for a Crown which was likely to be disputed by the Duke of the Normans kept a diligent eye on all that was going on in the lands beyond the sea.

Harold's pilgrimage to Rome. 10583

Harold, like Cnut and like a crowd of other persons great and small, fell in with the popular devotion of the day with regard to pilgrimages. The Earl of the West-Saxons went to pray at the tombs of the Apostles, and, though the date of his pilgrimage is not absolutely certain, there are strong reasons for believing that it happened in the year following the deaths of the Ætheling and the

the politics of the French Princes

Earls Leofric and Ralph.1 But Harold, like Cnut, did not, even while engaged in this holy work, wholly forget his own interests or the interests of his friends and his He studies country. He had, we are told, long been watching the condition, the policy, and the military force of the princes of France, among whom we cannot doubt that the Duke of the Normans came in for the largest share of his attention. He therefore took the opportunity of his pilgrimage to go through France, and by personal examination to make himself thoroughly master of the politics of the land.2 His name was well known in the country; he was doubtless received everywhere with honour; he did not go on till he had gained such a thorough insight into all that he needed to know that no deception could for the future be practised upon him. This description is vague and dark, no doubt purposely vague and dark; but it doubtless veils a good deal. One longs to know whether Harold was at this time personally received at the Court of Rouen, and what was the general result of his inquiries into the policy of his great rival. And the question at once forces itself upon the mind, Was this the CHAP. X. time of Harold's famous oath or homage to William? Did anything happen on this journey which formed the germ out of which grew the great accusation brought against him by his rival? I reserve the full discussion of all these questions for another occasion; but on the whole it seems more likely that the event, whatever it was, on which the charge of perjury against Harold was founded, took place at some time nearer to the death of Eadward.

When Harold had finished his political inquiries in Harold at France, he continued his religious journey to Rome. If I am right in the date which I assign to his pilgrimage, he found the Holy See in the possession of a Pontiff whom the Church has since agreed to brand as an usurper. Early in this year died Pope Stephen the Ninth, otherwise Frederick Stephen of Lotharingia, Abbot of Monte Casino, after a reign of Pope. only one year. On his death, Mincius, Bishop of Velletri 1057-1058. and Cardinal, was placed in an irregular manner on the the Tenth pontifical throne by the influence of the Counts of Pope. Tusculum.<sup>2</sup> He took the name of Benedict the Tenth. The Cardinals seem not to have acknowledged him; Hildebrand—the first time that great name occurs in our history—obtained the consent of the Empress Agnes to a new and more canonical election. In the next April Nicolas the Benedict was driven out, and the new Pope, Gerard of Pope. Burgundy, Bishop of Florence, was enthroned by the 1059-1061.

&lt;sup>1</sup> All our Chronicles save Abingdon, which is just now silent for a few years, mention the death of Stephen and the accession of Benedict. None of them imply any doubt as to Benedict's legitimacy, but they use three different words to express his appointment. He is "to Papan geset" in Worcester, "gehalgod to Papan" in Peterborough, "gebleteod parto" in Canterbury—in the last entry of that chronicle.

&lt;sup>2</sup> See the Cardinal of Aragon's Life of Nicolas, Muratori, iii. 301. He does not allow Benedict a place in his list. Yet the next Pope who assumed the name, in 1303, was called Benedict the Eleventh. Muratori, iii. 672. On these Popes, see Milman, Latin Christianity, iii. 47.

CHAP. x. name of Nicolas the Second. But, for the space of a year,

Ber.edict grants the pallium to Stigand, 1058; probably through the influence of

Harold.

Benedict had actual possession of the Papal throne, and was seemingly generally recognized in Rome. A Roman, of the house of the famous Consul Crescentius, he was probably more acceptable than a more regularly appointed Pontiff from Lotharingia or Burgundy. Benedict was in all probability the Pope whom Earl Harold found in possession at the time of his pilgrimage. It is certain that Benedict sent to Archbishop Stigand the long delayed ornament of the pallium, the cherished badge of the archiepiscopal dignity.2 One can hardly avoid the surmise that Harold pleaded for his friend, and that the concession to the English Primate was the result of the personal presence of the first of living Englishmen. Stigand was not personally present at Rome; the pallium was sent to him, and most likely Earl Harold himself was its bearer. In this act Harold no doubt thought, and naturally thought, that he was healing a breach, and doing a great service to his Church and country. The evils arising from the doubtful position of Stigand were manifest. That a man should be, in the eye of the Law. Archbishop of Canterbury, and yet that his purely spiritual ministrations should be very generally declined, was an anomaly to which it was desirable to put a stop as soon as might be. Harold would naturally deem that he had done all that could be needed by procuring the solemn recognition of Stigand from the Pope whom he found in actual possession of the Holy See. That Pope Benedict CHAP. x. was himself an usurper, that his ministrations were as irregular as those of Stigand himself, that he could not confer a commission which he did not himself possess, was a canonical subtlety which was not likely to occur to the mind of the English Earl. He could not foresee that an ecclesiastical revolution would so soon hurl Benedict from his throne, and that he and all who clave to him would be branded as schismatics. In fact the re-Effects of cognition of Stigand by Benedict did harm instead of Benedict's good. After Benedict's fall, it became a further charge tion. against Stigand that he had received the pallium from the usurper. For the moment indeed the Archbishop seemed to have regained his proper position. Two Bishopricks Bishops fell vacant in the course of the year, Selsey by the death consecuted by of Heaca, and Rochester, it is not quite clear how. The Stigand. newly appointed Bishops, Æthelric of Selsey and Siward of Rochester, received consecration from a Primate who was now at last held to be in canonical possession.2 The fact is most significant that these were the first and last Bishops whom Stigand consecrated during the reign of Eadward.

¹ Our Chronicles (Worcester and Peterborough) record the fact in nearly the same words under the year 1059; "Her on bisum gears was Nicolaus to Papan georen; se was biscop at Florentie bare burh; and was Benedictus ut adrifen, se was ar Papa." These last words may seem to imply a certain cleaving to Benedict. It is a pity that the strict and orthodox Abingdon writer (see above, p. 343) is silent, as he might have employed some other formula.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Chronn. Wig. Petrib. Cant. 1058. See above, pp. 343, 344. Benedict was "corruptus pecunia," according to John of Peterborough, 1058.

Harold returned to England, having by some means, the Return of exact nature of which is lost in the rhetoric of his panegyrist, escaped the dangers which seem to have specially beset pilgrims on their journey homeward.3 If I am right

- 1 The long-lived Godwine, or the latter of the two Godwines, vanishes in 1046. We hear nothing, as far as I know, of the disposition of the see in the meanwhile. The Godwine who (Chronn. Wig. Petrib.) died in 1061 seems to be a different person, a Suffragan Bishop of Saint Martin's near Canterbury.
- <sup>2</sup> The Chronicles significantly connect the consecration of Æthelric and Siward with the receipt of the pallium by Stigand. The Peterborough writer (1058) seems specially to mark it; "Her on bisum geare forfferde Stephanus Papa, and wæs Benedictus gehalgod to Papan. Se ylca sænde Stigande Arcebiscope pallium hider to lande. And on bisum geare foroferde Heaca biscop on Subseaxan, and Stigand Arcebiscop hadode Ægelric monuc set Christes cyrcean to biscop to Subseazum, and Siward abbot to biscop to Hrofeceastre."
  - 3 Of these dangers we shall hear more distinctly in the case of the r f VOL. II.

CHAP. x. in my conjecture as to the date of his pilgrimage, an event had taken place in his absence which showed the weakness of the government when his strong hand was not nigh to guide it. We are told by a single Chronicler that this Second outlawry and return year Earl Ælfgar was again outlawed, but that he soon of Ælfgar. recovered his Earldom by the help of Gruffydd and of a 1058. Norwegian fleet which came unexpectedly to his help.1

as to the story.

We hear not a word as to the causes or circumstances. Difficulties One is inclined to guess that the story may be merely an accidental repetition, under a wrong year, of Ælfgar's former outlawry three years before.2 It is certainly not likely that Harold would have tamely submitted to so outrageous a breach both of the royal authority and of the national dignity. But to suppose that these events happened during the time of his absence from the country is an explanation of this difficulty quite as easy as to suppose the story to be a mere misconception. One thingat least should be noted. A feud with the House of Leofric, which, in the case of Harold, is a mere matter of surmise, is, in the case of Tostig, distinctly assert > pilgrimage of Tostig in 1061. The Biographer now (410) tells us that Bare "potenti munificentia veneratus sanctorum limina, per medios insichis cautus derisor more suo Dei gratia pervenit ad propria," might have a deeper meaning; the visit to Normandy and the oat be on his return; but the chances are the other way. on his return; but the comments of the control of t ongean mid strees burh Gryffines fultum; and her com scyphere 800 wegan. Hit is langsum to attellane call hu hit gefaren wegan. Siculo, wegan. Hit is langsum to attended to the same of the s "Algarus Merciorum Comes a rege"

>
> "Algarus Merciorum Comes a rege"
>
> Regis Walanorum Griffini juvamine et Norreganicae classis comes classis alm
>
> "Angarus Merciorum Comes a rege"
>
> Regis Walanorum Griffini juvamine et Norreganicae classis alm Regis Walanorum Griffini juvamme or vim suum classis aud que ad illum venerat ex improviso, citò per vim suum comitante de la Regis Walandam que ad illum venerat ex improviso, care peravit." Is this the fleet mysteriously referred to by Tree comitation and the same year? "Classis cum filio Regis Bernach () Conor, quæ ad illum vonce.
>
> peravit." Is this the fleet mysteriously ...
>
> i. 301) under the same year? "Classis cum filio Rogis Dernach ()
>
> """ means Norwegians] cum alienigenis Insularum Orango ()
>
> """ mbigeret sibi regnum orango () peravit." Is this the period of the same year? "Classis come is 301) under the same year? "Classis come bably means Norwegians] cum alienigenis Insularum Orangella Danorum orangella period of the pe de proi. 301) under van bably means Norwegians] cum alienigement bably means Norwegians] cum alienigement or content of the chronical fait ei in re istă." densium et Dublimensum, > contrarius fuit ei in re istâ."
>
> 2 This would apply to the entry in the Chronicle > who marks the repetition of the word by the word
>
> 2 Dut, it
> secundo. lorence. Aras mil may, in his brother's absence, have acted a part towards the rival house which his brother's conciliatory policy would not have approved of. He may also have found himself, in his brother's absence, unable to quell the storm which he had raised. But all speculations of this kind must be quite uncertain. The statement stands before us; we may put our own value on its authority, and we may make our own explanation of the facts, but we cannot get beyond conjecture.

The pilgrimage of Earl Harold may perhaps have suggested to the active Bishop Ealdred a longer pilgrimage still. That diligent Prelate was at this time busy about many matters. Gloucester, the frontier city on the Ecclesiasti-Severn, the usual mid-winter seat of the national Councils, of Glouceshad just received a special ornament from his munificence. ter. The city had been in early times the seat of an Abbey of Abbey of nuns, which came to an end during the confusions which 681-767. fell on the Mercian Kingdom towards the end of the eighth century.2 The house then became a College of secular Secular In the College, 767 1-1022. priests,3 which lasted till the days of Cnut. same spirit in which Cnut himself substituted monks for Benedicsecular canons in the Church of Saint Eadmund at Bury, Abbey, Wulfstan, Archbishop of York and Bishop of Worcester, Cathedral made the same change in the Church of Saint Peter at Church, Gloucester.<sup>5</sup> The rule of Saint Benedict was now rigidly <sup>1541-1868</sup>.

When Morkere heads the Northumbrian revolt in 1065, the Biographer (p. 421) says of the sons of Ælfgar, "inter eos regize stirpis pueros et eumdem Ducem Tostinum ex veteri simultate odio [odia?] erant." The "regia stirps" can refer only to some possible descent of the House of Leofric from ancient Mercian Kings. (Cf. vol. i. p. 456.) There is no sign of any connexion between them and the West-Saxon royal family.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Hist. Mon. S. Petri Glouc. (ed. Hart), i. 1. et seqq. Cf. vol. i. p. 39.

&lt;sup>3</sup> Ib. i. 7. "Sub potestate sæculari, usque ad tempus Wolstani episcopi Wygorniensis... mirificè tradebatur."

<sup>4</sup> See vol. i. p. 485.

&lt;sup>5</sup> Hist. Mon. Glouc, i. 8. "Anno Domini millesimo vicesimo secundo

CHAP. X. Abbot Eadric.

Ealdred rebuilds and consecrates the church. and appoints Wulfstan Abbot. 1058.

carried out, and one Eadric became the first Abbot. government lasted for more than thirty-six years, but his 1022-1058. local reputation is not good, as he is charged with wasting the property of the monastery.1 Meanwhile the bounty of Ealdred rebuilt the church of Saint Peter from its foundations, and it now stood ready for consecration. Abbot Eadric most opportunely died at this time, so that Ealdred was able at once to furnish his new minster with a new chief ruler. He consecrated the church, and bestowed the Ealdred . restores the see of Ramsbury to Hermakes the pilgrimage to Jerusalem.

abbatial benediction on Wulfstan, a monk of his own church of Worcester, on whom, by the King's licence, he conferred the vacant office.2 It was just at this time that Bishop Hermann came back from Saint Omer. Ealdred, charged with the care of three dioceses, restored Ramsbury, the poorest and least distinguished, to its former owner.3 mann and Worcester was no doubt entrusted to the care of Æthelwig;4 of any arrangements for the benefit of Hereford we hear nothing. Ealdred then undertook a journey which no

> Wolstanus Episcopus Wygorniensis, qui postea factus est Archiepiscopus Eboracensis, concedente Rege Cnuto, Duce Danorum, qui Ecclesiam Sanctam exaltavit, et libertates suas antiquas renovavit et promovit, ut dicit Petrus Pictavensis, hic Wolstanus clericos qui ecclesiam Sancti Petri antea rexerant et custodierant, sub protectione Dei et Apostolorum Petri et Pauli et regula beati Benedicti in eadem ecclesia regulariter collocavit." In this case the canons seem not to have been driven out, but to have taken the monastic vows on themselves. This was partly the case at Bury. See vol. i. p. 486, > <sup>1</sup> Hist. Glouc. i. 8. "Multa bona dissipavit." Two lordships had to be sold to make good the losses caused by him.

> <sup>2</sup> Chron. Wig. 1058. "On pam ilcan gere Ealdred bisceop halgode beet mynster on Gleawcestre be he sylf geforfode, Gode to lofe and Sce Petre." Florence mentions that the church was built by Ealdred "a fundamentis," and adds, "postea Regis licentiâ, Wlstanum Wigornensem monachum à se ordinatum, Abbatem constituit ibidem." The local history (p. q), which calls him Wilstanus, gives the same account. The prominence here given to the Bishop of the Diocese is remarkable; we hear nothing of any election by the monks, but only of an Abbot chosen by the Bishop and confirmed by the King. One might fancy that Wulfstan, as founder, had retained some special rights of patronage over the monastery of Gloucester.

<sup>3</sup> Fl. Wig. 1058. See above, p. 406. <sup>4</sup> See above, p. 372. English Bishop had ever before undertaken, which indeed THAP. x. we have not heard of as undertaken by any eminent Englishman of that generation, except by the repentant Swegen. Duke Robert of Normandy and Count Fulk of Anjou had visited the tomb of Christ, but Cnut and Harold had not gone further than the threshold of the Apostles. But Ealdred now undertook the longer journey; he passed through Hungary,2 a country which the negotiations for the return of the Ætheling had doubtless opened to English imaginations, and at last reached the holy goal of his pilgrimage. He went, we are told, with such worship as none ever went before him; his devotion was edifying and his gifts were splendid. A chalice of gold, of five marks weight, and of wondrous workmanship, was the offering of the renowned English Prelate at the most sacred spot on earth.3

The next year is one singularly barren of English Barrenness events. The Chronicles literally record nothing of greater of events in the year importance than the fact that the steeple of Peterborough 1059. minster was hallowed.4 The zeal and bounty of Abbot Leofric<sup>5</sup> was busily at work. And from other sources all that is to be learned is the appointment of a new Abbot of Evesham. That appointment however was in some

- <sup>1</sup> After the consecration at Gloucester, says the Worcester Chronicler (1058), "swa ferde to Hierusalem, mid swilcan weordscipe swa nan oder ne dyde ætforan him;" "quod nullus," adds Florence, "archiepiscoporum vel episcoporum Anglise estenus dinoscitur fecisse."
  - <sup>2</sup> "Per Ungariam," says Florence.
- Chron. Wig. "And hine sylfne beer Gode betæhte, and wurölic lac eac geoffrode to ures Drihtenes byrgene, best was an gylden calic, on fif marcon swife wundorlices geworces." The chronicler, just as at the time of the mission to Köln, clearly rejoices in the splendour and bounty of his own Bishop.
- Oddly enough, it is the Worcester and not the Peterborough Chronicler who records this purely local fact; "on bisan gere was se stypel gehalgad æt Burh on xvi. kal. Novemb."

&lt;sup>5</sup> See above, p. 350.

respects a remarkable one. Abbot Mannig, the architect, CHAP. X. Resignapainter, and general proficient in the arts, had been tion of smitten by paralysis, and had resigned his office. He Abbot Mannig lived however in honour for seven years longer, and died, of Evesham so it was said, on the same day and hour as King Eadward.1 1050. His death. His successor was Æthelwig, the monk who acted for Jan. 5, Ealdred when absent from his diocese, and who was now Provost of the monastery of Evesham.<sup>2</sup> As in the case of Wulfstan at Gloucester, we hear nothing distinctly of any Abbot. April 23, 1059.

Æthelwig the King, recommending Æthelwig for the Abbacy. The King approves, and, by his order, Ealdred gives the abbatial benediction to Æthelwig at Gloucester in the Easter Gemót holden in that city.3 Of the new Prelate we shall hear again more than once.

capitular election. The retiring Abbot seems to nominate his successor. Pleading his illness as an excuse for not coming personally, he sends certain monks and laymen to

Perhaps (see Mr. Macray's note on p. 87) the reckoning of seven years is wrong, and the date was really 1058, before Ealdred left England; or the wrong season may be given (though this seems hardly likely, and the usual places of the Gemots were sometimes departed from); or the ceremony may have been really performed by some other Bishop, and

&lt;sup>1</sup> Chron. Mon. Evesham. p. 88. "Transiit quoque vir ille Mannius eâdem nocte et hora qua Rex gloriosus Æduuardus, festivitate scilicet sancts: Epiphanise Domini." But Eadward died on the eve of the Epiphany not on the Epiphany itself.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Ib. 87. "Nunc sub eo jure præpositi totius abbatiæ hujus curam agebat."

&lt;sup>3</sup> There is here a chronological difficulty. The Evesham Chronicle fixes the date to April 23, 1059. Mannig died on the same day as Eadward, that is January 5, 1066; seven years, so the historian says, after his resignation. This makes the year of Æthelwig's appointment 1050. For the day and place we are told (88), "Rex . . . fecit eum apud Glocestre, ubi tunc curiam suam tenebat, coram multis principibus hujus patrise ab Aldredo Archiepiscopo honorabiliter in paschali sollemnitate die festivitatis sancti Georgii martyris consecrari." Now it is hardly likely that Ealdred, who had left for Jerusalem seemingly not very early in the year before, could have been again in England so soon as Saint George's Day, 1059. Also it was not the Easter but the Christmas festival which was commonly held at Gloucester. That Ealdred is called Archbishop before his time is a common slip.

This year however was by no means an unimportant one CHAP. X. in English history. It was now that, as all our Chronicles Deposition of Pope so carefully note, the intruding Benedict was deposed, and Benedict; Nicolas succeeded to the Papacy. The recognition of Stigand on the posilasted no longer than the temporary recognition of Benedict. Stigand. When the Pontiff from whom he had received his pallium 1059. sank to the position of an Antipope and schismatic, the English Primate sank again to the anomalous position in which he had been before. His ministrations were again avoided, even in the quarter which one would have least expected to find affected by such scruples. Earl Harold himself, when he needed the performance of a great ecclesiastical ceremony, now shrank from having it performed by the hands of the Primate who, in all political matters, was his friend and fellow-worker.

For we have now reached the date of an event which Harold's closely binds together the ecclesiastical and the secular waltham history of the time. It was in the year following the ex-consecrated. pulsion of Benedict that Earl Harold brought to perfection May 3, the minster which he had doubtless for some time been engaged in rearing on his East-Saxon lordship of Waltham. Whether any portion of the fabric still existing is the work of its great founder is a matter of antiquarian controversy on which I will not here enlarge. But whether the existing nave, or any part of it, be Harold's work or not, the historic interest of that memorable spot remains in either case the same. As we go on we shall see Waltham win for itself an abiding fame as the last restingplace of its great founder; at present we have to look to the foundation itself as a most remarkable witness to that founder's wisdom as well as his bounty.1 The importance Nature and of the foundation of Waltham in forming an estimate, both of the founof Harold's personal character and of the ecclesiastical dation position of England at the time, has been altogethe slurred over through inattention to the real character of the foundation. Every writer of English history, as far a I know, has wholly misrepresented its nature. It is constantly spoken of as an Abbey, and its inhabitants as monks.1 Waltham and its founder thus get mixed w with the vulgar crowd of monastic foundations, the crestions in many cases of a real and enlightened piety, but in many cases also of mere superstition or mere fashion. The great ecclesiastical foundation of Earl Harold was some-Change of thing widely different. Harold did not found an Abbey; Waltham did not become a religious house till Henry the the Second. Second, liberal of another man's purse, destroyed Harold's foundation by way of doing honour to the new Martyr of Canterbury. Harold founded a Dean and secular Canons; these King Henry drove out, and put in an Abbot and Austin Canons in their place.2 Harold's foundation, in short, was an enlargement of the original small foundation of Tofig the Proud.3 Tofig had built a church for the reception of the miraculous crucifix which had been found at Lutegarsbury, and had made an endowment for two priests only. The Holy Rood of Waltham became an object of popular worship and pilgrimage, and probably the small settlement originally founded by Tofig in the middle of the forest was already growing into a considerable town.

Ealdred's name may have been carelessly inserted because he was known <sup>1</sup> See above, p. 42. to be Bishop of the Diocese at the time.

CHAP. X. generally misunderstood.

foundation by Henry 1177.

&lt;sup>1</sup> When I say that this mistake is found in Sharon Turner (Hist. of England, i. 79, 81, 84), in Sir Francis Palgrave (Hist. of Anglo-Sax. 378, 388), and in Lappenberg (p. 556 of the original, ii. 302 of Mr. Thorpe's translation), it is not wonderful that it is found also in Thierry (lib. iii.) as well as in Dr. Vaughan (Revolutions in English History, i. 298), in M. Emile de Bonnechose (ii. 283), and in Mr. St. John (ii. 275). Yet, without looking to the local historians, or to the writers who record the change of foundation under Henry the Second, they need only have turned to William of Malmesbury, iii. 247; "Ecclesiam ... canonicis impleverat."

See R. Hoveden. Scriptt. p. Bed. 320. Rad. de Dic. X Scriptt. c. 598. R. Wend. ii. 387. Gervase (X Scriptt. 1434). Cf. Vita Haroldi (Chron. A. N. <sup>8</sup> See vol. i. p. 590. ii. 164).

he estate of Tofig at Waltham had been lost by his son THAP. X. Ethelstan, and was confiscated to the Crown. I have Æthelstan lready suggested that Æthelstan, the son of a Danish father, and his nay not improbably have been one of the party which op-son Esegar. osed the election of Eadward, and most of whose members ruffered more or less on that account.2 But the royal disavour which fell on Æthelstan did not extend to his son Esegar, who held the office of Staller from a very early period of Eadward's reign till the Norman invasion.3 But the lord-Acquisition ship of Waltham was granted by the King to his brother- by Harold. in-law Earl Harold,4 with whom it evidently became a favourite dwelling-place. The Earl now rebuilt the small Herebuilds church of Tofig on a larger and more splendid scale, no doubt calling to his aid all the resources which were supplied by the great contemporary development of architecture in Normandy.5 One who so diligently noted all that was going on in contemporary Gaul would doubtless keep his eye on such matters also. When the church was built, he enriched it with precious gifts and relics of all the Church.

&lt;sup>1</sup> De Inv. c. 14. There is something strange in the statement of the Waltham writer that Æthelstan did not succeed to all his father's estates, but only to those attached to the stallership.

See above, p. 63.

De Inv. c. 14. "Adelstanus, pater Esegari qui stalre inventus est in Anglize conquisitione à Normannis." He was staller as early as 1044, as appears from a writ in Cod. Dipl. iv. 221, where he is addressed along with Bishop Ælfwold, who died in that year. He signs many charters, among others the Waltham charter of 1062 (Cod. Dipl. iv. 159), with the title of "regise procurator aulæ," equivalent, according to Professor Stubbs, to "dapifer." See his note to De Inv. c. 14.

&lt;sup>4</sup> De Inv. c. 14. So in the Waltham Charter (iv. 155), "Cuidam meorum Comitum, onomate Haroldo, quamdam terram que antiquitàs ab incolis illius loci nuncupatur Waltham, hæreditario jure concessi."

&lt;sup>5</sup> The building of the church is affirmed in the Charter (iv. 155); "In prescripto loco monasterium ad laudem Domini nostri Jesu Christi et sancte Crucis construxit . . . fundatum . . monasterium . dedicari fecit." So De Inv. 16; "Venusto enim admodum opere a fundamentis constructam [ecclesiam]." The romantic Biographer (p. 161) is much fuller in his description. On the application of the word "monasterium" to a secular church, see vol. i. p. 472.

GEAF. X. sorts, some of which he had himself brought personally He founds from Rome on his pilgrimage. Lastly, he increased the number of clergy attached to the church from two to a much larger number, a Dean and twelve Canons, besides several inferior officers. He richly endowed them with lands, and contemplated larger endowments still.

Nature of his founda-

This is something very different from the foundation of a monastery. Harold finds a church on his estate the seat of a popular worship; he rebuilds the fabric and increases the number of its ministers. The order of his proceedings is very clearly traced out in the royal charter by which the foundation was confirmed two years later. The founder of a monastery first got together his monks, and gave them some temporary habitation; the church and the other buildings then grew up gradually. The church of a monastery exists for the sake of the monks, but in a secular foundation the canons or other clergy may be said to exist for the sake of the church. So at Waltham, Harold first rebuilt the church; he then secured to it the elder endowment of Tofig; he had it consecrated, and enriched it with relics and other gifts; he, last of all, after the consecration, set about his plan for increasing the number of clergy attached to it.3 Tofig's two priests of course were still there to discharge the duties of the place in the meanwhile. And the clergy whom Harold placed in his newly founded minster were not monks, but secular priests, each man living on his own prebend, and some of CHAP. X. them, it would seem, married. Education also occupied a Harold's prominent place in the magnificent and enlightened scheme education. of the great Earl. The Chancellor or Lecturer—for the word Schoolmaster conveys too humble an idea—filled a dignified place in the College, and the office was bestowed Adelard by the founder on a distinguished man from a foreign of Lüttich. We have seen throughout that, stout English land. patriot as Harold was, he was never hindered by any narrow insular prejudice from seeking merit wherever he could find it. Harold had seen something of the world; he had visited both France and Italy; but it was not however from any land of altogether foreign speech that '- he sought for coadjutors in his great work. As in the case of so many appointments of Bishops, so now, in appointing an important officer in his own College, Harold, when he looked beyond our own island, looked in the first place to the lands of kindred Teutonic speech.<sup>2</sup> As Ælfred had brought over Grimbald and John the Old-Saxon, so now Harold brought over Adelard of Lüttich to be the head of the educational department of his foundation, and to be his general adviser in the whole work.3

&lt;sup>1</sup> See Appendix EE.

&lt;sup>2</sup> The nature of the foundation, the offices of its several members, and the discipline to be observed, are set forth at large in the 15th chapter of the De Inventione, and are fully commented on by Professor Stubbs in his Preface, pp. xiii. xiv.

&lt;sup>3</sup> The charter first mentions the building of the church, then adds, "Primum concedens ei terram que vocatur Norblande, unde ecclesiam villæ antiquiths dotatam invenit;" then comes the consecration, then the ornaments and the relies; then "Quid plura! suæ denique conditionis non immemor, ibidem quorumdam catervulam fratrum secundum auctoritatem sanctorum patrum canonicæ regulæ [canonical, as opposed to monastic] subjectam constituit." Cod. Dipl. iv. 155.

The legendary Biographer very well describes the object of the foundation (pp. 160-161); "At vir magnificus, locum et loci cultum omnimodis cupiens cum suis cultoribus sublimare, novam ibi basilicam fabricare, ministrorum augere numerum, redditusque eorum proponit ampliare; utque celebriorem fama, illustriorem clericorum frequentia, coelestibus nobilitatum muneribus, locum terrigenis exhibet, scholas ibidem instituere . . . dispositione satagebat prudenti."

See above, p. 41.

<sup>3</sup> On Adelard see De Inv. c. 15, and Stubbs, Preface, p. ix. In c. 25 the author calls Adelard, "institutor et ordinator præsentis ecclesiæ." The Biographer (pp. 155-9) has a legend, which makes him a physician, sent over by the Emperor to cure Harold of a paralysis, which baffled the skill of English doctors. It baffled the skill of Adelard also, but, being a devout man, he recommends the Holy Rood of Waltham as the best resource, and by its virtue Harold is cured. Harold then founds the College, and puts Adelard at the head of the school. All this is made to follow Harold's great Welsh campaign of 1063. The writer may have confounded it with the campaign of 1055. Harold, as we shall see, did suffer from the gout.

Henry the Third, one of the truest and most enlightened of ecclesiastical reformers, in bringing several of the churches of his dominions into better discipline. He now came over to England, became a Canon and Lecturer at Waltham, and, using his genuine Teutonic liberty, handed on his office to his son.

Harold a friend of the secular clergy.

Long continuance of the struggle between regulars and seculars,

The truth is, as we have already seen several indications. that Harold, so far from being an ordinary founder of a monastery, was a deliberate and enlightened patron of the secular clergy. He is described in the foundation-charter of his College as their special and active friend.2 The old struggle which had been going on from the days of Dunstan was going on still, and it went on long after. Harold, like the elder Eadward in his foundation at Winchester, like Æthelstan in his foundation at Milton. preferred the seculars, the more practically useful class, the class less removed from ordinary human and national feelings. In his eyes even a married priest was not a monster of vice. To make such a choice in the monastic reign of Eadward, when the King on his throne was well nigh himself a monk, was worthy of Harold's lofty and independent spirit; it was another proof of his steady and clear-sighted patriotism. In truth, of the two great foundations of this reign, Earl Harold's College at Waltham stands in distinct opposition, almost in distinct rivalry, to King Eadward's Abbey at Westminster. And it is not unlikely that Harold's preference for the secular clergy may have had some share in bringing upon him the obloquy which he undergoes at the hands of so many ecclesiastical writers. It was not only the perjurer, the usurper, but the man whose hand was closed against the monk and open to the married priest, who won the hatred of Norman and monastic writers. With the coming of the Normans the monks finally triumphed. Monasticism, in one form or another, was triumphant for some ages. Harold's own foundation was perverted from his original design; his secular priests were expelled to make room for those whom the fashion of the age looked on as holier than they. At last the tide turned; men of piety and munificence learned that the monks had got enough, and from the fourteenth century onwards, the bounty of founders took the same direction which it had taken under Æthelstan and Harold. Colleges, educational and otherwise, in the Universities and out of them, now again arose alongside of the monastic institutions which had now thoroughly fallen from their first love. In short, the foundation of Witness of Waltham, instead of being simply slurred over as a to Harold's monastic foundation of the ordinary kind, well deserves character. to be dwelt upon, both as marking an æra in our ecclesiastical history, and also as bearing the most speaking witness to the real character of its illustrious founder. The care and thoughtfulness, as well as the munificence, displayed in every detail of the institution, the zeal for the advancement of learning as well as for mere ecclesiastical splendour, the liberal patronage of even foreign merit, all unite to throw a deep interest round Earl Harold's minster, and they would of themselves be enough to win him a high place among the worthies of England. No wonder then that this noble foundation became in a peculiar manner identified with its founder; no wonder that it was to Waltham that he went for prayer and meditation in the great crisis of his life, that it was at Waltham that his body found its last resting-place, that at Waltham his memory still lived, fresh and cherished, while elsewhere calumny had fixed itself upon his glorious name.

&lt;sup>1</sup> De Inv. 25. His son Peter was Master when the author was a loy. He was a "fons uberrimus disciplinis doctrinam scaturiens."

&lt;sup>2</sup> Cod. Dipl. iv. 155. "Ut non solum Dei culter efficiatur, verum etiam canonicae regulæ strengus institutor fleri credatur."

wonder too that the local relic became a centre of national reverence; that the object of Harold's devotion became the badge and rallying-point of English national life: that the "Holy Rood"—the Holy Rood of Waltham—became the battle-cry of England, the shout which urged her sons to victory at Stamfordbridge, and which still rose to heaven, as long as an English arm had life, in that last battle where England and her King were overthrown.

The church consecrated May 3, 1060.

At what time the foundation of Waltham was begun is not recorded, but the church was finished and consecrated in the year 1060, the ceremony being performed on the appropriate day of the Invention of the Cross.1 minster was hallowed in the presence of King Eadward and the Lady Eadgyth, and of most of the chief men the land, clerical and lay.2 But the chief actor in the day's rite was neither the Bishop of the diocese nor the Metropolitan of the province. As Wulfstan had be brought from York to consecrate Cnut's minster on Assa dun, so this time also a Northern Primate came to secrate Harold's minster at Waltham. The position Stigand, bettered for the moment through the pallium of

Ne not in

Cynenics

See Appendi

DSecra

by Cynesige, Archbishop of York.

In 1857 I showed that the year must have been either log by Benedict, had fallen with the position of the 20 who had recognized him. In orthodox eyes he was an usurper and a schismatic.4 Either this feeling extended itself to the mind of Harold himself, or rofessor Stubbs has now inconscient, of persons present at the Professor Stubbs shows that the list of persons present at the Professor Stubbs shows that the list of persons present at the person that the persons the persons that the persons the persons that the persons that the persons the persons the persons the persons that the persons th 2 Professor Stubbs shows that the professor stubbs shows t tion, as given in the De Inventione, c. 10, ... to the Charter. The author evidently thought that it was district was fallen in the list of the Charter.

Waltham at the time. But he has thus fallen in the list of the charter. tion, as given in the time. But he has thus fallen day he introduces Walter and Gisa as Bigh ope, while the time of time o signed at Waltham at the time. But no signed at Waltham at the time. But no signed at Waltham at the time. But no Bishops into takes, as he introduces Walter as such but but which which which the signed at Waltnam takes, as he introduces Walter and takes, as he introduces Walter and but but which which the last calls Gisa Bishop of Chichester instead of they wanted takes, as he introduction 1062, and therefore sign the charter as the line of the local section section is section to the local section of the local section section in the local section section is section to the local section section

See vol. i. p. 471.

The Waltham writer (De Inv. c. 16) goes so the well would tune vacabat sedes Cantuarise.

and it prudent to yield to the prejudices of others. CHAP. X. tigand was not called upon to officiate. It is not likely wat William, the Bishop of the diocese, was excluded on ecount of his Norman birth, as we find no traces of any ach jealousy of him at other times. The occasion was oubtless looked on as one of such dignity as to call for the ministrations of a Prelate of the highest rank. The new ninster of Waltham, with its pillars fresh from the mason's rand, and its altars blazing with the gorgeous gifts of its ounder, was hallowed in all due form by Cynesige, Archbishop of York.

The church was thus completed and consecrated; but it The Conseemingly took Harold two years longer fully to arrange Charter. the details of his foundation, and to settle the exact extent 1062. of the lands which were to form its endowment. At the end of that time the royal charter which has been already quoted confirmed all the gifts and arrangements of the founder.

The Prelate who had played the most important part Death of in the great ceremony at Waltham did not long survive Cynesige. that event. Shortly before the close of the year Arch-Dec. 22, bishop Cynesige died at York, and was buried at Peterborough.1 Communication between distant places must have been easier in those times than we are at first sight inclined to think, for it appears that the news of the event which took place at York was known and acted upon at Gloucester only three days afterwards. We read that his successor was appointed on Christmas-Day.2

&lt;sup>1</sup> Chronn. Wig. and Petrib. 1060. Flor. Wig. 1060. Hugo Candidus (Sparke, 45). This last writer is loud in Cynesige's praise, and records his gifts to Peterborough, which the Lady Eadgyth took away.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Fl. Wig. 1060. "Wigornensis episcopus Aldredus ad archiepiscopatum in Nativitate Domini eligitur." It may perhaps be thought that such speed is impossible, and that "eligitur" must be taken of a capitular election at York on Christmas-Day, which would be confirmed by the King and his

CHAP. X. Now the appointment would regularly be made in the

Walter, Bishop of Hereford.

Witenagemót, and the Witenagemôt would, according to the custom of this reign, be holding its Christmas sitting at Gloucester. Such speed would have been impossible if Ealdred succeeds him. Dec. 25. 1060.

the Witan had not been actually in session when the vacancy occurred. The absence of Cynesige is of course explained by his mortal illness. But his successor was on the spot, and he was no doubt on the alert to take care of his own interests. Ealdred, the Bishop of the diocese in which the Assembly was held, was raised to the metropolitan see which had been so often held in conjunction with that of Worcester. Indeed, Ealdred himself, who had not scrupled to hold three Bishopricks at once, for a while followed the vicious example of his predecessors and retained the two sees in plurality. His successor in the see of Worcester was not appointed till two years later. But the church of Hereford, which Ealdred had administered for the last two years, now received a pastor of its own. That Bishoprick was given to Walter, a Lotharingian by birth, and a Chaplain of the Lady Eadgyth.1 Either in this year 1060-1079 or very early in the next2 died Duduc, the Saxon Bishop of > Witan at some later Gemot. We have certainly heard of capitular elections thus confirmed or rejected, in one case at Durham (vol. i. p. 565) and in one case at Canterbury (see above, p. 119); but the grant of the Bishoprick of Hereford to Walter is so clearly connected with the promotion of Ealdred to York that we must suppose the two to have taken place in the same Assembly. I do not know why "eligere" may not be said of the Witan as well as of the Chapter; or, if any one pleases, it is quite possible that enough members of the Church of York may have been present in the Gemôt to go through a canonical election at Gloucester, which the King and his Witan would at once confirm.

> Somersetshire, who had sat at Wells ever since the days of Cnut. His see was given to another Lotharingian, Gisa, a maplain of the King.1 These appointments, taken in con- CHAP. X. >xion with Harold's own appointment of Adelard in his Gisa Bishop of llege at Waltham, must be carefully noticed. The in-Wells. mence of Harold, and with it the close connexion between mgland and Northern Germany, is now at its height.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Flor. Wig. 1060. "Herefordensis præsulatus . . . capellano Edgithæ Reginse Waltero Lotharingo est datus." His writ of appointment is given in Cod. Dipl. iv. 194.

&lt;sup>2</sup> In 1060, according to the Worcester Chronicle and Florence; in 1061 according to the Peterborough Chronicle.

1060-1088.

From one however of the Prelates now appointed the reat Earl hardly met with the gratitude which he deerved. The story is one of the best illustrations of the vay in which stories grow.2 Duduc, the late Bishop of Dispute Wells, had received from King Cnut certain estates as his between Harold and rivate property, among which, strangely enough, we find Gisa. eckoned the Abbey of Gloucester. Duduc, with King Eadward's assent, is said to have made over these estates to his wn church, besides various moveable treasures which he bequeathed on his death-bed. But on the death of Duduc, Earl Harold took possession of all. The new Bishop, looking on this as an injury done to his see, rebuked the Earl both privately and openly, and even meditated a sentence of excommunication against him. He never however ventured on this final step, and Harold, on his election to the Crown, promised both to restore the lands in question and to give others as well. The fulfilment of this promise was hindered by Harold's death, which of course the Bishop represents as a divine judgement. This is Gisa's story, and Gisa's own we do not possess Harold's defence. But it is to be remarked statement of the case. that there is nothing in Gisa's version which at all touches

G g

&lt;sup>1</sup> Flor. Wig. 1060. His writ is given in Cod. Dipl. iv. 195. The local historian of Wells (Ang. Sac. i. 559), with the notions of the fifteenth century, makes Gisa receive his appointment, as well as his consecration, from the Pope; "Hic quum in quadam ambassiata cum aliis à dicto Rege ad Apostolicam Sedem missus fuisset pro quibusdam negotiis conscientiam dicti Regis moventibus, Apostolicus sibi contulit sedem Wellensem." Gisa was born (see his own account, Ecclesiastical Documents, p. 16) at Saint Trudo, a town of the district of Hasbain in the Bishoprick of Lüttich. Florence says of Duduc and Gisa that they were "ambo de Lotharingia oriundi," but Duduc was certainly a Saxon.

&lt;sup>2</sup> On the dispute between Harold and Gisa, see Appendix FF.

CHAP x. any ancient possessions of the see of Wells. He speaks only ' of some private estates which Duduc gave, or wished to give to his church. Gisa does not even charge Harold with seizing anything which had belonged to the see befor Duduc's time; he simply hinders Duduc's gifts and beques from taking effect. Gisa says nothing of any appeal to the King, but simply of an appeal made by himself to the private conscience of Harold. The natural inference s that Harold, as Earl of the country, asserted a legal claim to the lands and other property, that he disputed Dudne's right to dispose of them, and maintained that they fell to the King, or to the Earl as his representative. As Duder was a foreigner, dying doubtless without heirs, it is highly probable that such would really be the law of the case. At all events, as we have no statement from the defendant and a very moderate one from the plaintiff, it is only fair to stop and think whether it is not possible that there may have been something to say on the side of the Earl as well as on that of the Bishop. In any case, the simple statement of Gisa differs widely from the exaggerations of later In their stories we hear how Harold, instead of simply hindering a new acquisition by the Church of Wells, plundered it of its old established possessions. While Earl, he drives the Canons away and reduces them to beggary. As King, he seizes all the estates of the see and drives the Bishop into banishment. All this, I need not say, is utterly inconsistent with Gisa's own narrative and with our other corroborative evidence. The story is an instructive one. By the colouring given to it by Gisa himself, and by the exaggerations which it received in later times, we may learn to look with a good deal of suspicion on all stories of the kind. The principle is that the Church is in all cases to gain and never to lose; a regular and legal opposition to ecclesiastical claims is looked on as no less criminal than one which is altogether fraudulent or violent.

Exaggerations of later writers.

Both our Lotharingian Bishops survived the Conquest; CHAP. X. Gisa survived the Conqueror himself. There is nothing to Later of convict either of them of treason to England; but Gisa at Walter and least does not seem very warm in his patriotism for his adopted country. He is quite ready to forgive William for the Conquest of England in consideration of the help which he gave him in his reformation of the Church of Wells. Walter, on the other hand, is represented, in some accounts, as taking a prominent part in resistance to the Conqueror.2 The tale rests on no good authority, but it could hardly bave been told of one whose conduct was known to have been of a directly opposite kind. On the other hand, as both Walter and Gisa kept their sees till death, they must at least have shown a discreet amount of submission to the new state of things. Walter came, so we are told, to a sad and shameful end,3 but one in which questions of Norman, English, and Lotharingian nationality were in no way concerned. Gisa lived in honour, and died Gisa's in the odour of sanctity, and he fills a prominent place in Wells. the history of the Church of Wells. He found his church, small, poor, served only by four or five Canons, who lived in houses in the town, and who, we are told, doubtless by a figure of speech, had sometimes to beg their bread.4 Gisa obtained various gifts from King Eadward and the Lady Eadgyth, and afterwards from William,<sup>5</sup> and he was , also enabled to buy several valuable possessions for his church.6 But he is most memorable for his attempt to

&lt;sup>1</sup> See his language in pp. 18, 19 of his narrative.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Matth. Paris. Vitt. xxiii. Abb. ii. 47.

&lt;sup>3</sup> Will, Malms. Gest. Pont. Scriptt. p. Bed. 163.

<sup>4</sup> Hist. Ep. Som. 16—19. "Tunc ecclesiam sedis mess perspiciens esse mediocrem, clericos quoque quatuor vel quinque abeque claustro et refectorio esse ibidem. . . Quos publice vivere et inhoneste mendicare necesmariorum inopia antea coegerat." See Appendix FF.

Among other things, he bought Combe from "Arsere" (p. 18), who on reference to Domesday (89) appears as Azor, seemingly the same Thegn of whom Earl Godwine bought Woodchester in Gloucestershire. See 1059.

CHAP. x. introduce at Wells, as Leofric had done at Exeter, the rule of his countryman Chrodegang. Two synods held at Rome a few years earlier, one of them the second Lateran Council, had made various ordinances with the object of enforcing this rule, or one of the same character, on all cathedral and collegiate clergy. In obedience to their orders, Gisa began to reform his Church according to the Lotharingian pattern.<sup>2</sup> The number of the Canons of Wells was increased, their revenues were increased also, but they were obliged to forsake their separate houses, and to use the common refectory and dormitory which Gisa built for them.3 This change was still more short-lived at Wells than it was at Exeter. Whatever Gisa did was undone by his immediate successor.

Comparison between the foundations of Harold and Gisa.

It is to be noticed that the innovations of Leofric at Exeter and of Gisa at Wells were conceived in quite another spirit from Harold's foundation at Waltham. The changes made by the Lotharingian Bishops—for Leofric, though English by birth, was Lotharingian in feeling—were changes in a monastic direction. and Gisa did not indeed expel their secular Canons and substitute monks; neither did they, like Wulfstan at Gloucester, require their Canons to take monastic vows or subject them to the fulness of monastic discipline.

Appendix E. Azor signs many charters, and in the Waltham document (Cod. Dipl. iv. 159) he appears as "Regis dapifer."

&lt;sup>1</sup> See above, p. 84.

&lt;sup>2</sup> On these synods, held April 13th and May 1st, 1059, see Stubbs, Mosheim, ii. 47.

<sup>3</sup> We have seen that he found his Canons "absque claustro et refectorio," things with which they could perfectly well dispense. Then he goes on (p. 19), "Quos publice vivere . . . canonicali, ditatos, instruxi obedientia. Claustrum verò et refectorium et dormitorium illis præparavi, et omnia quæ ad hæc necessaria et competentia fore cognovi, ad modum patriæ meæ laudabiliter advocavi." On the Provostship of Wells, part of this institution, see Professor Stubbs in Gentleman's Magazine, November 1864,

Canon of Wells or Exeter could doubtless, unlike a monk, CHAP. X. resign his office, and thereby free himself from the special obligations which it involved. But, while he retained his office, he was obliged to live in what, as compared with the free life of the English secular priest, must have seemed a monastic fashion. One may suspect that the rule of Chrodegang was but the small end of the wedge, and that, if the system had taken root and flourished, the next step would have been to impose monastic vows and full monastic discipline upon the capitular clergy. All this was utterly alien to the feelings of Englishmen. Our countrymen were, only too often, ready to found monasteries and to become monks. But they required that the process should be open and above-board. The monk should be a monk and the secular should be a secular. The secular had no mind to be entrapped into becoming a sort of half monk, while still nominally retaining the secular character. Earl Harold better understood his countrymen. When he determined on founding, not a monastery but a secular college, he determined that it should be really secular. The Canons of Waltham therefore lived like Englishmen, each man in his own house on his own prebend, while the Canons of Wells and Exeter had to submit for a while to the foreign discipline of the common refectory and the common dormer.

The Lotharingian Prelates seem to have been among the Walter and great disseminators of that feeling about the uncanonical Gisa conappointment of Stigand, which, as we have seen, had Rome. perhaps touched the mind even of Harold himself.1 It is 1061. therefore not wonderful that the scruple had touched the mind of Eadward, and that it was by his authority that the two new Bishops went to Rome to receive consecration at the hands of the lawful Pope Nicolas.2 They refused

<sup>1</sup> See above, p. 446.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Fl. Wig. 1061. Vita Eadw. 411. Æthelred Riev. X Scriptt. 387.

Death of Abbot Wulfric. April 18, 1061.

Æthelsige receives the abbatial benediction from Stigand. May 26, 1061.

THE PARTY OF THE P

CHAP. z. to receive the rite from a Primate whose pallium had been received from an usurper, and, as Ealdred had as yet received no pallium at all, there was no other Metropolitan in the land to fall back upon. The scruple however was not universal. Another great ecclesiastical preferment fell vacant during the absence of Walter and Gisa. Wulfric, Abbot of Saint Augustine's at Canterbury, one of the Prelates who had appeared as the representatives of England at the Synod of Rheims, and who had been a splendid benefactor to his own monastery,2 died during the Easter festival.3 The news was brought to the King, seemingly while the Witan were, as usual, in session at Winchester. The royal choice fell on Æthelsige, a monk of the New Minster. He, we are told, followed Archbishop Stigand, and was by him hallowed as Abbot on the day of the patron of his house. The ceremony was performed at Windsor, a royal seat of which this is one of our earliest notices.4 It would perhaps have been a strong measure for Æthelsige altogether to refuse the ministrations

> The reason for these Bishops going to Rome for consecration is most clearly expressed in an incidental entry in Florence under the year 1070; "Ambo Rome à Nicolao Papa ordinati sunt, quando Aldredus Eboracensium archiepiscopus pallium suscepit: vitabant enim a Stigando, qui tunc archiepiscopatui Doruberniæ præsidebat, ordinari, quia illum noverant non canonicè pallium suscepisse." See Appendix U. The King's orders seem implied in the words of Gisa himself (Hist. Ep. Som. 16); "Ego quem Rex Edwardus, licet vitæ meritis indignum, Roma direxit et à Nicolao Papå ordinatum . . honorificè recepit."

- <sup>1</sup> See above, p. 113.
- <sup>2</sup> W. Thorn. X Scriptt. 1785.
- <sup>3</sup> Chron. Petrib. 1061. "And on pam sylfan geare fortiferde Wulfric abbod set Sce Augustine innon bære Easter wucan on xiv. Kal. Mai." It is remarkable how many eminent persons—Earl Godwine, Archbishop Cynesige, and King Eadward himself are the most remarkable—died while the Witan were actually sitting, to the great convenience of those who had to elect their successors.
- 4 The story continues, "Da com pam cynge word pæt se abbot Wulfric forogefaren was, ba geceas he [no mention of capitular election] Æbelsige munuc beerto." On Windsor see Cod. Dipl. iv. 178, 209, 227.

F one who was doubly his diocesan, alike as a monk of CHAP. X. Tew Minster and as Abbot of Saint Augustine's. Morever, the benediction of an Abbot was not a matter of the ame spiritual importance as the consecration of a Bishop. t was an edifying ceremony, but it was not a sacranental rite. Still, when we remember that Earl Harold nimself had chosen another Prelate for his ceremony at Waltham, it shows some independence on the part of Æthelsige thus openly to communicate with the schismatical Primate. His conduct at all events did not lose him the royal favour. At some date between this time and the death of Eadward, Abbot Ælfwine of Ramsey, he who had been ambassador to the Pope and the Cæsar,1 resigned his office, and Abbot Æthelsige, without resigning his office at Canterbury, was entrusted with the administration of the great Huntingdonshire monastery.2

It is not quite clear whether Gisa and Walter made Journey to Rome of their journey to Rome in company with some still more Ealdred, exalted personages who went on the same road in the Gyrth. course of the same year. The new Metropolitan of the 1061.

North went to Rome after his pallium, and with him the Earl of the Northumbrians went as a pilgrim, accompanied by his wife, by his younger brother Gyrth, Earl of the East Angles, by several noble Thegns from Northumberland, and by Burchard, son of Earl Ælfgar, a companion, it would seem, of Ealdred rather than of Tostig. Harold, on his pilgrimage, had chosen the route through Gaul, in order to ascertain the strength of the enemy. Tostig, probably starting from the court of his father-

<sup>1</sup> See above, pp. 113, 272.

Hist. Rams. c. 119. We shall hear of Æthelsige again.

Chron. Wig. 1061. "Her for Ealdred biscop to Rome sefter his pallium."

&#x27;The Worcester Chronicle merely says, "And se Eorl Tostig and his wif eac foron to Rome." The Biographer (410, 411) adds Gyrth, Gospatric, and others, as their companions. On Burchard, son of Ælfgar, see Appendix BB.

CHAP. x. in-law at Bruges, chose to make his journey wholly through those kindred lands with which England was now so closely connected. The Archbishop and the two Earls passed through Saxony and along the upper course of the Rhine, so that, till they reached the Alps, the whole of their course lay over Teutonic soil.1 They seem to have found Gisa and Walter already at Rome; but the three Prelates, besides the personal business which each had with the Pope, are said to have been charged in common with one errand from the King. This was to obtain the Papal confirmation for the privileges of his restored monastery Papal con- at Westminster.3 A synod of some kind was sitting, in which the Earl of the Northumbrians was received by Pope Nicolas with marked honours.4 The illustrious visitors obtained the Pope's confirmation for the privileges of the rising minster of Saint Peter, and they returned firmation of the privileges of Westminster.

laden with letters from Nicolas to that effect.<sup>5</sup> Walter and Gisa obtained without difficulty the consecration which they sought; but Ealdred was at first not only refused

&lt;sup>1</sup> Vita Eadw. 410. "Transfretavit, et per Saxoniam et superiores Rheni fines Romam tetendit."

&lt;sup>2</sup> Ib. 411. "Venerant quoque ex prescepto Regis . . . Gyso et Walterius."

&lt;sup>3</sup> Æthel. Riev. 386. Est. de Seint Ædward, 2324 et seqq. But the fact rests on better authority. The Biographer (411) speaks of Ealdred as going to Rome—"ut ibi scilicet et regise legationis caussam peroraret, et usum pallii obtineret." So Gisa himself (Hist. Ep. Som. 16) says that he came back "privilegium apostolice auctoritatis mecum deferens."

&lt;sup>4</sup> Vita Eadw. 410. "Romæ ab Apostolico Nicolao, honore quo decebat susceptus, à latere ejus in ipsà Romana synodo ab eo coactus sedit secundus." So Gisa (u. s.) says "post peractam ibi synodum." William of Malmesbury (Gest. Pont. 154) calls it "synodus quam contra simoniacos coegerat [Nicolaus]." He also mentions the honours shown to Tostig. But this synod cannot have been, as Æthelred (387) makes it, the Second Lateran Council. That assembly, according to the Chronicle of Bernold of Constanz (Pertz, v. 427), was held in 1060, but the real date was April 13, 1059. See its Acts in Pertz, Legg. ii. Ap. 177. Milman, iii. 49. And cf. above, p. 452.

&lt;sup>5</sup> See what profess to be the letters in Cod. Dipl. iv. 183.

Gisa himself (u. s.) fixes the day to April 15th.

he pallium which he asked for, but was deprived, so far CHAP. X. B a Pope could deprive an English Prelate, of all his Endred refused the referments.1 The ground for this severity was, accord-pallium, ng to one account, the charge of simony; according to prived of mother, it would seem to have been an objection to an uncanonical translation or to the holding of two Bishopricks at once.<sup>2</sup> At any rate, Ealdred retired in confusion. The whole party now prepared to return to England, but not in one body. Judith and the greater part of the company were sent first, and they reached England without any special adventure. But the Earl, and seemingly all the three Bishops, stayed behind to prosecute the cause of Ealdred.<sup>3</sup> At last, thinking the matter hopeless, they also set out to return home. On their way they were Tostig and attacked by robbers, seemingly the robber nobles of the robbed on country.4 The brigands seem to have been specially their way home. anxious to seize the person of the Earl of the Northhumbrians. A noble youth named Gospatric 5 said that

&lt;sup>1</sup> Vita Eadw. 411. "Apostolicis et pontificalibus decretis examinantibus et omni synodo censente, à petitione suß repulsus, non solùm usum pallii non obtinuit, verum ab episcopatus gradu dejectus in hac confusione recedere habuit."

&lt;sup>2</sup> Will. Malms. Gest. Pont. 154. "Gisonem et Walterum voti compotes reddidit, qui essent non usquequaque contemnendæ scientiæ et nullius notati ignominia simoniæ. Aldredum suapte responsione culpabilem utrobique repertum omni honore severus exspoliavit." But, in his Life of Wulfstan (Ang. Sac. ii. 250), he says, "Nam nec ille Wigornensi præsulatui renunciare, nec Papa nisi cederet Eboracensi eum pallio insignire volebat." The Biographer (411) is not very clear, but he seems rather to make the translation the objection; "Perscrutatus ergo qualiter ad sacros accessisset ordines, ee gratuitu confitente inventus est à primo ordinationis suse Episcopo [episcopatu f] ad alium [aliud MS.] commigrasse contra canones."

&quot;Quum caussa Aldredi Episcopi Dux in Roma prehendinaret diutius, uxorem suam et omnem regise dignitatis suse comitatum præmiserat cum suis majoris numeri hominibus, et hi processerant prosperè."

&lt;sup>4</sup> The Biographer, who first (411) calls them "latrones," afterwards (412) promotes them into "militares."

<sup>5 &</sup>quot;Adolescens Gaius Patricius nomine" (411). The same strange perversion

The

OHAP. x. he was the Earl, and was carried off accordingly. after a while, the robbers, admiring his courage and appearance, not only set him free without ransom, but restored to him all that they had taken from him.1 rest returned to the presence of the Pope, with nothing but the clothes on their backs.2 Tostig now seems to have mingled threats and entreaties. One account describes the Pope as touched with the desolate condition of the whole party, and as therefore yielding the more readily to Tostig's petition in favour of Ealdred.3 Another version makes the Earl take a higher tone. If the Pope and his connivance.

The Pope vields to the threats authority were so little cared for in his own neighbourof Tostig, and Ealdred receives the pallium.

would certainly withdraw all tribute and payment of every kind from the Roman See. He, Earl Tostig, would take care that the King and his people should know the truth in all its fulness.4 This account carries more of the stamp hood, who could be expected to care for his excommunications in distant countries? He was fierce enough towards suppliants, but he seemed able to do nothing against his own rebels. Let him at once cause the property to be restored, which had most likely been seized with his own almost under the walls of Rome, the King of the English

If Englishmen underwent such treatment of the name is made by Orderic (512 C). This may be the Gospatric mentioned there as taking a part in the resistance to William in Northumberland. It is to be hoped for Tostig's sake that it was.

- <sup>1</sup> "Suis propriis rebus donatus," says the Biographer, 412.
- <sup>3</sup> Will. Malms. Gest. Pont. 154. "Ita differenti effectu quum regrederentur [he conceives Gisa and Walter to have been of the party] una pariter serumna omnes involvit; nam prædonibus irruentibus, præter simplices vestes exspoliatis omnibus, ad nummum valens corporibus tamen illesis Romam refugere."
- <sup>8</sup> Vita Endw. 412. "Confusè ergo et miserabiliter reversis Romana pietas indoluit, veritusque Dominus Papa maxime clarissimi Ducis petitionem," &c.
- 4 Will. Malms. Gest. Pont. 154. "Futurum ut hæc Rex Anglorum audiens tributum Sancti Petri meritò Nicolao subtraheret, se non defuturum rerum veritati exaggerendæ. Hoc minarum fulmine Romani territi Papam truth with it than the other more courtly version. At CHAP. X. may rate, whether the voice of Tostig was the voice of atreaty or the voice of threatening, to his voice the Pope t last yielded. Ealdred was restored to his Archbishopick and invested with the pallium, on the single condition f his resigning the see of Worcester. The losses which he Earl and the Bishops had undergone at the hands of he robbers were made good to them out of the Papal reasury,2 and they set forth again on their journey homeward. They must have come back through France, as Burchard died on the way at Rheims. He was there buried in the churchyard of the Abbey of Saint Remigius, a house which his father Ælfgar enriched for his sake.3 Ealdred, Tostig, and the rest came back, honoured and rejoicing, to England.

But in this, as in so many other cases, we see the Ill effects evil effects which followed on this passion for pilgrimages, tice of at least among Kings and Earls and other rulers of men. pilgrimage. It was with a true wisdom that the Witan of England had hindered the proposed pilgrimage of Eadward. None but Malcolm the great Cnut could leave his realm with impunity and Northum. could keep distant nations in subjection by the mere terror berland during the of his name. We have seen what evils were undoubtedly absence of Tostig. brought upon Normandy by the pilgrimage of Robert; we 1061. have seen what lesser evils were probably brought upon England by the pilgrimage of Harold. So now the absence of her Earl, even on so pious a work, brought no good to flexerunt." This follows a good hearty English denunciation, of which I have given the substance in the text. To the same effect in the Life of Wulfstan, ii. 250.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Such is William of Malmesbury's account. The Biographer, in his rhetoric, leaves out the condition.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Vita Eadw. 412. "Ducem consolatus est caritativa allocutione, allatis insuper magis xeniis ex beati Petri largitate."

&lt;sup>3</sup> See Appendix BB.

&lt;sup>1</sup> See above, p. 116.

Northumberland. No doubt the times must have seemed specially secure both at home and abroad, when two of the great Earls of England could venture to leave the Kingdom at the same time, and when Northumberland could be deprived of the care at once of her temporal and of her spiritual chief. Her only dangerous neighbour was bound to Tostig by the closest of artificial ties. But so tempting an opportunity for a raid overcame any scruples which either gratitude or the tie of sworn brotherhood might have suggested to the mind of Malcolm. The King of Scots entered Northumberland; he cruelly ravaged the country, and did not even show reverence to Saint Cuthberht by sparing his holy isle of Lindisfarn.1 We have no further details. Neither do we hear whether Tostig took any sort of vengeance for this seemingly quite unprovoked injury. We hear nothing more of Scottish affairs during the remaining years of the reign of Eadward.

It always marks a season of comparative quiet when our attention is chiefly occupied by ecclesiastical affairs. During four whole years Malcolm's raid into Northhumberland is the only political or military event which we have to record. We now enter on the last year of 1062. Vacancy of this time of quiet. In the year following the pilgrimthe See of Worcester. age of Tostig, Ealdred having at last resigned the see of Worcester, a successor had to be chosen. England was at that moment blessed or cursed with visitors of a kind who, to say the least, did not in those days often reach her shores, namely Legates from the Roman See. Papal Legates in Nicolas died soon after the visit of Ealdred and Tostig, England. Lent, 1062. and was succeeded by Alexander the Second, a name afterards to become only too well known in English history. THAP. I. commission from this Pontiff, Ermenfrid, Bishop of tten, and a nameless colleague, came to England early in e year. It is clear that their errand was in some way mnected with the appointment to the see of Worcester, sides any other matters with which they may have been narged for the enlightenment of the King's private conzience or for the forwarding of his foundation at Westinster. Possibly their personal presence was thought ecessary in order to ensure the surrender by Ealdred of a 3ishoprick to which he clave with special affection.2 At my rate it was Ealdred who received the Legates, who conducted them on their journey through a great part of England, and who at last quartered them at Worcester, ander the care of Wulfstan, the holy Prior of that church.3 There they were to remain through Lent, waiting for the Easter Gemét, in which the King and his Witan were to decide on all the matters which had brought them to England. With regard to the succession to this Enldred see of Worcester, Ealdred was for a while doubtful between between two candidates. One was Æthelwig, now Abbot of Eves- Æthelwig ham, who had so long acted as his deputy in the adminis- Wulfstan. tration of the Hwiccian diocese.<sup>5</sup> This Prelate is described Vita Wlst. 250. Ealdred is to resign Worcester, and a good successor is to be chosen; "Hujus igitur conditionis arbitros, et quædam alia ecclesiastica negotia in Anglia expedituros, Cardinales adductos Archiepiscopus Regi exhibuit." Florence (1062) calls them "legatos sedis apostolicse . . . Armenfredum scilicet, Sedunensem Episcopum, et alium, qui a Domino Papa Alexandro pro responsis ecclesiasticis ad Regem Anglorum Eadwardum missi: . Wigornise . . . degebant." I quote the fuller Life by William of Malmesbury as "Vita Wlstani," and the shorter one by Heming by name.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Sim. Dun. Gest. Regg. 1061. "Interim Rex Scottorum Malcolmus sui conjuncti fratris, scilicet Comitis Tostii, comitatum ferociter depopulatus est, violată pace sancti Cuthberti in Lindisfarnensi insulă."

<sup>2</sup> Vita Wlst. 250. "Adeò illum amor Wigorniæ devinxerat."

<sup>3</sup> Florence mentions their sojourn at Worcester, and their admiration of Wulfstan; the Life makes them actually his guests.

&lt;sup>4</sup> Fl. Wig. "Exspectantes responsum sum legationis usque ad curiam regalem proximi Paschæ." So the Life, but less clearly.

&lt;sup>5</sup> See above, pp. 372, 436.

as a man of noble birth and of consummate prudence in all matters human, some add in matters divine also.1 One part at least of his character was not belied by his We shall find that he lived in high favour actions. equally under Eadward, Harold, and William, and died in full possession of his Abbey eleven years after the Conquest.2 He was not unnaturally anxious to succeed to the full possession of a see which he had so long administered, and with whose affairs he must have been thoroughly conversant.3 Ealdred himself doubted for a while whether the see would be more safely entrusted to the worldly wisdom of Æthelwig or to the simple piety of Wulfstan the Prior.4 Wulfstan, the friend of Harold, was a man now of about

WULFSTAN [Prior and] Bishop of Worcester. Sept. 8, 1063-Jan. 18, 1095. 1012. His life and character.

fifty years of age.<sup>5</sup> He was the son of Æthelstan,<sup>6</sup> a Thegn of Warwickshire, and his wife Wulfgifu, and he must have been born among the horrors of the later years of Æthelred. Brought up, not as a monk, but as a secular student, in Born about the Abbey of Peterborough, he made great proficiency in the learning of the time under a master whose name Ervenius seems to imply a foreign origin.7 His parents,

&lt;sup>1</sup> Vita Wlst. 251. "Maximæ quantum ad sæculum prudentiæ, quantum ad religionem non minimæ." But the Evesham historian (p. 87) calls him "honestis moribus valde probatum, tam generis nobilitate quam divina lege ac sæculari prudentiå plurimum valentem."

&lt;sup>3</sup> Hist. Evesh. pp. 88, 89.

&lt;sup>3</sup> Vit. Wlst. 251. "Quamvis Æthelwius sollicitè anniteretur partibus."

<sup>4</sup> Ib. "Aldredus, pro pacto quod fecerat Apostolico, nonnullo tempore fluctaverat animo; utrum ad episcopatum eligeret Ethelwii perspicacem industriam in seculo, an Wlstani simplicem religionem in Deo. enim illi viri Wigornensis diœcesis diverso respectu præstantissimi."

<sup>5</sup> Flor. Wig. 1062. "Anno ætatis suæ plus quinquagesimo."

&lt;sup>6</sup> Æthelstan in the Life, Eatstan according to Florence.

&lt;sup>7</sup> Vita Wlst. 244. Ervenius was a skilful illuminator, and wrote a Sacramentary for King Cnut and a Psalter for the Lady Emma. Cnut (249) gave both the books to the Emperor Conrad; his son Henry the Third gave them to Ealdred, who brought them back from Köln and gave them to Wulfstan. Emma had another Psalter whose adventures in Normandy we have already come across. See above, p. 233.

*****

hey grew old, took monastic vows by mutual consent, CHAP. X. Wulfstan for some while lived as a layman, diszuished for his success in bodily exercises as well as for virtuous and pious demeanour. His chastity especially , s preserved unsullied under unusually severe trials.1 At t, when he still could not have been above twenty-six _ars old,2 he received ordination as a Presbyter at the 1033-1038. .nds of Brihtheah, Bishop of Worcester. This was somehat against his own will, as he shrank from the responbilities of the priesthood. The friendly Prelate vainly ressed on him a good secular living in the neighbourhood f the city.3 But the determination of Wulfstan was fixed, nd Brihtheah had soon to admit him as a monk of the athedral monastery, where, after a while, he was promoted by Ealdred to the rank of Prior.4 Here he distinguished bimself by every monastic perfection; he was eminent as a preacher, and it is still more interesting to read of his habit of going through the country to baptize the children of the poor, to whom-so our monastic informants tell us-the greedy secular clergy refused the first sacrament except on payment of a fee.<sup>5</sup> The virtues of Wulfstan attracted the

&lt;sup>1</sup> The story is given at length in the Life, p. 245.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Brihtheah was Bishop from 1033 to 1038 (Chron. Wig. 1033. Ab. 1038). This fixes the date of Wulfstan's ordination and profession. Brihtheah was one of the embassy which took Gunhild to Germany (Heming, Cart. 267). He had a brother Æthelwig, who enlarged the presbytery of Saint Peter's Church in Worcester (Ib. 342).

&lt;sup>3</sup> Vita Wlst. 246. "Obtulit ei plusquam semel Antistes ecclesiam suburbanam, cujus opulenti reditus ad quotidianam stipem satis superque sufficerent."

&lt;sup>4</sup> Ib. 247. "Prepositus, ut tunc, Prior, ut nunc dicitur, monachorum constitutus." "Prior et pater congregationis," says Florence, adding "ab Aldredo episcopo ponitur." It will be remembered that, in a cathedral monastery, the Bishop was Abbot, so the Prior was the immediate head of the society.

&lt;sup>5</sup> Ib. 248. "Jam enim venalitas ex infernalibus umbris emerserat, ut nec illud gratis presbyteri presberent infantibus sacramentum, si non infarcirent parentes marsupium." Adam of Bremen (iv. 30) brings the same charge against the Norwegian and Danish clergy; but he allows it

notice of many of the great men of the realm. The famous Godgifu, the wife of Leofric, was his devoted admirer.1 But the same virtues gained him a still nobler and more powerful votary; he became, as we have seen, the special friend of Earl Harold.<sup>2</sup> Ealdred now hesitated between Wulfstan and Æthelwig as his successor at Worcester. The King, we are told, was determined that the see should be filled by a canonical election, which however of course did not exclude the right of the Witan to confirm or to reject the choice of the ecclesiastical electors. The Papal Legates soon discerned the virtues of Wulfstan, and became eager on his behalf. They spent their Lent in efforts to secure his election, especially in exhortations to the clergy and people of Worcester, an expression which may perhaps show that something of the ancient popular character of episcopal elections still lingered on.3 But whoever were Wulfstan the electors, Wulfstan was elected, and the choice of the local body came before the Witan of the realm The Legates appeared before the for confirmation. Gemót; the diplomacy of the time doubtless required elected Bishop.

> to be their only fault, and attributes it to the unwillingness of the "barbarians" to pay tithe.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Heming, Vita Wlst. Angl. Sacr. i. 541. "Venerabilis interea Comitissa Godgiva, famă bonitatis ejus audită, totis illum cœpit diligere visceribus, et diversis hujus sæculi subvenire necessitatibus." See Appendix E.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Will. Malms. Vit. Wlst. 248. See above, p. 41.

&lt;sup>3</sup> Fl. Wig. 1062. "Fit unanimis consensus tam cleri quam etiam totius plebis in ejus electione, Rege videlicet annuente ut quem sibi vellent præsulem eligerent." He goes on to mention the coming of the Legates and their visit to Worcester, and adds; "Hi videntes, dum ibi morabantur, ejus laudabilem conversationem, in ejus electione non tantum consentiebant, immo etiam tam clerum quam plebem maximè ad hoc instigabant, suaque auctoritate ejus electionem firmabant." This seems, especially considering the passage about the King, certainly to imply a preliminary election by the clergy and people of Worcester, which the Witan had to confirm or reject. It is hardly possible that by "clerus et plebe" he can mean the Gemót itself. He speaks of the Legates waiting for the Gemót, but it is from the Life that we get the details of the debate.

hat their business with the King should not be decided CHAP. X. vithout the national approval. The succession to the e of Worcester came on among the other business of the Assembly, and the Legates themselves took on them to speak on behalf of the holy Prior. 1 Not a His elecvoice was raised in opposition; every speaker bore his proved by testimony to the incomparable merits of Wulfstan. Easter, Both Archbishops, Stigand and Ealdred, spoke in his 1062. favour; so did Ælfgar, the Earl of the province, and Wulfstan's personal friend Earl Harold.<sup>2</sup> The approval of the Gemot was unanimous. The only difficulty was to be found in the unwillingness of Wulfstan himself to take upon him the cares and responsibilities of the episcopal office. As soon as the vote was given, messengers were sent to ride at full speed to Worcester, and to bring the Prior in person before the Assembly. Wulfstan obeyed the summons, but, amid general shouts of dissent, he pleaded his unfitness for the vacant office.3 He declared, even with an oath, that he had rather lose his head than become a Bishop.4 His scruples were at last shaken by the Legates and the Archbishops, who pleaded the duty of obedience to the Holy See, and finally by the exhortations

&lt;sup>1</sup> Vita Wlst. 251. "Ad Curiam reversi, dum Wigornensis Episcopi ventilaretur electio, nomen ejus tulerunt in medium." It must have been a wholesome thing for Roman Cardinals to come face to face with an Assembly in whose proceedings order and freedom had already learned to kiss one another.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Ib. "Adstipulabantur votis Cardinalium Archiepiscopi Cantuariensis et Eboracensis, ille favore, iste testimonio [I suppose this means that Ealdred spoke from his own knowledge, and Stigand from the report of others], ambo judicio. Accedebant laudibus etiam Comites Haraldus et Elgarus, par insigne fortitudinis, non ita religionis."

Biscopatûs [the King's writ?]. Contra ille niti, et se honori tanto imparem cunctis reclamantibus clamitare."

* Fl. Wig. 1262. "Illo obstinatissimè renuente, seque indignum acclamante et cum sacramento etiam affirmante se multò libentiùs decollationi quàm tam altæ ordinationi succumbere velle."

Wulfstan makes canonical profession to Stigand,

Wulfstan is consecrated by Ealdred. Sept. 8, 1062.

THE RESERVE OF THE PARTY OF THE

CHAP. x. and reproofs of a holy anchorite named Wulfsige, who had been for forty years removed from the society of men.1 But the process of persuasion in the mind of Wulfstan was evidently a long one. The formalities of his ecclesiastical confirmation and of the final rite of consecration were not One is half discompleted till the month of September. appointed to read that he refused the ministrations of Stigand, and sought for consecration at the hands of Ealdred. The distinct Roman influence, embodied in the persons of Roman Legates, doubtless taught Wulfstan that Stigand was a schismatic. Ermenfrid and his colleague seem even to have been the bearers of a distinct Papal decree of suspension against the Archbishop. Wulfstan however drew a distinction, which the facts of the case amply bore out. Stigand, whether canonically appointed but is con- or not, was, in law and in fact, Archbishop of Canterbury. secrated by The Bishop-elect therefore did not scruple to make his profession of canonical obedience to him.2 He did not scruple thus far to recognize the legal primacy of an Archbishop appointed by the King and Witan of England. It was only the sacramental rite of consecration which he sought at the hands of a Primate whose canonical position was open to no cavil. For this he went to the newlyappointed Metropolitan of Northumberland, and was consecrated by him at York. Ealdred had however to declare, <sup>1 &</sup>quot;Frustra Cardinales cum Archiepiscopis trivissent operam, nisi 19fugienti prætendissent Papæ obedientiam." So says the Life, p. 251, and the argument is one which would doubtless be used, though one may doubt whether Stigand was specially eloquent on behalf of the Papal claims. But the matter was clearly not settled at once in the Florence witnesses to the final persuasion wrought Easter Gemót. by the "inclusus" Wulfsige, who, after his long solitude, was not likely to be among the assembled Witan. (We shall hear of Wulfsige again.) The dates also prove the delay. Florence tells us that the canonical confirmation was on August 29th, the consecration on September 8th.

&lt;sup>2</sup> See Appendix U.

erhaps before the assembled Witan, that he claimed no authority, ecclesiastical or temporal, over the Bishop of Worcester, either on the ground of his having been consecrated by him or on that of his having formerly been a monk under his obedience.2 Scandal however added that Ealdred contrived to attach a large portion of the estates of the see of Worcester to his own Archbishoprick.3

The other ecclesiastical event of this purely ecclesiastical The King's year has been mentioned already. Earl Harold's minster Charter to Waltham. at Waltham had been consecrated two years earlier. this time he had settled the details of his foundation and of its endowments. His gifts and regulations were now confirmed in due form by a royal charter. As the signature of Wulfstan is not attached to the document, we may suppose that the charter was granted in the same Easter Gemót in which Wulfstan's election was approved. And Ælfwig, one more ecclesiastical appointment must, at some slight Abbot of New sacrifice of chronological order, be recorded in this section. Minster. 1063. In the following year it seems that Harold procured the appointment of a near kinsman, seemingly a brother of his renowned father, to the office of Abbot of the New Minster

By Easter !

&lt;sup>1</sup> Fl. Wig. 1062. "Coram Rege et regni optimatibus." Or, as Florence, when he speaks of the Witan, is rather fond of using popular language, this may mean some smaller Council.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Ib. "Se nullum jus ecclesiasticæ seu sæcularis subjectionis super eum deinceps velle clamare, nec propter quod ab eo consecratus est, nec quia ante consecrationem ejus monachus factus est."

&lt;sup>3</sup> Vita Wlst. 251. "Rex ergo Edwardus Wlstanum Wigornensi episcopatu ex solido investivit; licet illum Aldredus potentia qua vigebat multis et penè omnibus . . . prædiis vellicaverit." The Gloucester historian (i. 9) charges him with having dealt in the same way with that Monastery on his appointing the other Wulfstan to be its Abbot.

&lt;sup>4</sup> This is the charter in Cod. Dipl. iv. 154, already so often quoted. The signatures are very numerous. Stigand, though excluded from the consecration of the minster, signs the charter; so does the Norman Bishop William, also Bishop Gisa, various French courtiers, Esegar the Staller, and Earl Ælfgar. Harold's own signature takes a very practical shape; "Ego Haroldus Dux operando consolido."

Unconquered in memory of his father Ælfred. It seems strange that a brother of Godwine, if he desired preferment at all, should have had to wait for it so long. But such seems to have been the case, and the name of the new Prelate, Abbot Ælfwig, the uncle of King Harold, will be met with again in the very crisis of our history.

§ 2. The Welsh War and its Consequences. 1062-1065.

Renewed ravages of Gruffydd. 1062.

But the year of this last appointment, or rather the last days of the year of the consecration of Wulfstan, carries us at once among scenes of a widely different kind from ecclesiastical ceremonies at Rome, York, Waltham, or Winchester. The peace of the land is again threatened, and the great Earl of the West-Saxons again stands forth as the one champion in whose hands England could trust her destinies. In the course of the year of Wulfstan's consecration the ravages of Gruffydd of Wales seem to have begun again with increased fury. He entered the diocese of the new Prelate, and seems to have carried his arms even beyond the Severn, renewing his earlier exploit of Rhyd-y-Groes. The damage which he had done to the English territory, and the insults which he had thus offered to his lord King Eadward, formed the main subject of discussion at the Christmas Gemót, which was held as usual at Gloucester.3 It is to be noticed that we now hear Witenagemot of Gloucester. Christmas, 1062-1063.

&lt;sup>1</sup> See Appendix GG.

This seems implied in the verses of the Biographer, p. 425;

"Quis canit occiduos modulator in orbe Britannos, Gentem Caucasiis rupibus ingenitam,
Indomitam fortemque nimis regnante Griphino,
Nec jam contentam finibus occiduis!

Ultra sed sceleris cursum tulit arma Syvernæ, Vimque ejus regnum pertulit Angligenûm."

This is implied in the Worcester Chronicle, 1063. "On þissum geare princely and soldier-like excellence. He compares the days of Harold with his own, and wishes that England had captains like him to drive back the marauders who, in his own time, harried her borders with impunity. Another writer of the same age, the famous Giraldus, attributes to this campaign of Harold the security which England enjoyed on the side of the Welsh during the reigns of the three Norman Kings. These two writers, evidently speaking quite independently of each other, give us several details of the campaign. These are fully confirmed by the witness of Eadward's Biographer, and all their accounts fit without difficulty into the more general narrative given by the Chroniclers.

The campaign opened in the last days of May. Its Harold and general plan was a combined attack on the Welsh territory invade from both sides. Harold sailed with a fleet from Bristol, Wales. May 26, the haven from which he had set sail on so different 1063. an errand twelve years before; Tostig set forth with

Joan. Sarisb. Polyc. vi. 6 (iv. 16-18 Giles). His general argument is, "Videsne quantum electio ducis et exercitium juventutis militiæ conferant?" He introduces Harold thus; "Anglorum recens narrat historia, quod, quum Britones, irruptione facta, Angliam depopularentur, à piissimo Rege Edwardo ad eos expugnandos missus est Dux Haraldus, vir quidem in armis strenuus [his common epithet with Florence], et laudabilium operum fulgens insignibus, et qui tam suam quam suorum posset apud posteros gloriam dilatare, nisi meritorum titulos, nequitiam patris imitans, perfidè præsumpto regno, decoloraret."

He enlarges at some length on the inadequate preparations made in his time to resist the invaders; "Nivicollini Britones irruunt, et jam protendunt terminos suos, et egressi de cavernis suis latebrisque silvarum, plana occupant, nobilium procerum, videntibus ipsis, impugnant, expugnant, et diruunt, aut sibi retinent, munitiones." After some rhetorical complaints of the luxury of his own age, he goes on, "Depopulantur illi fines nostros; dum juventus nostra instruitur, et dum nobis miles armatur, hostis evadit." Presently comes the account of Harold.

<sup>3</sup> De Illaud. Wallise, ii. 7, ap. Ang. Sacr. ii. 451. He describes Harold's campaign, and adds, "Ob has igitur tam cruentas tamque recentes Anglorum de hac gente victorias primi tres Normannorum Reges in tanta subjectione tamque pacificam suis diebus Walliam tenuere."

north-east frontier of Wales. The spot is famous in our history as the seat of a Parliament of the great Edward, 1283. and its military position is important, as standing at no great distance from the sea, and commanding the vale of Clwyd, the southern Strathclyde. There Gruffydd had a palace, the rude precursor no doubt of the stately castle whose remains now form the chief attraction of Rhuddlan. The Welsh King heard of the approach of the English; he had just time to reach the shore and to escape by sea. Earl Harold was close in pursuit, and the escape of Gruffydd was a narrow one; but he did escape, and the main object of this sudden expedition was thwarted. Harold's force was not strong enough to endure a long winter campaign in so wild a country; so he contented himself with burning the palace and the ships which were in the haven. The same day on which this destruction was done, he set out on his return march to Gloucester.1

Harold's_ great campaign of 1063.

Harold's attempt at a sudden blow had thus, through an unavoidable accident, been unsuccessful. It was therefore determined to open a campaign on a great scale, which should crush the power of Gruffydd for ever. It was in this campaign that the world first fully learned how great a captain England possessed in her future King. Never was a campaign more ably planned or more vigorously Its perms- executed. The deep impression which it made on men's minds is shown by the way in which it is spoken of by writers who lived a hundred years later, when men had long been taught to look on Harold and his house as Testimony a brood of traitors and perjurers. John of Salisbury, writing under the Angevin Henry, chooses this campaign of Harold's as the most speaking example of the allimportant difference between a good general and a bad one. The name of Harold could of course not be uttered without some of the usual disparaging epithets, but he nent effect on men's minds.

of John of Salisbury and Giraldus Cambrensis.

<sup>1</sup> Flor. Wig. "Eodemque die rediit."

allows that the faithless usurper was a model of every CHAP. X. princely and soldier-like excellence.1 He compares the days of Harold with his own, and wishes that England had captains like him to drive back the marauders who, in his own time, harried her borders with impunity.2 Another writer of the same age, the famous Giraldus, attributes to this campaign of Harold the security which England enjoyed on the side of the Welsh during the reigns of the These two writers, evidently three Norman Kings.<sup>3</sup> speaking quite independently of each other, give us several details of the campaign. These are fully confirmed by the witness of Eadward's Biographer, and all their accounts fit without difficulty into the more general narrative given by the Chroniclers.

The campaign opened in the last days of May. Its Harold and general plan was a combined attack on the Welsh territory invade from both sides. Harold sailed with a fleet from Bristol, Wales. May 26, the haven from which he had set sail on so different 1063. an errand twelve years before; Tostig set forth with

<sup>1</sup> Joan. Sarisb. Polyc. vi. 6 (iv. 16-18 Giles). His general argument is, "Videsne quantum electio ducis et exercitium juventutis militiæ conferant?" He introduces Harold thus; "Anglorum recens narrat historia, quod, quum Britones, irruptione factă, Angliam depopularentur, à piissimo Rege Edwardo ad eos expugnandos missus est Dux Haraldus, vir quidem in armis strenuus [his common epithet with Florence], et laudabilium operum

gloriam dilatare, nisi meritorum titulos, nequitiam patris imitans, perfidè præsumpto regno, decoloraret."

<sup>2</sup> He enlarges at some length on the inadequate preparations made in his time to resist the invaders; "Nivicollini Britones irruunt, et jam protendunt terminos suos, et egressi de cavernis suis latebrisque silvarum, plana occupant, nobilium procerum, videntibus ipsis, impugnant, expugnant, et diruunt, aut sibi retinent, munitiones." After some rhetorical complaints of the luxury of his own age, he goes on, "Depopulantur illi fines nostros; dum juventus nostra instruitur, et dum nobis miles armatur, hostis evadit." Presently comes the account of Harold.

fulgens insignibus, et qui tam suam quam suorum posset apud posteros

De Illaud. Walliæ, ii. 7, ap. Ang. Sacr. ii. 451. He describes Harold's campaign, and adds, "Ob has igitur tam cruentas tamque recentes Anglorum de hac gente victorias primi tres Normannorum Reges in tanta subjectione tamque pacificam suis diebus Walliam tenuere."

CHAP. X. a mounted land force from Northumberland.1 The brothers met, probably at some point of central Wales, and began a systematic ravaging of the country. The military genius of Harold was now conspicuously shown in the way in which he adapted himself to the kind of warfare which he had to wage. Nothing could be better suited than the ancient English tactics for a pitched battle with an equal enemy. But here there was no hope or fear of pitched battles, and the enemy to be dealt with was one whose warfare was of a very different kind. The English Housecarls, with their heavy coats of mail and huge battle-axes, were eminently unfitted to pursue a light-armed and active foe through the hills and valleys of Wales. Ralph the Timid had brought himself and his army to discomfiture by compelling his Englishmen suddenly to adopt the tactics of France; 2 the valiant Earl of the West-Saxons proved his true generalship by teaching his army to accustom themselves to the tactics and the fare 3 of Welshmen. The irregular English troops, the fyrd, the levies of the shires, did not differ very widely from the Welsh mode of fighting. But it is not likely that Harold would enter on such a campaign as this without the help of at least a strong body of tried and regular soldiers. We must therefore conclude that Harold actually Harold adopts the Welsh tactics.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Fl. Wig. 1063. "Frater suus Comes Tostinus, ut Rex mandârat, cum equestri occurrit exercitu." The Worcester Chronicle says, "Tostig for mid landferde ongean." "Landferd" is here opposed to Harold's fleet. Tostig had probably troops of both kinds in his army, but the "equestris exercitus" implies that some were Housecarls.

&lt;sup>2</sup> See above, p. 389.

&lt;sup>3</sup> Giraldus (Angl. Sacr. ii. 452), in his very curious remarks on the right way to carry on a Welsh war, enlarges on the necessity of being prepared for poor fare. The Marchers are "Gens.. cibo potuque non delicata, tam Cerere quam Baccho caussis urgentibus abstinere parata." It was now no doubt that Harold showed that power of enduring "infinitos labores, vigilias, et inediam," of which the Biographer had spoken, p. 409. See above, p. 38.

required his Housecarls to follow the tactics suitable to the CHAP. x. country. They gave up the close array of the shield-wall; they laid aside their axes and coats of mail; clothed in leathern jerkins, they retained their swords, but they were to trust mainly to the nimble and skilful use of the javelin for attack and of the shield for defence. Thus Harold ravages and attired, the English, under their great leader, proved more subdues all than a match for the Welsh at their own weapons. happily we have no geographical details of the campaign, but we have a vivid picture of its general nature, and we can see that it must have extended over a large portion of the country. There were no pitched battles; but the English, in their new array, everywhere contended with success against the enemy. Every defensible spot of ground was stoutly contested by the Britons; but even the most inaccessible mountain fastnesses proved no safeguard against the energy of Harold.2 He won skirmish after skirmish, and each scene of conflict was marked, we are told, by a

Were this writer less rhetorical, one might think that cunci meant specially the Housecarls, as distinguished from the "agmina cita" of the light-armed. Cf. Giraldus (ii. 451); "Haroldus ultimus, qui pedes ipse, cumque pedestri turmă et levibus armis victuque patrize conformi [see on the Welsh fare just above], tam valide totam Kambriam et circuivit et transpenetravit." But the fullest account is given by John of Salisbury (iv. 18); "Quum ergo gentis cognosceret levitatem, quasi pari certamine militiam eligens expeditam, cum eis censuit congrediendum, levem exercens armaturam, perornatus incedens fasciis pectus et præduro tectus corio, missilibus ecrum levia objectans ancilia, et in eos contorquens nunc spicula, nunc mucronem exercens, sic fugientium vestigiis inhærebat, ut premeretur 'pede pes et cuspide cuspis,' et umbo umbone repelleretur."

2 Vita Eadw. 426;

"Gnarus inaccessis scrobibus se credere miles,
Tutius hostiles involet unde acies,
Saltibus et scopulis fretus regione maligna,
Sic vexat longa lite Duces geminos."

So John of Salisbury (iv. 18); "Nivium itaque collem ingressus, vastavit omnia."

trophy of stone, bearing the proud legend, "Here Harok conquered."1 Such a warfare was necessarily merciless. The object was to reduce the Welsh to complete submission, to disable them from ever again renewing their old ravages. Harold was fighting too with an enemy who knew not what mercy was, who gave no quarter, who, if they ever took a prisoner, instead of putting him to ransom, cut off his head.2 We are not therefore surprised to hear that every male who resisted was put to the sword.3 One of our informants is even driven to the rhetoric of the East to express the greatness of the slaughter.4 The Welsh terrible execution soon 5 broke the spirit of the Welsh. submit. They submitted and gave hostages, they bound themselves to tribute, and pronounced sentence of deposition and outlawry upon Gruffydd.6 The King who had reigned over all the Welsh kin,7 the warrior who had been hitherto

¹ Giraldus (ii. 451). "In cujus victorise signum perpetuamque memoriam lapides in Wallis more antiquo in titulum erectos locis, in quibus victor exstiterat, literas hujuscemodi insculptas habentes plurimos invenies; Hic fuit victor Haroldus." I am not aware that any of these monuments now remain. The stones at Trelech in Monmouthshire, sometimes thought to be a memorial of one of Harold's victories, must be far older, and Monmouthshire is not likely to have been the scene of war.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Ib. (ii. 453). "Ibi capiuntur milites, hic decapitantur; ibi redimuntur, hic perimuntur."

Joan. Sarisb. iv. 18. "Usque ad miserationem parvulorum omnem masculum qui inveniri potuit interficiens, in ore gladii pacavit provinciam." So Harold's biographer, though confounding the chronology (see above, p. 442), says (Vita Haroldi, 155) truly enough, "Viribus autem corporis quantum præstiterit, quam acer et strenuus [mark the standing epithet] animis armisque innotuerit, subacta, immo ad internecionem per Haroldum penè deleta, Wallia est experta."

<sup>4</sup> Giraldus (ii. 451). "Ut in eadem fere mingentem ad parietem non reliquerit."

John of Salisbury extends the campaign over two years, and Florence places the death of Gruffydd in 1064. But both the Worcester and the Peterborough Chronicles distinctly place the whole story between May and August 1063.

&lt;sup>6</sup> Fl. Wig. 1063. "Regem suum Griffinum exlegantes abjecerunt."

&lt;sup>7</sup> Chron. Wig. 1063. "Se wæs kyning ofer eall Wealcyn."

invincible, the head and shield and defender of Britons, 1 CHAP. X. was now thoroughly hated by his own people. The war murdered and its results were laid upon him as a crime,2 though we by his own cannot doubt that, in the days of success, the Welsh people Aug. 5, had been as eager as their King to carry spoil and slaughter along the Saxon border. But now outlawry was not a doom hard enough for the fallen prince; death alone was the fitting punishment for his crimes. In the month of August in this year, Gruffydd the son of Llywelyn, the last victorious hero of the old Cymrian stock, the last British chief whose name was really terrible in Saxon ears, was put to death by men of his own race, and his head was sent to the conqueror.

In this crime Harold had no share. He had been The Welsh merciless as long as resistance lasted, but as soon as the granted to foe submitted, he displayed the same politic and generous Bleddyn and Rhilenity which he always displayed towards both foreign wallon. and domestic enemies. The head of Gruffydd and the beak of his ship were brought as trophies to King Eadward. His kingdom was granted to his two brothers or kinsmen,

&lt;sup>1</sup> I quote literally the Brut y Tywysogion. Its wrong date, 1061, is corrected in the Annales Cambrize into 1063. "Griffinus filius Lewelini Rex Britonum nobilissimus dolo suorum occisus est."

&lt;sup>2</sup> Chron. Wig. He is slain "fram his agenum mannum, burh bet gewin be he won wib Harold Eorl."

The Peterborough Chronicler is almost startling in his terse brevity; "And best folc heom gislodon and to bugon, and foron sybban to, and ofslogon heora cyng Griffin and brohton Harolde his heafod." By John of Salisbury's time it was forgotten that Gruffydd was killed by his own people; with him Harold "Reges cepit et capita corum Regi qui cum miserat præsentavit" (iv. 18). The death of Gruffydd had however been decreed in the Christmas Gemót. See above, p. 468.

<sup>4</sup> Chron. Wig. "And Harold hit [Gruffydd's head] bam kynge brohte, and his scipes heafod and ba bone bermid." I do not know what the "bone" means. The Biographer (426) says nothing about the death of Gruffydd, but is eloquent about the spoil, especially the

&quot;Proram cum puppi, pondus grave scilicet auri, Artificum studio fusile multiplici."

Kings of the English Emperor. They swore oaths and gave hostages to King Eadward, and to Earl Harold, seemingly as his destined successor. They engaged also to pay the tribute which had been accustomed in past times, but which, we may be sure, had been very irregularly paid in the days of Gruffydd.

Two pieces of legislation are said to have followed the Legislation about conquest of Wales. Harold is said to have ordained that Wales. any Welshman found in arms on the English side of Offa's Dyke should lose his right hand. If this was anything more than a temporary military regulation, Harold's ordaining it can only mean that it was he who proposed the enactment to the Witan. The other decree is attributed to the special indulgence of Eadward himself. The slaughter of the male population of Wales had been so great that there was no chance of the widows and daughters of the slain finding husbands among their own people. Lest the whole race should die out, the King allowed them to marry Englishmen, which we must infer had hitherto been unlawful.<sup>5</sup> Stories like these must be

The Worcester Chronicle (1063) says expressly that the two princes were Gruffydd's brothers; "And se kyng Eadward betæhte bæt land his twars gebrobran Blebgente and Rigwatlan." In the two Welsh Chronicles no notice is taken of this investiture of Gruffydd's successors, but in 1068 we find Bleddyn and Rhiwallon reigning; they are however called sons of Cynfyn, and are described as waging war with the sons of Gruffydd. Of Bleddyn we have heard before in the invasion of Herefordshire. See above, p. 388.

&lt;sup>2</sup> See Appendix DD. The Peterborough Chronicle leaves out all mention of Eadward; "And he [Harold] sette operne cyng perto."

* Chron. Wig. "And hig [Bleddyn and Rhiwallon] abas sworon and gislas saldan beem Cynge and bæm Eorle, best heo him on allum bingum unswicende been wolden, and eighwar him gearwe, on westere and on lande, and swylc of bam lande gelæstan swylc man dyde toforan ær obrum kynge."

<sup>4</sup> Joan. Sarisb. iv. 18. "Legem statuit ut quicumque Britonum exinde citra terminum, quem eis præscripsit, fossam scilicet Offse, cum telo inveniretur, ei ab officialibus regni manus dextra præcideretur."

<sup>5</sup> Ib. "Adeoque virtute Ducis tunc Britones confecti sunt ut fere gens

taken at what they are worth. Though coming from the CHAP. X. same source, they do not bear about them the same stamp of truth as the military details of the campaign.

If any law was now passed authorizing the marriage of Englishmen and Welshwomen, the greatest of living Englishmen was not slow to take advantage of it, so far as it could be considered as extending to an Englishwoman who had become Welsh by adoption. We have now reached a year which stands bare of events in the Chronicles. It may have been the year of Harold's fatal visit to Nor-Harold mandy; it can hardly fail to have been the year of his Ealdgyth. marriage. There is nothing to imply that the great Earl 1064? had ever been married before. Putting together such indications as we have, it seems that Harold's connexion with his East-Anglian mistress Eadgyth Swanneshals, if it still existed, now came to an end.1 The bride of Harold was in some sense the prize of his own sword and spear. The fallen Gruffydd had once, like eastern Kings, taken the wife of a conquered enemy to be his wife.2 Her successor, now in her present widowhood, met, willingly or unwillingly, with the like fate. The fair Ealdgyth, the daughter of Ælfgar, the sister of Eadwine, the widow of Gruffydd, became the wife of the rival of her father, the conqueror of her husband. enemies are of course scandalized at a marriage between Harold and the widow of a man of whom they choose But it is hard to see any to call him the murderer.3 objection to the union, except the possible wrong done to tota deficere videretur, et ex indulgentia jam dicti Regis mulieres corum nupeerunt Anglis."

&lt;sup>1</sup> I shall speak more largely of her in my third volume.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Brut y Tywysogion, 1039. "Gruffydd overcame Howel and captured his wife, and took her to be his own wife."

It is certainly hard measure when Sir Francis Palgrave (Hist. Ang. Sax. p. 372) speaks of Harold's wife as "her whose husband he had murdered." Did Alexander murder Darius?

ie mar-

age proddy a htical 1e

nothing. Ealdgyth may, lib. ku Du Carlier Damesak the forsaken Eadgyth. Of the parties conquestion nothing. Ealdgyth may, like an somewhat similar case, have inspired of the conquestion. But it the forsaken Eaugyth.

The forsaken Eaugyth may, like an nothing. Ealdgyth may, like an somewhat similar case, have inspired of likes, and like main object was to win to his side, so love in against himself great Mercian house which had stood in slip against himself and his contact an against himself and his father. Harold in sheads a Crown in prospect, acted after the manner of heads. Eadgyth was partial Crowned. AGP MOD almost certainly married, in order to secur Mercia votes in the Gemot which should finally disp se of the Kingdom. Harold doubtless flattered himsel that by this marriage he had extended his influence whole Kingdom. He himself ruled in over the baser; one brother ruled in Northumberland, another in the South-Eastern shires. And now the shire Earldom was in the hands of the wrother one another in the South-Eastern survey another in the South-Eastern survey and the Lard of the last events turned out, Harold would have of his remaining Earldom was in the hammer remaining Earldom was in the hammer and humbler love have done wife. But, as events turned out, better to cleave to his earlier and humbler love whose done better to cleave to his earlier and death. He Sained little for him survived desertion and dearm.

seeking political support in an union with the widow of a traitor. Of Ealdgyth widow of a traitor we know what personall. for him survived description an united seeking political support in an united seeking political seeking political support for and the sister of a traitor. Of his know hardly anything; but we know what her bersonally we and, when the day of trial came, she her brothers ther than with her here to here for and the sister of a know hardly anything; but we know hardly anything; but here brothers than with her brothers to have hardly anything hardly an were, and, when the day of triai with her seems to sided with her brothers rather than with her husband.

ADWARD.

Wales was thus, to all appearance, thoroughly con-Wales was thus, to all appearance quered. North Wales, the original Kingdom or one consumer to have remained fairly quiet; but of Growydd. Wales was quered. North Wales, the original seems to have remained fairly quiet; but of Grown con-elements of seems to have remained to have remained sources not have one writers is soon that "the marriage could hardly have one writers is soon her passions."

disturbance still lingered in the South. King Eadward CHAP. X. was growing old, but he still retained his love of hunting, and a new field seemed to be opened for the royal sport in the wild lands which had been lately brought into fuller subjection to the royal authority. In the low lands of Harold Gwent, near one of the usual places of crossing the mouth hunting. of the Severn from England into Wales, the Earl chose seat at Portout a place called Porth-iscoed or Portskewet as well skewet. suited for his sovereign's diversions. One of the great 1065. Gemóts of each year was now so regularly held at Gloucester that a place at no very great distance from that city might seem well convenient for the purpose. But besides this, it was an obvious policy thus to take seizin, as it were, of the conquered lands, and to show to their inhabitants that the English Emperor was to be for the future a really present master. At Portskewet then Earl Harold began to build a house, and he had gathered together a large number of workmen and an abundant store of provisions and other good things. We see how thoroughly subdued the whole country was held to be, even this corner which did not belong to the immediate realm of the conquered Gruffydd, and which is not likely to have been the actual seat of warfare. It shows also the half-kingly position of Harold that he is described as acting in this way in a district not belonging to his own Earldom, but included in the dominions of a vassal prince. We do not read that Eadward ordered the building of the house; it seems rather like a voluntary act of Harold's own, rising out of his personal consideration for his royal brother-in-law's pleasure. Nor do we hear anything of discontent on the part of the newly appointed princes of the country. But there was one to whom a Saxon settlement on the soil of Gwent was far more inkert than it could be to any prince of Powys or Gwyne on the inherited and dispossessed chieftain still looked on the land as his own, and probable as his own, and probably deemed Harold ap Gruffydd to be equally intruders. This was Caradoo to bad been slain, and his Kingdom avoared stora Gruffydd whose career had so lately come According to one account, he had been him by order of Harold.2 At any rate, the sigh of the palace of the English overload, rising in a district which had once been his father's, rankled in his soul. once been his manner so, really all the work on the unas large a band as he could, he came a band as large as large a band as he could, he came a band as large a band as he could, he came a band as large a band a band a band a band a band a band a ban He gathered finished building, he slew nearly and the finished building, he slew nearly and the ried off all the good things which had been men, and carried off all the King. 3 Such a raid was do provided for ried off all the good things with them and for the King. Such a raid was do provided for them and for the King. Such a raid was do provided for them and for the King. Such a raid was do provided for them and for the King. in the desolating border-warfare which was common between the English and Welsh, but it is clear that a between this act of Canada and a stacked to this act of Canada and a stacked to this act of Canada and a stacked to the stacked special political importance attached to this act of Caradoc. One of the Chroniclers adds significantly, "We know not who this ill counsel first devised." These words, taken who this in which we shall have presently to speak of, may perhaps suggest the idea that this lesser disturbance in South Wales was not without connexion with the more important events in England which presently followed it.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Chron. Ab. 1065. "Harold Eorl . . . bone Kingc Eadward bar to habbene for huntnobes bingon." So Flor. Wig. "Ut Dominus suus Rex Eadwardus illic aliquamdiu venationis caussa degere possit."

These sumu to, mid callum

North-Walshold. i. 507. Craddoc, Griffini filius, que some con laverat Haroldus." This may however be some con

See above, p. 387. Florence expressly distinguished blim as "Alice Regis Suth-Walanorum Occiderationi, quem ante panco Annos Griffinus Rez North-Walanorum occiderat, ejusque regnum invas

Gruffydd ap Gruffydd ap Wig. 1065. "Pa for Cradoc Gri bem be be begytan mibte, and bet folc must be be begytan be bar gegaderod and but god genam be bar gegadered was," d bet god general to wiston we have bone unn

CHAP. X.

§ 3. The Revolt of Northumberland. 1065.

If Eadward or Harold made any preparations to avenge the insult offered by Caradoc to the Imperial authority, their attention was soon called off from that corner of the Empire to a far greater movement in the Earldom of Northumberland. However righteous may have been the Oppression intentions with which Tostig set out, however needful of Tostig a wholesome severity may have been in the then state humberof his province, it is clear that his government had by this time degenerated into an insupportable tyranny. This is not uncommonly the case with men of his disposition, a disposition evidently harsh, obstinate, and impatient of opposition. Rigid justice, untempered by mercy, easily changes into oppression. The whole province rose against Revolt of him. His apologist tries to represent the leaders of the humbrians movement as wrong-doers whom the Earl's strict justice against had chastised or offended. Such may well have been October 3. the case, but the long list of grievances put forth by the Northumbrians, though it may easily have been exaggerated, cannot have been wholly invented. He had Charges robbed God; 2 elsewhere Tostig bears a high reputation for Tostig. piety, and, in any case, the charge must be taken with the same allowance as the like charges against his brother. But he had also robbed many men of land and of life,3 he had raised up unjust law,4 and had laid on the Earldom a tax wholly beyond its means to bear.5 A list of particular

VOL. II.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Vita Eadw. 421. "Interea quorumdam nobilium factione quos ob nequitias suas gravi presserat dominatûs sui jugo, conjurant in invicem in ejus præjudicio."

&lt;sup>2</sup> Chron. Ab. 1065. "Forbam ba he rypte God ærost."

&lt;sup>3</sup> Ib. "And ealle be bestrypte be he ofer mihte, at life and at lande."

&lt;sup>4</sup> Ib. "Ealle ba mid hym be unlage rærdon." On the untranslatable phrase of unlaw, see above, p. 336.

&lt;sup>5</sup> Fl. Wig. 1065. "Pro immensitate tributi quod de tota Northhymbria injustè acceperat."

Murder of Gamel and UNE 1064.

CHAP. x. crimes is added. Two Thegas, Gamel the son of Orm and Ulf the son of Dolfin, had, in the course of the last year, been received in the Earl's chamber under pretence of peace, and had been there treacherously slain by his order.1 That is to say, Tostig had repeated one of the worst deeds of Harthacnut,<sup>2</sup> and of Cnut himself before his reformation.<sup>3</sup> These men may have been criminals; Tostig may have persuaded himself that he was simply doing an act of irregular justice in thus destroying men who were perhaps too powerful to be reached by the ordinary course of law. But, whatever were the crimes of Ulf and Gamel, Tostig, by this act, degraded himself to their level. If even the most guilty were to be cut off in such a way as this, even the most innocent could not feel themselves safe. Another charge aimed yet higher than the Earl himself. accomplice of his misdeeds is spoken of, whom we should certainly never have been expected to find charged with Murder of bloodshed. A Thegn named Gospatric had been, at the last Christmas Gemót, treacherously murdered in the King's court. The deed was said to have been done by order of the Lady at the instigation of her brother.4 As there were other bearers of the name, we may at least hope that this Gospatric was not the one who had so nobly jeoparded his life to save the life of Tostig on his return from his Roman pilgrimage. To avenge these crimes, the CHAP. X. chief men of both divisions of Northumberland, at the head of the whole force of Bernicia and Deira,2 rose in arms.3 Soon after Michaelmas, two hundred Thegns 4 came to Rebel York, and there held what they evidently intended to be York. a Gemót of the ancient Kingdom of Northumberland. October 3, They were headed by several of the greatest men of Northern England, by Gamel-bearn, doubtless a kinsman of the slain son of Orm, by Dunstan the son of Æthelnoth, and Glonieorn the son of Heardulf.<sup>5</sup> The names seem to show that both English and Danish blood was represented in the Assembly. Tostig was now absent from his Earldom; he was engaged with the King in his constant diversion of hunting, in some of the forests of Wiltshire or Hampshire.6 But the rebels needed not his presence, and they began at once to pass decrees in utter defiance of the royal authority. Earls had hitherto always been appointed and removed by Constituthe King and his Witan, and any complaints of the tion of Northumbrians against Tostig ought legally to have been Northbrought before a Gemót of the whole realm. But nowhere land. was the feeling of provincial independence so strong as in the lands north of the Humber. The Northumbrians

Gospatric. December 28, 1064

&lt;sup>1</sup> Flor. Wig. 1065. "Pro exsecranda nece . . Gamelis filii Orm ac Ulfi filii Dolfini quos anno præcedenti Eboraci in camera sua, sub pacis fædere, per insidias, Comes Tostius occidere precepit." Dolfin and Orm both appear in Domesday, seemingly as holders under William of small parts of great estates held under Eadward. See 278 b, 330 b, 331 b. Orm married Æthelthryth, a daughter of Earl Ealdred (Sim. Dun. X Scriptt. 82) and sister-in-law of Earl Siward (see vol. i. p. 587), but Gamel was not her son.

&lt;sup>3</sup> See vol. i. p. 416. <sup>2</sup> See vol. i. p. 588. <sup>4</sup> Fl. Wig. "Pro exsecranda nece... Gospatrici, quem Regina Edgitha, germani sui Tostii caussă, in curiă Regis, quartă nocte Dominice nativitatis, per insidias occidi jussit." The deed here attributed to Eadgyth reminds one of the old crimes of Eadric at Oxford and Shrewsbury. See vol. i. pp. 356, 411.

&lt;sup>1</sup> See above, p. 457.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Chron. Wig. 1065. "And sons æfter þisan gegaderedon þa þegenss hi ealle on Eoforwicscire and on Norohymbralande togædere." Here we have perhaps the earliest use of the name Yorkshire, and of the name Northhumberland in its modern sense. See vol. i. p. 585. The Abingdon Chronicle has only "on Eoforwicecire," and Peterborough says "foron Northymbra togædere."

&lt;sup>3</sup> I have, as usual, made a comparison of the narratives in an Appendix (Note HH), referring here only to details.

&lt;sup>4</sup> Flor. Wig. 1065. "Cum oo. militibus."

The names come from Florence. All three appear in Domesday as great landowners, Gamel especially, in King Eadward's time. In 1086 Gamel still holds in capite a small part of his vast estates in Yorkshire (331), while his small Staffordshire holding seems to be increased (250 b). Dunstan has sunk to be a tenant of Ilbert of Lacy (317 b), while Glonieorn, called in Domesday Glunier (298 et al.), has, either by death or by confisca-• See Appendix HH. tion, vanished altogether.

CHAP. x. remembered that there had been a time when they had chosen and deposed Kings for themselves, without any reference to a West-Saxon overlord. The West-Saxon King was now no longer an overlord, but an immediate sovereign; Northumberland was no longer a dependency, but an integral part of the Kingdom; the men of Deirs and Bernicia shared every right which was enjoyed by the men of Wessex and East-Anglia. But the old feelings still lingered on, and they were probably heightened by the constant absence of the King and even of his lieutenant. Eadward had never shown himself further north than Gloucester, or possibly Shrewsbury; 1 there is no record of any Gemót of his reign being held at York or Lincoln. And the frequent absences of Tostig, whom Eadward loved to Frequent absence of have about him, are clearly implied to have been reckoned Tostig. among the grievances of his province.2 While he was busied in the frivolities of Eadward's court, the care of Northumberland was entrusted to a Thegn of the country, Copsige by name. He is described as a prudent man and a benefactor to the Church of Durham. It does not appear how far he now shared the unpopularity of his master, but it is certain that, at a later time, he incurred equal unpopularity by his own acts. He seems afterwards to have borne the title of Earl,3 and it is possible that he may

Copsige, deputy Earl.

&lt;sup>1</sup> The regulations made for the King's reception at Shrewsbury (Domesday, 252) show that his presence there was not unlikely, and there was at least one Gemot held there in the time of Æthelred. p. 356. One of the legends of Harold and Tostig (see Appendix Z) implies the King's probable presence at Hereford; but we do not distinctly hear of him further north than Gloucester.

&lt;sup>3</sup> Sim. Dun. Hist. Eccl. Dun. iii. 14 (X Scriptt. 37). "Quidam vocabulo Copsi, qui sub Tosti totius comitatûs curam gerebat." Gest. Regg. Angl. a. 1072 (X Scriptt. 204). "Rex Willelmus comitatum Osulfi commisit Copsio, qui erat partis Tostii Comitis viro consiliario et prudenti." In Domesday also (298 b et al.) he figures as Copsi, but his estates do not seem to have been very large. His gifts to the Church of Durham are mentioned by Simeon (X Scriptt. 37). The Norman writers, as William of Poitiers (148 ed. Giles), turn his name into Coxo, out of which Thierry, even have borne it now as Tostig's deputy. This syste- CHAP. X. matic government by proxy was no doubt highly offensive to Northumbrian local patriotism. It was, in a marked way, dealing with the land as a mere dependency. The Danes of the North were indignant that their ancient realm should be deemed unworthy of the presence, not only of the King but of its own Earl. They had no mind to be governed by orders sent forth from some West-Saxon The Northumbrians therefore, town or hunting-seat. without presence or licence of King or Earl, took upon them to hold a Gemót, doubtless an armed Gemót, of the revolted lands.

The Assembly thus irregularly got together did not Acts of the indeed venture on the extreme step of renouncing all York. allegiance to the King of the English. But everything October 3, 1065. short of this extreme step was quickly done. The Merciless Parliament of later days could not surpass this Northhumbrian Gemót in violent or in blood-thirsty decrees. Vote of The rebels passed a vote of deposition against their Earl deposition and out-Tostig; they declared him an outlaw, and elected in his lawry place Morkere, the younger son of Ælfgar of Mercia.2 Tostig. Waltheof, the son of Siward, was passed by, and they Morkere elected may have felt the danger of the rivalries which were Earl. sure to arise if they chose one of the ordinary Thegns by way of being specially Teutonic, has made Kox. (Cf. "Alwinus Coc Bedellus" in Domesday 190, a prudent man who held at the Survey what he had held T. R. E.) They also call him "Comes," though Simeon (X Scriptt. 37) seems, even under William, to give him no higher title than "Procurator" - Gerefa?

- <sup>1</sup> Chronn. Wig. Petrib. 1065. The Abingdon Chronicler omits this decree, which marks the gathering as intended to assume the character of a lawful Gemót.
- <sup>2</sup> Chronn. Wig. Petrib. "And sendon æfter Morkere Ælfgares sunu Eorles, and gecuron hine heom to Eorle." To the same effect afterwards Chron. Ab. "Hig namon heom ba Morkere to Eorle." Vita Eadw. 421. "Utque efferæ temeritatis haberent auctoritatem, caput sibi et dominum faciunt Ducis Alfgari filium juniorem, ejusque fratrem natu majorem, ad hanc societatem dementiæ suæ invitant."

series of treasons which he had, within a very few years, the opportunity of practising against four sovereigns in succesturn that no trust was to be put in the allegiance or the

Eadward, Harold, Eadgar, and William all found is OHAR. x. of the country.1 Still the election of Morkere, and the whole circumstances of the story, seem to show that, along with the real grievances of Northumberland, the intriges of the Mercian brothers had a good deal to do with the stirring up of this revolt. The old rivalry between the houses of Godwine and Leofric had now taken the form of a special enmity between Tostig and the sons of Ælfgar. The marriage of Ealdgyth with Harold doubtless protected her husband from any open hostility on the part of her brothers, though it certainly did not save him from their secret cabals. Eadwine, in short, was now entering on that Treasons of Eadwine.

the division of the Kingdom.

oaths of the Earl of the Mercians. The treasons of Eadwine were often passive rather than active; they never reached the height of personal betrayal; otherwise the last Mercian Earl was no unworthy representative of his predecessors His policy; Ælfric and Eadric. Still the policy of the sons of Ælfgar was at any rate more intelligible than the policy of the arch-traitor. Their object evidently was to revive the old division of the Kingdom, as it had been divided between Cnut and Eadmund, or between Harold and Harthacnut. When the death of Eadward should leave the throne vacant, they were ready to leave Wessex, and probably East-Anglia, to any one who could get them, but Mercia and Northumberland were to form a separate realm under the house of Leofric. This view of their policy explains all their later actions. They dreamed of dividing the Kingdom with Harold; they dreamed of dividing it with Eadgar; they even dreamed, one can hardly doubt, of dividing it with William himself. They were ready enough to accept West-Saxon help in their own hour of need, but oner. x. they would not strike a blow on behalf of Wessex in her greatest extremity. The present movement in Northhumberland, above all the election of Morkere to the Earldom, exactly suited their purposes. It was more than the mere exaltation of one of the brothers; it was more than the transfer of one of the great divisions of the Kingdom from the house of Godwine to the house of Leofric. The whole land from the Thames to the Tweed was now united under the rule of the two brothers. There was now a much fairer hope of changing the northern and central Earldoms into a separate Kingdom, as soon as a vacancy of the throne should occur. When therefore the Northumbrians sent for Morkere, offering him their Earldom, he gladly accepted the offer. He took into his own hands the government of Deira, or, as it is now beginning to be called, Yorkshire. But he entrusted the government Oswulf in of the Northern province, the old Bernicia, now beginning to be distinctively called Northumberland, to the young Oswulf, the son of Siward's victim Eadwulf.<sup>2</sup> We have no account of the motives of this appointment. It may have been a condition of Morkere's election; it may have been a popular act done of his own accord. But in either case this appointment seems to show that the Northhumbrians bore no special love to Siward or his house, but that they rather looked with affection on the more direct representative of their ancient Earls. Oswulf is spoken of as a youth at this time, but as it was now twenty-four years since the murder of his father, he must have been a grown man. Waltheof, the son of Siward, so obar. x. eminent only two years later, could not have been much younger. If Siward's memory had been at all popular in Northumberland, Waltheof, rather than Oswulf, would surely have been chosen for this important subordinate government, even if it was not thought proper to entrust him with the command of the whole of the ancient Kingdom.

&lt;sup>1</sup> See above, p. 378.

&lt;sup>2</sup> See above, p. 434.

&lt;sup>1</sup> See above, p. 482.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Sim. Dun. Gest. Regg. 1072 (X Scriptt. 204). "Morkarus vero, quoniam alias gravibus negotiis impeditus fuerat, comitatum ultra Tynam tradidit Osulfo adolescenti, filio przefati Comitis Kadulfi." We shall hear of him again.

larly called together, had acted in something like the character of a lawful Gemót. To depose and elect an Earl was a stretch of power beyond the constitutional authority of a local Gemót; still the unconstitutional character of the act consisted solely in the Gemót of a single Earldom taking upon itself functions which lawfully belonged only to a Gemót of the whole Kingdom. But the Thegns who were assembled at York went on to acts which showed that, however guilty Tostig may have been, they at least had small right to throw stones at him. Slaughter and plunder were soon shown to be quite as much their objects as the redress of grievances or the punishment of offenders. The North- On Monday, the first day of the Assembly, two of Tostig's

Danish Housecarls, Amund and Reavenswart, who had fled from York, were overtaken, and were put to death without the walls of the city.1 How far these men deserved their doom, how far their doom was the sentence of anything

The Northhumbrians slay Amund and Ravenswart.
October 3.

The names come from Florence, who (see Appendix HH) describes them as "illius [Tostii] Danicos huscarlas, Amundum et Reavensvartum." "Danicus" is an ambiguous word, and does not show whether they were simply adventurers from Denmark or sons of followers of Cnut. The name would hardly be applied to descendants of the elder Danish settlers. At any rate, one of these men was a considerable landowner, and both, from their special mention, must have been men of some importance, probably officers in command of the force. Reavenswart is doubtless the man who, under several spellings, occurs as a landowner T. R. E. in Yorkshire, Shropshire, and Cheshire (Domesday, 257, 266, 268 b, 301 b). The Amund of Suffolk, 433, 433 b, and 441 b, is a different person, but may not "Anand huscarl R. E." in Hertfordshire, 140 b, be a corrupt form of our Amund?

which even pretended to be a lawful tribunal, we have no CHAP. X. means of knowing. But it is hardly possible that there General can have been even the shadow of lawful authority for massacre of Tostig's the acts of the next day. As many of Tostig's personal followers, followers, English and Danish, as could be found, two der of his hundred in number, were massacred. The Earl's treasury October 4. was next broken open, and all its contents, weapons, gold, silver, and other precious things, were carried off. This may have been a rough and ready way of repaying themselves for the unjust tax of which they complained; otherwise any notion of policy would rather have bidden them to hand over the treasures of their enemy untouched to the chief whom they had themselves chosen.2

The real character of the revolt, as far at least as the Morkere's sons of Ælfgar were concerned, soon showed itself. Mor- southkere did not sit down quietly to reign in Northumberland; wards. he does not seem to have even demanded the consent of the King and of the national Witan to his usurpation. He at once marched southwards. On his march he was joined by the men of the shires of Lincoln, Nottingham, and Derby.<sup>3</sup> These were districts in which the Danish element was strong, especially in their three chief towns, which were reckoned among the famous Five Boroughs.4 At the Morkere at head of this force he reached Northampton. This town ton. was probably chosen as the head-quarters of the rebels, as being, like Northumberland itself, under the government of Tostig. Whatever were their designs as to the Earldoms of Northampton and Huntingdon, it was in any case important to win over their inhabitants to the cause

<sup>1</sup> See Appendix HH.

4 See vol. i. pp. 51, 64, 411.

&lt;sup>5</sup> Chronn. Wig. Petrib. 1065. "And naman ealle his weepna on Eoforwic and gold and seolfer and calle his sceattas, be hig minton ahwær ber geacsian." Fl. Wig. "Ararium Quoque ipsius fregerunt, et omnibus que illius fuerant ablatis, recesserunt. "Will. Malms. (ii. 200). "Homines ejus, et Anglos et Danos, obtruncarant, equos et arma, et supellectilem omnem corradentes."

&lt;sup>a</sup> See Appendix HH.

CHAP. X. of the revolt. At Northampton Morkere was met

Presence of Welshmen in Eadwine's army.

the North-about ton.

by his brother Eadwine, at the head of the men of his Earldom, together with a large body of Welsh.1 Were these last simply drawn thither by the chance of plunder? Were they followers of the last Gruffydd, faithful to the old connexion between Ælfgar and their slain King? Or are we to see something deeper in the matter? It may well be that the movement in Gwent and the movement in Northumberland were both of them parts of one scheme devised in the restless brain of the Mercian Earl. The way in which one event followed on the other, the significant remark made by the Chronicler on the deed of Caradoc,2 the suspicious appearance of Welshmen in the train of Eadwine, all look the same way. Caradoc and Gamel-bearn are not likely to have had any direct communication with one another; but it is quite possible that both of them may have been little more than puppets moved by a single hand. At all events, a great force, Northumbrian, Mercian, and Welsh, was now gathered Ravages of together at Northampton. The Northumbrians were in humbrians what they doubtless expected to be a friendly country, but it would seem that they found the men of Northamp-Northamptonshire and Huntingdonshire less zealous in the cause than they had hoped. At least we find that Morkere's Northern followers dealt with the country about Northhampton as if it had been the country of an enemy. They slew men, burned corn and houses, carried off cattle, and at last led captive several hundred prisoners, seemingly as slaves.3 The blow was so severe that it was remembered

&lt;sup>1</sup> Chronn. Wig. Petrib. "And eac fela Bryttas comon mid him."

&lt;sup>2</sup> See above, p. 479.

&lt;sup>3</sup> Chron, Wig. "And ba Rybrenan dydan mycelne hearm abutan Hamtune, . . . ægbær þæt hi ofslogon menn, and bærndon hús and corn, and namon call best orf be hig minton to cuman, best was feels busend, and fela hund manna hi naman, and læddan norð mid heom." I do not know that the word "Rybrenan" occurs elsewhere; but the hope that it might even when one would have thought that that and all CHAP. X. other lesser wrongs would have been forgotten in the general overthrow of England. Northamptonshire and the shires near to it were for many winters the worse.1

It seems to have been at Northampton that the first Harold attempts at negotiation began between the King and the carries insurgents.2 Eadward and Tostig were still in their wood- from the land retreats, enjoying the slaughter of unresisting animals, the insurwhile half England was in confusion, and while whole shires were being laid waste. The Earl of the West-Saxons was most likely as keen a hunter as either of them, but he at least did not let his sport interfere with his duty to his country. While his brother and brother-in-law still remained in the woods, Earl Harold hastened to Northhampton with a message from the King. Eadward, who had once been so wrathful at Godwine's appeal to Law on behalf of the men of Dover,3 had now, under Harold's guidance, better learned the duties of a constitutional King. Through the mouth of the great Earl, he called on Demands the men of Northumberland to lay down their arms, to of Ead-ward. cease from their ravages, and, if they had any matter against their own Earl, to bring it forward for discussion in a lawful Assembly. We may conceive the feeling of triumph with which Harold put into the King's mouth the very words which, in the mouth of Godwine, had led to the temporary overthrow of himself and his house. But the Northumbrians would not yield to any proposal which Answer of implied even the possibility of Tostig's return to power. humbrians. They were freemen born and bred, they would not bow mean Welshmen is dispelled by the word "nore," and still more clearly by the words of the Peterborough Chronicler, who, for "ba Rybrenan" reads "ha norderne menn." The evil doers were clearly the original Northumbrian revolters.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Chronn. Wig. Petrib. 1065. "Swa beet see scir and ba offra scira bee ber neah sindon wurdan fela wintra be wyrsan."

&lt;sup>3</sup> On the negotiations, see Appendix HH. See above, p. 136.

CHAP. X. to the pride of any Earl; they had learned from their fathers to bear no third choice besides freedom or death. If the King wished to retain Northumberland in his allegiance, he must confirm the banishment of Tostig from Northumberland and from all England, he must confirm the election of Morkere to the Northern Earldom. persisted in forcing Tostig upon them, they would deal with him as an enemy; if he yielded to their demands, he would see what loyal subjects Northumbrians could be, when they were gently ruled by a ruler of their own choice.2 Brave words truly, if they really came from the heart of the Northumbrian people, and were not simply put into their mouths by two ambitious Earls. than one message passed to and fro; messengers from the rebel camp accompanied Harold to the royal presence;3 but there was no sign of yielding on the part of the host encamped at Northampton. At last the matter became so serious that Eadward left his hunting to apply himself personally to the affairs of his Kingdom. At a royal abode called Bretford, near Salisbury, a place whose name suggests memories of the warfare of five hundred years before, Eadward called an Assembly together. It probably professed to be a Witenagemót of the whole realm, but it must rather have been a meeting of the King's immediate counsellors, or at most, of the local Witan of Wessex. This Assembly at once proceeded to discuss the state of the nation; 4 and the record of their debates at least shows what full freedom of speech was allowed in our ancient Eadward holds a (lemót at Bretford.

Debate in the Council; accusations against Tostig.

national Councils. Some speakers boldly accused Tostig

&lt;sup>1</sup> Will. Malms. ii. 200. "Se nullius Ducis ferociam pati posse." See Appendix HH.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Ib. "Proinde, si subditos velit, Markerium filium Elgari eis præficiat, re experturum quam dulciter sciant obedire, si dulciter tractati fuerint."

* Chronn. Wig. Petrib. "And eac ærendracan mid him sendon."

<sup>4</sup> Vita Eadw. 422. "Accitis undique regni primatibus, habebat ibi consilium quid super tali negotio esset opus."

of cruelty and avarice; his severities had been caused, not CHAP. X. by any love of justice, but by a wish to seize on the wealth of the rich men of Northumberland. It was affirmed, on Tostig the other hand, that the revolt against Tostig had been Harold simply got up by the secret machinations of Harold. No with stircharge could be more unjust, and we may suspect that it revolt. was brought forward by no mouth but that of Tostig himself.2 Harold throughout tried in vain to reconcile the revolters to his brother.3 Up to this time there is not the Improbaslightest sign in any trustworthy account of any quarrel charge. between the two brothers.4 Now that the revolt had broken out, it was undoubtedly Harold's interest to settle matters without bloodshed, even at the expense of his brother; but he had no interest, but quite the contrary, in stirring up the revolt in the first instance. It was prudent, under the circumstances, to yield to the demands of the Northumbrians, and to allow the aggrandizement of the rival house; but Harold could have no motive for seeking, of his own accord, to transfer Northumberland from a son of Godwine to a son of Ælfgar. But Tostig doubtless expected his brother to support him, right or wrong, at all hazards and against all foes, and he could not understand any cause for Harold's hesitating so to do except his being art and part with his enemies. Before the King and all his Court, Tostig so vehemently charged Harold with having kindled the Northumbrian revolt, that Harold

&lt;sup>1</sup> Vita Eadw. 422. "Culpabant nonnulli eumdem gloriosum Ducem nimize feritatis, et magis amore justitize inquietos punisse arguebatur cupiditati invadendæ eorum facultatis." I suppose I have caught the meaning of this stiff bit of Latin.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Ib. "Dicebatur quoque [mark the difference of the formula], si dignum esset credere, fratris sui Haroldi invidioso, quod absit, suasu, hanc dementiam contra Ducem suum aggressos esse." The Biographer expresses his own disbelief; "Sed ego huic detestabili nequitize a tanto principe in fratrem suum non audeo nec vellem fidem adhibere." The Biographer, the special apologist of Tostig, is here driven to his last shift.

&lt;sup>3</sup> Chron. Ab. and Florence. See Appendix HH.

&lt;sup>4</sup> See Appendix Z.

Harold denies it on oath.

eagerness for war.

1041.

CHAP. x. thought it necessary to deny the charge, in the usual solemn form, upon oath. It appears that the Earl's own oath was thought enough, and that compurgators were not called for. But the question how to quell the revolt was still more urgent than the question how the revolt Eadward's arose. The King was as vehement against the real rebels of Northumberland as he had been, fourteen years before, against the fancied rebels of Dover. He was as eager to avenge the wrongs of his English favourite Tostig as he had then been to avenge the wrongs of his foreign favourite Eustace. He would, doubtless by deputy, chastise their insolence with the edge of the sword; it would almost seem that the royal summons went out, calling the whole force of England to the royal standard.2 But Eadward had counsellors about him who were wiser than himself. They, Harold doubtless at their head, shrank as soldiers from a winter campaign and as patriots from a civil war. They pleaded that, with these two great difficulties in the way of immediate action, it would be impossible to collect an army able to cope with the insurgents.3 The Housecarls of the King and of the Earl were doubtless ready to march at their command; but, of all courses in the world, none could be so unpopular as to employ this force to put down a popular insurrection. It would be a renewal of the days of Harthacnut and of the march against Worcester.4 The

> <sup>1</sup> Vita Eadw. 422. "Ipse tamen Dux Tostinus, coram Rege ejusque frequentibus palatinis publicè testatus, hoc illi imposuit, sed ille citiùs ad sacramenta nimis (proh dolor) prodigus [on this most remarkable allusion, see above, p. 43], hoc objectum sacramentis purgavit."

<sup>2</sup> Ib. 423. "Multotiens ergo à Rege per legatos consulti quum non adquiescerent, sed potius incepta dementia amplius furerent, ferro disponit eorum contumacem proterviam compescere, commotis regali edicto universis totius reliquiis Angliæ."

<sup>3</sup> Ib. "Sed quia ex asperiori hieme jam tunc aëris incumbebat inequalitas, tum non facile erat ad contrariam expeditionem sufficientes educere exercituum copias, et quia în eadem gente horrebat quasi bellum civile, instabant quidam ferventem Regis animum sedare, et ne expeditio procederet, suadere." <sup>4</sup> See vol. i. pp. 578, 579.

King was so eager for battle that his advisers could not, CHAP. x. after all, persuade him formally to revoke his orders for He is prewar; but they took means to prevent the expedition from Harold and actually taking place. So to do would be no very difficult others. task, when the feeling of the chiefs and of the people was doubtless exactly the same. So great was Eadward's wrath and excitement of mind that he fell into the illness of which he never recovered. He complained bitterly before God that he was hindered from chastising the unrighteous, and called for divine vengeance seemingly alike upon the original offenders, and on those who stood in the way of their punishment.<sup>2</sup> But the wrath of the Saint, if violent for the time, was not always lasting,3 and however vigorous he may have been in curses and prophecies, he seems to have practically allowed Harold to act in his name, and to settle matters as he chose.4

The course for Harold to take was obvious, whether looked Position of at from the point of view of his own interest or from that His public of the interest of his country. The dictates of the two were duty in the exactly the same; both alike prompted him to secure a real versy. and great advantage at the cost of a certain sacrifice of pride and passion. The revolt of the Northumbrians could not be justified on any showing. They had undoubtedly

<sup>1</sup> This seems implied in the words of the Biographer (423); "Obluctatique diutius Regem proficisci volentem non tam avertunt, quam eo invito perperam deficiunt."

&lt;sup>2</sup> Vita Eadw. 423. "Contestatusque Deum cum gravi mœrore ipsi conquestus est quod suorum debito destitueretur obauditu ad comprimendam iniquorum superbiam. Denique super eos imprecatus est vindictam."

&lt;sup>3</sup> See above, pp. 23, 137.

<sup>4</sup> Chronn. Wig. and Petrib. "And se cyng bæs geude, and sende eft Harold heom to Hamtune" [it should be Oxford, see Appendix HH]. William of Malmesbury (iii. 252) does not ill describe the state of things; "Fiebant ista, ut a consciis accepimus, infenso Rege, quia Tostinum diligeret; sed morbo invalidus, senio gravis, penè jam despectui omnibus habere coeperat ut dilecto auxiliari non posset." When William wrote, Eadward, however much reverenced, was not yet formally canonized.

suffered great wrongs, but they had not taken the right means to redress them. Their proper course would undoubtedly have been that which Harold himself suggested, to bring their charges against their Earl for public inquiry in a Witenagemót of the whole realm. The Gemót at York had usurped functions which did not belong to it; the deposition and outlawry of Tostig, and the election of Morkere, were utterly illegal proceedings. The massacre and plunder at York, above all the ravages in Northamptonshire, were still more thoroughly unjustifiable. All these were doings which, in one man or in a few men, would have called for exemplary punishment. But in a case like this, where the guilty parties were the great bulk of the people of all Northumberland and of several shires of Mercia, it was absurd to talk of punishment. The question was not a question of punishment, but one of peace or Was it either right or expedient, in the general interest of the Kingdom of England, for Wessex and East-Anglia to make war upon Northumberland and Mercia? The object of such a war would have been simply to force on Northumberland an Earl whom the Northumbrian people had rejected, and who had shown himself utterly unfit for his post. The royal authority would undoubtedly suffer some humiliation by yielding to demands which had been supported by armed force; still such humiliation would be a less evil than a civil war, the issue of which would be very doubtful, and whose results, in any case, would prove most baneful, if not ruinous, to the country. As a brother, Harold had done all for his brother that could be asked of him, in his proposal made in the first conference at Northhampton. It could not be his duty-I quote the judgement of a writer of the next age not specially favourable to Harold 1—to bring such untold evils on his country merely for the chance of restoring his brother to the CHAP. X. authority which he had so deeply abused. Harold therefore, as a statesman and a patriot, rightly determined to yield to the demands of the insurgents.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Will. Malms. ii. 200. "Haroldus . . . qui magis quietem patriz quam fratris commodum attenderet."

It is equally plain that exactly the same course was His private dictated to him by his own interests as a candidate for the interest. Crown. He had lost in every way by the revolt. Hitherto agreement all England, except Mercia, had been under the govern- of the two. ment of himself and his brothers. The House of Godwine held four out of the five great Earldoms; the House of Leofric held only one. Now things were turned about. The House of Godwine still held three Earldoms, while the House of Leofric held but two; but the two which were held by the House of Leofric formed a larger, and a far more compact and united, territory than the three which were held by the House of Godwine. The opposition of a candidate from the rival family, or a proposal for the division of the Kingdom, was incomparably more likely, now that the vast region between the Thames and the Tweed was practically under the control of a single will, and that a will which Harold had small means of influencing. But, deeply as Harold had lost by the Northumbrian revolution, he would have lost still more by an attempt to bring about a counterrevolution by force. Whether such an attempt succeeded or failed, the result would be much the same. In either case his wife's brothers, and the vast districts over which they ruled, would become, not merely indifferent or unfriendly to his claims, but avowedly and bitterly hostile. In the face of their open enmity, his succession to the whole Kingdom would be hopeless; he might possibly become King of the West-Saxons; he could never become King of the English. The tie of affinity was weak, the tie of gratitude was likely to be still weaker. Still it was the wisest course to make the best even of those weak ties It was wise to do his brothers-in-law a good turn, and so to take his chance of CHAP. x. winning their good will, rather than at once to turn them into deadly foes. It was true that every step by which he conciliated his brothers-in-law would make a bitterer enemy of his own brother. But his mere hesitation and moderation were already in the eyes of Tostig an unpardonable offence; his brother's enmity he had won already, and he could hardly foresee that that enmity would one day be still more dangerous to him than any opposition that was to be dreaded from Mercia or Northumberland.

•

Gemót of Oxford. 1065.

On these grounds then, public and private, Harold, October 28, armed, it would now seem, with the full royal authority, determined to yield to the insurgents. While their answer was under discussion in the King's court, they had been ravaging Northamptonshire, and they had since advanced as far as Oxford. There, in the frontier town of Mercia and Wessex, the town where the common affairs of the two great divisions of the Kingdom had been so often discussed, the Earl of the West-Saxons summoned a general Witenagemót of the whole realm.2 The Assembly met on the Feast of Saint Simon and Saint Jude. After another attempt at bringing about a reconciliation between Tostig and the Northumbrians,3 Harold yielded every point. The irregular acts of the Northumbrian Gemót were confirmed by lawful authority. The deposition and outlawry of Tostig, the election of Morkere to the Northern Earldom, were legalized. But the outlying parts of the government of Siward and Tostig, the shires of Northampton and Huntingdon, were now detached from Northumberland,

The Acts of the York Gemót confirmed.

&lt;sup>1</sup> That the ravages took place during this interval, appears from the words of the Peterborough and Worcester Chronicles, that it was "ba hwile be he [Harold] for heora ærende."

Both this and the Northampton Assembly are called "Mycel Gemot." See Appendix HH.

<sup>3</sup> This is, I think, implied in the words of the Abingdon writer and of Florence (see Appendix HH). Harold tries to reconcile them "ibi"—at Northampton—"et post apud Oxnefordam."

and bestowed on Siward's young son Waltheof. He thus CHAP. X. received an ample provision, while he was cut off from the Waltheof exercise of any influence which he might possess in Mor- of Northkere's Earldom, whether as the son of Siward or as a shire and descendant of the elder line of Earls. And another solemn Hunting-donshire. decree was passed, which shows that this Gemót was meant Renewal of to be a wiping out of old scores and the beginning of a Law. new epoch. Northern and Southern England were again to be solemnly reconciled, as they had been reconciled forty-seven years before in another Assembly held on the same spot.2 Then, under the presidency of a Danish conqueror, Englishmen and Danes agreed to decree the renewal of the Laws of Eadgar. The sway of law and justice was then held to be impersonated in the peaceful Basileus, the hero of the triumph of Chester. In the space of those forty-seven years, the foreign conqueror who had presided in that earlier Gemót of Oxford had supplanted Eadgar himself as the hero of the national affec-In the North above all, where in life he had been perhaps less valued, the rule of the great Dane was looked back to as the golden age, the happy time before the tyranny of Tostig and the stern government of Siward. The South too, which, under the rule of Godwine and Harold, had no such complaints to make, might still look back with regret to the days of the King under whom Wessex had been, what she never was before or after, the Imperial state of all Northern Europe. Cnut now, as Eadgar then, was the one Prince whose name North and South, Dane and-Englishman, united in reverencing. He was the one Prince whom all could agree in holding up to future Kings and Earls as the faultless model of a ruler. In this case, as in the earlier one, the reconciliation of the two parts of the realm took the form of a decree for the restoration of

<sup>1</sup> See above, p. 375, and Appendix G.

&lt;sup>2</sup> See vol. i. p. 462.

CHAP. x. an earlier and better state of things. The Witenagemót of Oxford, with Earl Harold at its head, decreed with all solemnity the renewal of the Laws of Cnut.<sup>1</sup> Banishment of Tostig.

November 1, 1065.

One step more remained to be taken. The deposed Earl had to leave the Kingdom. According to one account, it would seem that a violent expulsion was still needed, in which Earl Eadwine appears as the chief actor.2 But this account seems to be a misconception. It would rather seem that, while all these messages and debates were going on, Tostig had never quitted the King. After this last decree, Eadward saw that he had no longer any power to protect him, and he therefore, though with deep sorrow, required his favourite's departure.3 The Earl bade farewell to his mother and his friends, and with his wife and his children,4 and some partizans who shared his exile,5 he set forth for the same friendly refuge which had sheltered him when a guiltless exile fourteen years before. England on the Feast of All Saints. The means of communication in those days must, as we have already seen more than once,7 have been much speedier than we are generally inclined to think. This whole revolution, with its gatherings, its meetings, its marches, its messages to and fro between distant places, took up less than one Kalendar

He takes refuge in Flanders.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Chron. Wig. and Petrib. "And he [Harold] niwade per Cnutes lage."

Fl. Wig. "Cum adjutorio Comitis Eadwini de Anglia Tostium expulerunt."

&lt;sup>3</sup> Vita Eadw. 423. "At Deo dilectus Rex, quum Ducem suum tutare non posset, gratia sua multipliciter donatum, mœrens nimium quod in hanc impotentiam deciderit, à se dimisit." The Chronicles, by simply saying "for ofer sæ," or something to that effect, distinctly favour the Biographer's account.

&lt;sup>4</sup> The Chronicles mention the departure of Tostig and his wife; the Biographer says, "cum conjuge et lactentibus liberis." Yet they had been married fourteen years.

&lt;sup>5</sup> With him went, say the Worcester and Peterborough Chronicles, "ealle ha he wolden heet he wolde." So the Biographer (u. s.), "plurimaque nobilium suorum manu."

&lt;sup>4</sup> Fl. Wig.

&lt;sup>7</sup> See above, pp. 404, 465.

month, from the first assemblage of the Thegns at York to CHAP. x. the departure of Tostig from England. The banished Earl crossed over to Baldwines land, the land of his wife's father. Under his protection he passed the whole of the winter at Saint Omer.<sup>1</sup>

§ 4. The Last Days of Eadward. 1065-1066.2

The life of Eadward was now drawing near to its end; Eadward's we are approaching the close of the first act of our great ness. From the illness into which Eadward was thrown by the excitement of the Northumbrian revolt, he never thoroughly recovered.3 He barely lived to complete the great work of his life. The royal saint deemed himself set His founupon the throne, not to secure the welfare or the in- Westmindependence of his Kingdom, but to build a church and ster. endow a monastery in honour of the Prince of the Apostles. If we were reading the life, not of a King, but of a Bishop or Abbot, we might well look on this as an object worthy of the devotion of a life. It was no small work to rear that stately minster which has ever since been the crowning-place of our Kings, and which for so many ages remained their place of burial. It was no small work to call into being that mighty Abbey, whose chapter-house

&lt;sup>1</sup> Chronn. Ab. Wig. Petrib. and Flor. Wig. The Abingdon Chronicle and Florence alone mention Saint Omer.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Since this section was written, Dean Stanley has published his Memorials of Westminster Abbey, in the early part of which he goes over nearly the same ground. But I find a good deal of difference between my ideas of historical evidence and those of the Dean.

Flor. Wig. "Post hee Rex Eadwardus paullatim ægrotare cospit." Vita Eadw. 423. "Quo dolore decidens in morbum, ab es die usque in diem mortis suæ ægrum trahebat animum." Will. Malms. iii. 252. "Quare ex animi ægritudine majorem valetudinem corporis contrahens, non multo post decessit." The hagiographers do not feel called on to enlarge on the real cause of the death of their hero—baffled wrath against his own people.

of England, and which has well nigh supplanted the CHAP. X. plays so great a part in the growth of the restored freedom

Kentish mother-church itself as the ecclesiastical home of the English nation. The church of Saint Peter at Westminster, the great work of Eadward's life, has proved a more than equal rival of the older sanctuaries of Canterbury and York and Winchester and Glastonbury. But, as the work of a King in such an age, we look on it with very different feelings from those with which we look on the ecclesiastical works of Ælfred or Æthelstan or Harold. In the eyes of those great rulers, a care for ecclesiastical administration and ecclesiastical reform, the establishment of foundations likely to spread piety and enlightenment among their people, naturally and rightly seemed an important part of the duty of a Prince. But in Eadward we can discern no sign of the higher aspirations of a ruler; a monk rather than a King, he seems never to have risen beyond a monk's selfish anxiety for the welfare of his own Eadward's soul. The special object of Eadward's reverence was the Apostle Peter, and his reverence for that Saint did no good to the Kingdom of England. His devotion to the Apostle led to a devotion to his supposed successor, and to that increased frequency of intercourse with the Roman See which is a marked characteristic of his reign. There seems no reason to doubt, though his Biographer is silent on the subject,2 that, as I have told the tale in earlier chapters, devotion for Saint Peter.

> <sup>1</sup> Vita Eadw. 417. "Ob amorem principalis Apostoli, quem affectu colebat unico et speciali."

The Biographer assigns no motive for the foundation of Westminster beyond this special reverence for Saint Peter, and the other usual motives for the foundation of monasteries. But his statement does not exclude the account given by the legendary writers about the vow, the dispensation, and the embassies to Rome. This I accept in the main, of course without binding myself to any legendary details, because it fits in so exactly with the statements of the Chroniclers and other authentic writers, who mention the two embassies without describing their object.

Eadward vowed a pilgrimage to Rome, that his Witan CHAP. X. dissuaded him from leaving his Kingdom, that Pope Leo dispensed with his vow, and imposed on him, instead of a personal visit to the tomb of the Apostle, the duty of founding or enlarging a monastery in his honour within his own Kingdom. We have seen that the two missions of Ealdred and other Prelates to Rome were probably connected with this design. The earlier one was sent to obtain the remission of the vow, the later one to obtain the Papal confirmation of the privileges of the house. We His founthus get a clear notion of the chronology of the foundation honour which occupied Eadward during the last fourteen years of of the his reign. It must again be remembered that the founda- 1051-1065. tion of a monastery followed a course exactly opposite to the foundation of a secular college. In a secular college Reverse the Canons or other clergy are ministers appointed, for the proceeding common advantage of the Church and realm, to maintain at Westdivine worship in a particular building. In a monastery, and at the monks are men who go out of the world to save their own souls, and who need a church of their own to pray in. In a college then the minster itself comes first; the clergy exist only for its sake, and for the sake of those who worship in it. In a monastery the society of monks comes first, and the minster exists only for their sake. Harold therefore, in his great work at Waltham, first built his church; he then settled the exact details of his foundation, the number, the duties, the endowments, of the clergy whom he placed in it.2 Eadward no doubt began to build his church as soon as he had formed the scheme of his foundation; but the church was not the same primary object which it was at Waltham, nor did its building need to be pressed forward with the same special speed. At Waltham the charter of foundation dates two years later than the Completion of the foundation, 1061. Consectation of the church, 1065.

<sup>1</sup> See above, p. 115.

CHAP. x. consecration of the minster. At Westminster the foundation itself, the establishment and endowment of the monastic society, no doubt the building of the refectory, dormitory, and other buildings needed for their personal use, had all been brought to perfection at least four years before the minster itself was ready for consecration.2

The Monastery of Thorney or Westminster.

tion.

653-660.

The rescript of Pope Leo required Eadward either to found a new, or to enlarge an old, monastery in honour of Saint Peter. He preferred the latter course. And we are told that the visions of a holy recluse named Wulfsige, probably the same who had finally determined Saint Wulfstan to accept his Bishoprick, guided him to the predestined site.3 At a little distance from the western gate of London lay what was then an island of the Thames, which, from the dense bushes and thickets with which it was covered, received the name of Thorney.4 There stood a Its founda- monastery whose origin was carried up to the earliest days of English Christianity. There Sigeberht, the first Christian

<sup>1</sup> See above, pp 447, 467.

- <sup>2</sup> It is somewhat dangerous to use the two doubtful charters which will be found in Cod. Dipl. iv. 173, 181. If I could fully trust them, I should find it easy to add many details. But I venture to refer to them only when their statements seem either to have great probability in themselves or to be confirmed by some other evidence. The two embassies to Rome seem to imply that, in 1050, nothing had been begun, but that in 1061 the foundation was complete. The words of the second charter (p. 181) imply this. Eadward says "Quum ergo renovassem eam," &c. of the time when he sent the second embassy, four years before the completion and dedication of the church.
- <sup>2</sup> Cod. Dipl. iv. 175. "Revelavit beatus Petrus cuidam probabilis vitæ monacho incluso nomine Wlfsino voluntatem suam esse ut restruerem locum, qui dicitur Westmonasterium." On Wulfsige, see above, p. 466.
- 4 Wace (10653) enlarges on the name, and his phonetic spelling illustrates his natural difficulty in pronouncing the letter b.

"En un islet esteit assise, Zonée out nom, joste Tamise; Zonée por ço l'apelon, Ke d'espine i out foison, E ke l'ewe en alout environ.

Ee en engleiz isle apelon, Ee est isle, zon est espine, Seit rainz, seit arbre, seit racine; Zonée ço est en engleiz Isle d'espine en françeiz."

Prevost's note is worth reading.

King of the East-Saxons, had begun a foundation in honour CHAP. X. of Saint Peter, to balance, as it were, the great minster of Saint Paul within the city. Legends gathered round the spot; the Bishop Mellitus, when about to hallow the church, was warned not to repeat the ceremony; the church had been already hallowed by the Apostle himself in his own The church of Saint Peter, from its position honour.2 with regard to the church of the brother Apostle, obtained the name, so familiar and so historical in the ears of every Englishman, of the West Minster. Its reputation however Its state in remained for several centuries altogether inferior to that of Eadward's its eastern rival. We are told that in Eadward's time the foundation was poor, the monks few, the buildings mean.3 Yet against this description we must set the fact that Burial of Westminster was chosen as the burial-place of at least one son of King, and that a King who had not died in the immediate Cnut. neighbourhood. We have also found the death of at least one Abbot of the house thought worthy of record in the national Chronicles.<sup>5</sup> The temporary burial-place of the first Harold was now chosen by Eadward as the place for his own sepulchre,6 as the place for the redemption of his vow, as the place which should become the sacred hearth of the English nation, the crowning-place of its future Kings.7 The site, so near to the great city, and yet removed from its immediate throng and turmoil,8 was

&lt;sup>1</sup> So says Æthelred, X Scriptt. 385.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Æthelred, 385, and more briefly in the charter, iv. 181.

* Vita Eadw. 417. "Parvo quidem opere et numero, paucioribus ibi congregatis monachis sub Abbate in servitio Christi."

&lt;sup>5</sup> See above, p. 113.

&lt;sup>6</sup> Vita Eadw. u. s. "Eligit ibi habere sibi locum sepulcri."

<sup>7</sup> So at least says Pope Nicolas' letter in Æthelred, 389. Cod. Dipl. iv. 184. "Ut amplies imperpetuum regies constitutionis et consecrationis locus sit, atque repositorium regalium insignium." Here, whether the text be genuine or not, the immediate application of the church to the use spoken of proves the truth of the statement.

<sup>8</sup> Vita Eadw. 417. "Intendit Deo devotus Rex locum illum, tam chosen as the site of a foundation in which royalty and monasticism were to dwell side by side, where living King

Permanance of Eadward's minster and palace.

were to dwell and hold their court under the shadow of the pile which covered the bones of the Kings who had gone before them. Like Fécamp, which may well have been his model, like Holyrood and the Escorial in later times, Eadward designed to place palace and monastery in each other's close neighbourhood, to make Westminster the centre of all the strongest national feelings of religion and loyalty. And he has had his reward. His scheme prospered in his own time, and it has survived to our His minster still stands, rebuilt, partly by a more illustrious bearer of his own name, in such a guise as to make it the noblest of the noble churches of England. But, in its subordinate buildings, large traces still remain of the work of its sainted founder. Within, it has supplanted Sherborne and Glastonbury and Winchester as the restingplace of the Kings and worthies of our land. And as the centre of them all, displacing God's altar from its worthiest site, still stands the shrine of Eadward himself, his name and his dust still abiding in somewhat of their ancient honour, while the nobler dust of Ælfred and Eadgar and Harold is scattered to the winds. And by the minster still stands the palace; no longer indeed the dwellingplace of Kings, but more than ever the true home of the nation; where the Witan of all England still meet for judgement and for legislation, as they did in the days when Eadward wore his Crown at that last Midwinter Feast, as they did when the first national act done beneath vicinum famosse et opulentse urbi, tum satis apricum ex circumjacentibus fecundis terris et viridantibus prædiis." He goes on to speak of the commerce of London.

&lt;sup>1</sup> See vol. i. p. 280. Eadward was a benefactor to Fécamp (ban halgan mynstre set Feskamp), giving it land at Steyning in Sussex (Cod. Dipl. iv. 229), where there grew up an alien Priory. A magnificent fragment of the church remains, of late twelfth century work.

the roof of the newly hallowed minster, was to place that CHAP. X. Crown, as the gift of the English people, on the brow of the foremost man of English blood and speech.

The church of Westminster, as built by Eadward, has Eadward's wholly given way to the conceptions of later architects, stroyed, who, in the true spirit of mediæval times, sought to do and rebuilt fresh honour to the saint by making his own work give honour. way to theirs. With our feelings on such matters, we should look on the pile itself as the best monument of its founder, and, if the original West Minster had descended to our time, our first object would be to preserve its genuine features precisely as they came from the hands of its first builders. In the ideas of the thirteenth century the memories of the past, the associations of a spot or of a building, were feebly felt compared with the devotion which was felt towards the precious possession of all, the saint himself still present in his wonder-working relics. For them no receptacle could be too gorgeous or too costly; reverence for the saint would of itself prompt the destruction of his own building, if it could be replaced by one which the taste of the age deemed more worthy of sheltering the shrine which contained his bones. The church of Eadward was therefore destroyed by his own worshippers in his own honour. His special devotee, one might almost think his special imitator, Henry the Third, began that magnificent temple which, after so many ages, still remains unfinished. Of the domestic buildings of the abbey as raised by Existing Eadward large portions were spared. The solid pas- Eadward's sages and substructures, built in the massive style of buildings. the time, remain almost perfect, and even of the more important buildings, as the refectory and dormitory, considerable traces still exist.1 But the church itself, the

<sup>1</sup> On the remains of Eadward's work in Westminster Abbey, see the work by Mr. G. G. Scott and others, Gleanings from Westminster

CHAP. x. central building of all, gradually gave way to the superb structure with which we are all familiar; nothing is left the first great ex ample of Norman architecture in England.

of Eadward's minster save a few bases of pillars, and other fragments brought to light in various excavations and alterations of the present fabric. But we are not left without minute accounts of a structure which made a deep impression on men's minds, and whose erection His church formed an æra in our national architecture. Among other importations from Normandy which we could well have spared, Eadward brought one with him which even our insular pride might be glad to welcome. The building art was now receiving daily improvements at the hands of the founders of those great Norman churches which were rising in such abundance on the other side of the sea. All those improvements Eadward carefully introduced into his new minster. He built his church in the newest style of the day, and it remained the great object of English imitation deep into the twelfth century.1 Of the church thus built we have a description and a pictorial representation made while the charm of novelty was still fresh upon it.2 It was a Norman minster of vast size, the increase of size in churches being one main distinction between the new Norman style and the older English manner of building. Its dimensions no doubt far surpassed those of any existing church in England, as they certainly far surpassed those of the contemporary church of Waltham. A short eastern limb, ending in an apse, contained the high altar. Over the choir rose, in Norman fashion, the central tower,

&lt;sup>1</sup> This is asserted in the famous passage of William of Malmesbury (ii. 228), "Ecclesia . . . quam ipse illo compositionis genere primus in Anglia ædificaverat quod nunc penè cuncti sumptuosis æmulantur expensis." On the architectural question I trust to say something in the last volume of this work.

<sup>2</sup> See the description in the Biographer, and representation in the Bayeux Tapestry, which shows beyond doubt that the building consecrated in 1065 was a perfect church, and not a mere fragment.

seemingly surrounded at its angles by smaller turrets, and CHAP. X. crowned by a cupola of wood and lead. The transepts projected north and south; to the west stretched the long nave, with its two ranges of arches, resting seemingly on tall columnar piers, like those of Jumièges, Gloucester, and Tewkesbury. Two smaller towers, for the reception of the bells, were designed as the finish of the building to the west.1 On the erection of this vast and stately fabric, and on the other objects of his foundation, Eadward had for many years spent the tenth part of his royal revenues.2 The monastic buildings had been finished for some years; the monks with their Abbot Eadwine<sup>3</sup> were already in possession of their house and its endowments. The minster was meanwhile rising, and it was Eadward's The church wish to interfere as little as possible with the worship finished. which had still to be celebrated in the old building. The new church was therefore begun at some distance to the east of its doomed predecessor, which was doubtless not wholly demolished till the new one was completed.4 In the foundation and endowment of the monastery the

1

<sup>1</sup> So says the French Life (2295), which, on such a subject, may be trusted;

"En miliu dresce une tur. E deus en frunt del Occident E bons seinz e granz i pent."

But, as the Tapestry does not show these towers, they were probably carried up at a later time, as often happened.

- <sup>2</sup> Vita Eadw. 417. "Præcepit deinde ex decimis omnium redituum suorum initiari opus nobilis ædificii." So Cod. Dipl. iv. 176. "Decimari præcepi omnem substantiam meam, tam in auro et argento, quam in pecudibus et omni genere possessionum."
- <sup>3</sup> Cod. Dipl. iv. 179. So the writs in iv. 190, 228. I presume that he succeeded Wulfnoth in 1049.
- <sup>4</sup> The Charter in Cod. Dipl. 176 says, "Destruens veterem, novam à fundamentis basilicam construxi." The Biographer explains the gradual process (418); "Heec autem multiplicitas tam vasti operis tanto spatio ab oriente ordita est veteris templi, ne scilicet interim inibi commorantes fratres vacarent a servitio Christi, ut efiam aliqua pars spatiosè subiret interjaciendi vestibuli." The Biographer, always hard to understand, is specially so in his architectural description.

King found helpers among his subjects, the fallen of the Northumbrians being among their number.1 the building of the church seems to have been w Eadward's own personal work. At last the work many years was brought to perfection. The time ployed on the building was indeed shorter than tha stowed on many other of our great churches, which own Prelates had to rear out of their own resources. here a King was pressing on the work with all his n a King who, when he had once completed the great of his life, was ready to depart in peace. After for years from the receipt of the Papal dispensation the ing was finished from the apse to the western front the time of the Midwinter festival of the year one the and sixty-five the new minster of Saint Peter stood for the great ceremony of its consecration.

Legends.

So great a work, raised under such circumstances hardly fail to become surrounded by an atmosph legend. It was not every church that was founded by a King or by a canonized saint. Fewer still churches were founded by a King who was at canonized saint, the last of an ancient dynasty, a whose memory was embalmed in the national reco as the representative of the times before the evil foreign domination. In his life-time, or at most a few years after his death, Eadward was already to be a worker of miracles.2 For his dreams, visio prophecies he was renowned to his last moment

<sup>1</sup> The charter in Cod. Dipl. iv. 177 mentions Leofcild, Æthelric, Guthmund, Ælfric, Atsere (or Azor) the Black (Swerte), Ingul Tostig, Ælfwine, Wulfstan, Siward, and Leofsige of London. of several of them are mentioned in various writs; Leofeild in iv. wine, iv. 217; Atsere Swerte, iv. 220; the other Atsere, iv. 191 these was the Azor of Glorgoestershire and Somersetshire!); and "Dudde sunu," iv. 218. There is also Ulf the Portreeve in iv. writs about the King's own Sifts are very numerous. See the Life, pp. 428 et seqq., and Appendix B.

story tells us how the holy King, with his pious friends OMAP. x. Leofric and Godgifu, was hearing mass in the elder minster of Saint Peter; how the King was deep in devotion; how he and the Earl—Godgifu is no longer spoken of—saw the form of the divine Child in the hands of the ministering priest; how Eadward bade his friend keep his secret till after his death; how Leofric confided it only to a holy monk at Worcester, who revealed it to no man till Leofric and Eadward were both no more. Another tale sets the King before us in all the Imperial pomp of the Easter festival; he goes with crown and sceptre from the church -in this case doubtless the Old Minster of Winchesterto the royal banquetting-hall. Heedless of the feast, absorbed in his own meditations, the King is seen to smile. Afterwards, in his private chamber, Earl Harold, a Bishop, and an Abbot, venture to ask him the reason of his serene and pious mirth. His thoughts had been far away from the royal hall of Winchester; he had seen the Seven Sleepers of Ephesos; they had turned from the right side to the left, an omen which presaged that some evil was coming upon the earth. The matter was deemed worthy of a special embassy to the Imperial Court of Constantinople, but the ambassadors took their commission, not from the King but from the three dignified subjects who had shared his confidence. Earl Harold sent a Thegn, the Bishop a clerk, the Abbot a monk. The three made their way to the New Rome and told the tale to the reigning Emperor. By his orders the tomb of the holy Sleepers at Ephesos was opened; the vision of the English King was proved to be true; and his prophetic powers were soon exalted by the general misfortunes of mankind, by the failure of the royal line of England and by the conquests of the Infidel Turks at the expense of Eastern

&lt;sup>1</sup> Æthelred, 389. Was this holy man the inclusus Wulfsige?

CHAP. X. Legend of the ring. Christendom. One more tale will bring us back directly to the current of our story.2 The King was present at the dedication of the church of Saint John at Clavering.3 A beggar asks alms of his sovereign in the name of the patron of the newly-hallowed temple, the Apostle whom Eadward reverenced next after his special patron Saint Peter. The King has neither silver nor gold about him; he cannot find his almoner for the press, he gives the poor man the only gift that he can give at the moment, the costly ring on his finger. The beggar returns thanks and vanishes. That very day,4 two English pilgrims are benighted in a wilderness of the Holy Land. A band of bright youths appears, attending an old man before whom two tapers are borne as in the service of the Church. He asks the pilgrims from what land they come, and of what King they are subjects. They are Englishmen, subjects of the good King Eadward. For the love of good King Eadward he guides them to a city and an hostelry, where they find abundant entertainment. In the morning he reveals himself to them as John the Apostle and Evangelist; he gives them the ring to bear to the King of the English, with the message that, as the reward of his good

&lt;sup>1</sup> Æthelred, 396. "Ipso ad regnum coeleste translato, cuncta terrarum regna commota sunt. Syria paganis subjecta, destructa monasteria, dirutæ à fundamentis ecclesiæ, plena funeribus omnia, morte principum Græcorum, Romanorum, Francorum, Anglorum, et regna cætera perturbata." As regards the "Princeps Romanorum," the hagiographer is wide of his mark, for Henry the Fourth survived the Confessor forty years.

&lt;sup>2</sup> See the story in the De Inventione, p. 22. Æthelred, 397. The Waltham writer lets us incidentally into the fact that London, York, Winchester, and Lincoln were then counted the four chief cities of England. In the great dispute over the quarters of Dafydd in 1283 (Ann. Waverley, 400 ed. Luard), the order was ruled to be London, Winchester, York, Bristol (others say Chester), with Northampton as the fifth.

* Æthelred, writing in Yorkshire, mentions vaguely a church of Saint John; the East-Saxon writer fixes it at Clavering. See Professor Stubbs' note, p. 24.

&quot;Postea" says Æthelred, but "eodem die," according to Roger of Howden, Scriptt. p. Bed. 256.

and chaste life, he should within six months be with him- CHAP. X. self in Paradise. The message is delivered; the King's ms and prayers and fastings are redoubled; but one thing specially occupies his mind, the longing to see the new minster of Saint Peter hallowed before he dies.

The time was at last come. The great ceremony had Consecrabeen preceded by a lesser one of the same kind. The Lady Eadzyth's Eadgyth—was it as an atonement for the blood of Gos-church at Wilton. patric?—had rebuilt the church of nuns at Wilton, the 1065. church of her sainted namesake the daughter of Eadgar.1 The fabric had hitherto been of wood, but the Lady now reared a stone minster, pressing on the work with unusual haste, in pious rivalry with her husband.3 The new building was hallowed by Hermann, the Bishop of the diocese, just before the Northumbrian revolt.4 That revolt was now over, and the land was once more quiet; the work of the King's life was finished; the time of the Christmas Festival drew nigh. This year the Midwinter Gemót was not Midwinter gathered, as in former years, at Gloucester, but the Witan Westof all England were specially called to the King's Court minster. at Westminster, to be present at the hallowing of the new church of Saint Peter.<sup>5</sup> The Assembly met; the King's 1065-1066.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Vita Eadw. 418. "Ejus æquivoca sancta Ædgith, de cujus progenie idem Rex Ædwardus descenderat." The Biographer could hardly have thought that Eadward was a lineal descendant of this virgin saint, his own aunt. But in his rhetoric "progenies," or any other word, may mean anything.

On the power of Saint Eadgyth to rebuke blasphemers, see vol. i. p. 484.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Vita Eadw. u. s. "Lignea tamen adhuc illic ecclesia stabat."

<sup>3</sup> Ib. "Regio opere lapideum monasterium inchoat, serventiùsque instans operarios maturat. Contendunt hinc Rex, illinc Regina, contentione Dec grată, in invicem quoque non injocundă."

&#x27; Ib. 421. "Acta ergo hujus ecclesise consecratione . . . anno Domini millesimo sexagesimo quinto ad justitium totius patrize, hac regni subsequuta est perturbatio."

Fl. Wig. 1065. "In nativitate Domini curiam suam, ut potuit, Lundonise tenuit." Æthel. 398. "Appropinquabat dies . . . in quo Anglorum tota nobilitas ad Regis curiam debuit convenire, et Regi more suo sceptria.

Consecration of Westmineter. December 28, 1065.

CHAP. I. strength was failing, but he assayed to appear usual kingly state. On the Festival of the Nativ on the two following days, one of them the day patron Evangelist, he wore his Crown in public.1 exertion was too much for him. The fourth day, th of the Holy Innocents, had been appointed for th ceremony; but Eadward was no longer able to te personal part in the rite which he had so long lool ward to as the crowning act of his life. The mine hallowed with all the rites of the Church, but the Fe share in the ceremony was discharged by deputy; E King, saint, and founder, was represented in the solemnity by his wife the Lady Eadgyth.2 Ea work on earth was now over; his church was finis hallowed, and it was soon to be the scene of rites st solemn, still more memorable. Saint Peter's min been built to be the crowning-place and the 1 place of future Kings of the English. Its special for soon fell thick upon the newly hallowed temple. another year had passed, the West Minster was to scene of one royal burial, of two royal consecration those consecrations the two most memorable that ever saw. But it had not to wait for months, or weeks, before its special history began. The sound workman's hammer had hardly ceased, the voice simul et corona decorando adeistere." Bo directly after (399), entibus in unum episcopis cunctisque regni proceribus, sacra d llennitas inchostur.

<sup>1</sup> Æthel. 398, 399. Will. Malma, ii. 228. "In Natale Do Lundoniam coronatus est."

* The consecration "on Cylciamerese dang" in asserted by The consecration of the case of Malmeebury. Lét Chronicles, by Florence, and Worcester or malmeebury. Let the phrase of Abingdon and Worcester Bo Florence Cum m. dedicari fecit," and William of Malmosbury, "dedicari praces dedicari fecit," and William Action of Endgyth comes from Acthebred, 399; "Rex, quanty permittebat, favebat officio, sed Regina, omnia diaponena, quante

The church of the Apostle was put to the lofty purposes for which it was designed. Before the Christmas Festival was over, it beheld the funeral rites of its founder, the coronation rites of his successor. The days of the holy season Death of were not yet accomplished, the Witan of England had not January 5, yet departed to their homes, when the last royal son of 1066. Burial of Woden was borne to his grave, and his Imperial Crown was placed on the brow of one whose claim was not drawn and coronation of only from the winding-sheet of his fathers. The most Harold. January 6, eventful year of our history had begun, but its first week 1066. had not yet fully passed away, when Eadward, the son of Æthelred and Emma, was gathered to his fathers, and Harold, the son of Godwine and of Gytha, was King of the English and Lord of the Isle of Britain.

We have thus, through the three and twenty years of Summary. Eadward's reign, traced what we may fairly look upon as the first stage of the Norman Conquest. Under a King, English by birth but Norman in feelings and habits, England has been brought under a direct Norman influence, which seemed at one moment likely to bring with it the peaceful establishment of Norman dominion. We have seen the Court of England swarming with Norman favourites; we have seen the Church of England handed over to the government of Norman Prelates; we have seen Norman adventurers enriched with English estates, and covering the land with those frowning castles on which our fathers looked as the special badges of wrong and slavery. Above all, we have seen the Duke of the Normans, not only received with &lt;sup>1</sup> I reserve the details of Eadward's death for my next Chapter. It is so essentially connected with the accession of Harold that the two events can hardly be separated in narration, and the different accounts of the death-bed scene at once lead us to the discussion of the question as to Eadward's dying recommendation with regard to his successor.

CHAP. X. special honours at the English Court, but encouraged to look upon himself as the destined successor to the English Crown. A national reaction, almost rising to the rank of a revolution, has broken the yoke of the strangers, has driven the most guilty from the land, and has placed England and her King once more under the rule of the noblest of her own sons. Still the effect of those days of Norman influence was not wiped out; the land had not been wholly cleared of the strangers, and, what is of far more moment, the wary and wily chief of the strangers had been armed with a pretext plausible enough to win him general support wherever the laws of England were unknown. The moment of struggle was now come; the English throne had become vacant, and the Norman Duke knew how to represent himself as its lawful heir, and to brand the King of the nation's choice as an usurper. We thus enter on the second, the decisive, stage of the great struggle. It is no longer a half concealed strife for influence, for office, for a peaceful succession to the Crown. It is an open warfare of nation against nation, of man against man. England and Normandy, Harold and William, are now brought face to face. The days of debate and compromise are past; the sword alone can now judge between England and her enemy. The details of that memorable conflict, the events of that wonderful year which forms the turning-point of all English history, will form the third portion of my tale, the culminating point of the History of the Norman Conquest.

APPENDIX.

NOTE A. p. 5.

THE ELECTION AND CORONATION OF EADWARD.

In reading the account of Eadward's accession to the Crown, as told in the Chronicles and by Florence, we are at once struck by the great and unusual delay between his first election and his consecration as King. He is chosen in London in June by a popular movement which could not even wait for the burial of the deceased King; but he is not crowned till the Easter of the next year. No explanation is given of the delay, no account of the way in which the intervening months were occupied, no statement where Eadward was at the time of Harthacnut's death. We must therefore look to other writers for the means of filling up this singular gap. I need hardly again refute the wild romance of Thierry, of which I spoke in vol. i. p. 592. I will only say that Eadward's Westminster Charter (Cod. Dipl. iv. 173), which, doubtful as it is, is at least as good authority as Brompton or Knighton, makes him speak of himself as "eo [regno] potitus sine ullo bellorum labore." It will be more profitable to examine the witness of those writers who wrote at all near the time, or who were at all likely to preserve contemporary traditions.

According to Eadward's Biographer (p. 394), as soon as England was free from her Danish rulers (see vol. i. p. 592), Godwine at once proposed the election of Eadward as the natural heir ("ut Regem suum recipiant in nativi juris sui throno"). Godwine being looked on as a common father, everybody agreed to his proposal ("quoniam pro patre ab omnibus habebatur, in paterno consultu libenter audiebatur"). Earls and Bishops are sent to fetch Eadward ("mittuntur post sum"); they bring him with them; he is joyfully received, and crowned at Canterbury.

William of Poitiers (p. 85 Giles), as might be supposed, knows nothing about Godwine, or about any free election by the English people. Eadward, according to him, was chosen under a most powerful congé d'élire and letter missive from his cousin the Duke of the Normans. The English are disputing about the succession, when a Norman embassy comes, threatening a Norman invasion if Eadward is not received. The nation chooses the wiser part, and Eadward comes home, protected by a small array of Norman knights ("Disceptantes Angli deliberatione suis rationibus utilissima consenserunt, legationibus justa petentibus acquiescere, quam Normannorum vim experiri. Reducem cum non maximo præsidio militis Normannici cupidè sibi cum præstituerunt, ne manu validiore, si Comes Normannicus adveniret, subigerentur"). The same version is given in a shorter form in the Chronicle of Saint Wandrille (D'Achery, ii. 286). Eadward, already chosen and crowned King, but hitherto kept out of his Kingdom by Swend, Cnut, and others, is now restored by Norman help ("In regnum paternum admitentibus Normannis rediit").

Henry of Huntingdon (M. H. B. 759 A) mixes up the accession of Eadward with his version of the death of Ælfred (see vol. i. p. 543), which, it will be remembered, he places after the death of Harthacnut. Ælfred had been slain by the English, because he had brought too many Normans with him; the English then send to Normandy, offering the Crown to Eadward, on condition that he brings only a small body of Normans with him ("Miserunt ergo pro Edwardo juniore in Normanniam nuntios et obsides, mandantes ei quod paucissimos Normannorum secum adduceret, et sum in Regem fidelissimè stabilirent"). Eadward comes over with a small company ("cum paucis venit in Angliam"); he is chosen King by all folk ("electus est in Regem ab omni populo"), and is consecrated at Easter by Eadsige at Winchester.

The Winchester Annals (Luard, pp. 18-20) swell out the story into a long romance; but some points are worthy of notice. On the death of Harthacnut, Godwine is, by a decree of the Witan and with the consent of the Lady Emma ("Regins assensu et magnatum consilio"), appointed Regent of the Kingdom till a King can be chosen ("regni cura Comiti Godwino committitur, donec qui dignus esset eligeretur in Regem"). Eadward is in Normandy, where, since the death of Duke Robert, he has no friends; he has no hope from his mother; he determines to trust himself to the mercy of his enemy Godwine ("inter desperandum tutius credebat manifesto supplicare inimico, quam fictum amicum sine caussa sollicitare"). He comes over to England, he lands at Southampton, he avoids his mother at Winchester, but goes to Godwine in London, and throws himself at the Earl's feet. A long dialogue follows, the upshot of which is that Godwine swears fidelity to Eadward and promises him the Crown. Eadward is sent to Winchester in disguise, and is bidden to reveal himself to no one. Godwine meanwhile summons the Witan to Winchester for the election of a King. They meet in the Old Minster. The Lady Emma seemingly presides; the Archbishops are at her right hand, the Earl of the West-Saxons at her left. Eadward, veiled, sits at the feet of Godwine. At the proper moment Godwine unveils him; "Here," he says, "is your King; here is Eadward, son of this Lady Emma and of Æthelred King of the English. I choose him King, and am the first to become his man" ("Huic ego omnium primus homagium facio"). A debate follows; some object to the choice, but no man dares seriously to oppose Godwine. Eadward is elected and crowned.

The Hyde writer (pp. 287, 288), like Henry of Huntingdon, connects the accession of Eadward with the death of Ælfred, and, like William of Poitiers, brings in Duke William as a prominent actor. After Ælfred's death William meditates revenge, but an English embassy comes, praying for another son of Æthelred to be sent to them as their King ("rogant sibi alium dominum"—domini?— "sui transmitti filium"), and promising him all loyal service. William will not allow his cousin to adventure himself, unless some of the noblest of the English, and especially one of the sons of Godwine, are given him as hostages. This is done, and Eadward is brought over to England by a Norman fleet.

Lastly, charters exist which imply that Eadward was for a while in Normandy after he had acquired a right to the title of King. At an earlier time he and his brother had subscribed a charter of Duke Robert, with the form "Signum Hetwardi. Signum Helwredi." (Delisle, Preuves, p. 11.) But the cartulary of Saint Michael's Mount contains two Charters in which Eadward is called "Rex." I do not rely so much on the Charter in Eadward's own name, which is printed in Cod. Dipl. iv. 251, and Delisle, Preuve, 20. It is signed by Robert Archbishop of Rouen, who died in 1037. Now it is really inconceivable that Eadward should call himself King before 1042, unless possibly in some moment of exultation when Duke Robert's fleet was setting forth to restore him (See vol. i. p. 525.) The matter of the charter also is strange, and the English spelling "Eadwardus" is unusual in a document which must have been drawn up in Normandy. I have more faith in a Charter of Duke William (Delisle, Preuves, p. 19), which, among other signatures, has that of "Hatuardus Rex." This looks to me far more likely to be genuine. It is quite conceivable that, if Eadward was asked to witness a charter of his cousin's, just as he was leaving Normandy in 1042, he might assume the title, though not yet strictly entitled to it by English Law.

The accounts of all these different writers seem to be independent of one another, unless the Hyde version is made up by compounding the story of William of Poitiers with that which we find in Henry of Huntingdon. The mention of the hostages is one form of a story which I shall have elsewhere to discuss at length. All these accounts agree in placing Eadward in Normandy at the moment of Harthacnut's death. William of Malmesbury (ii. 196) however supposes him to have been in England. With this difference, his story is much the same as that of the Winchester Annals stripped of its romantic details. It is probably the groundwork round which that legend has grown. Eadward, not knowing whither to turn after the death of Harthacnut, throws himself at the feet of Godwine, and craves leave to return to Normandy. The Earl raises him, and addresses him in a speech whose substance may well be historical, and to which I have not hesitated to give a place in the text. Eadward promises everything; he will be Godwine's firm friend; he will promote his sons and marry his daughter. The Witan meet at Gillingham; Godwine speaks on behalf of Eadward, and becomes his man ("rationibus suis explicitis, Regem efficit, hominio palam omnibus dato"); the election, the coronation, the punishment of the opponents of Eadward, follow as I have told them in the text.

Now it strikes me that, in these accounts, when carefully compared together, we may find the means of filling up the gap, and of explaining the delay, between the first election and the coronation.

In all the versions the time is filled up by negotiation, not by war. In most of them the negotiation is carried on between Eadward and Godwine; in all those which mention Godwine at all, he stands forth as the leading man in the business, in fact as the man who makes Eadward King. We see glimpses of two Assemblies, the former being that hasty Gemót in London which chose Eadward before the burial of Harthacnut, and a later one at Gillingham or elsewhere shortly before the coronation. Again, all the accounts, except that of William of Malmesbury, conceive Eadward as being in Normandy. The inferior writers assert it; the contemporary Biographer clearly implies it. Putting these hints together, I have ventured to construct the narrative in the text. Eadward is chosen in London immediately on the death of Harthacnut; as he is absent, an embassy, doubtless headed by Godwine, is sent to offer him the Crown. The case is thus far almost identical with the story of the first election of Eadward's half-brother Harthacnut. Delay is in both cases caused by the election of a King who is absent. Eadward does not indeed tarry so long as Harthacnut did; but his indecision, his unwillingness to accept the Crown, the negotiations which were needed to overcome that unwillingness, caused delay, and gave time for an adverse party to form itself. Assembly, that recorded by William of Malmesbury, was therefore needed to overcome all objections, and to elect Eadward, now present in person, in a more formal manner. We thus get, from one quarter or another, a credible narrative, which fills up the gap in the Chronicles without contradicting their statements. A few special points must be noticed.

I. We see that most of our statements assert or imply that Eadward was in Normandy. Now it is most certain that Eadward had been recalled to England by Harthacnut (vol. i. p. 584), and that the English court was now his recognized dwelling-place. But this is quite consistent with the notion, which I have ventured to throw out in the text, that Eadward was at this moment in Normandy on some temporary visit or pilgrimage. This view explains all the statements. The fact that Eadward was in Normandy at the moment—a fact which we may surely accept on the credit of the Biographer, to say nothing of the Norman Charters quoted above—led careless writers to forget his recall by Harthacnut, and to speak as if he had never left Normandy since the accession of Cnut. On the other hand, the fact of his recall led William of Malmesbury to forget or to disbelieve that he was in Normandy at the time of Harthacnut's death. Then the Winchester Annalist, aware of Eadward's absence, tried to patch it in to William's account, which we not an easy matter. That an embassy should be sent to Eadward in Normandy was credible enough. It was also credible that Eadward, if in England, might throw himself into the arms of Godwine. But no story can be more unlikely than that which represents Eadward, when safe in Normandy, as coming of his own accord to England to put himself into the hands of the man whom the same account represents as the murderer of his brother.

١

1

- 2. I accept the second Assembly as the only means of reconciling the different accounts and of meeting the probabilities of the case. And I accept Gillingham as its place, on the authority of William of Malmesbury. It is true that one of William's manuscripts places it in London, while the Winchester Annalist transfers it to his own The universal law of criticism comes in city and his own church. If a thing happened either in London or at Winchester, no transcriber or copyist would be likely to remove it to Gillingham. But nothing was more natural than for a transcriber to alter Gillingham into London, if he thought he could thereby bring his text into conformity with the Chronicles. The Winchester writer would have every motive to confound the Gemót at Gillingham with the consecration which shortly followed at Winchester. very strangeness of the choice of Gillingham for such an Assembly is the best proof that it is the right place. By Gillingham, I may add, William of Malmesbury can only have meant the West-Saxon Gillingham, already mentioned in his history (ii. 180). The Kentish Gillingham would connect itself more naturally with the Biographer's statement of a coronation at Canterbury, but the other is the more obvious place for a Meeting which was followed by a coronation at Winchester.
- 3. The reader must judge for himself as to the amount of value to be attached to the statements of William of Poitiers and the Hyde writer as to the influence of the Duke of the Normans in the matter. It must not be forgotten that in 1042 William was only fourteen years old, and in the midst of the troubles of his minority. It is quite possible that William or his advisers may, perhaps even then with some vague designs on the English Crown, we pressed the acceptance of that Crown on Eadward. And, in y case, the story could hardly have arisen, unless embassies of me sort had passed between England and Normandy in the course of the business. It so far falls in with my view of Eadward's position.

4. The statement of the Biographer that Eadward was crowned at Canterbury seems, at first sight, very strange. There can be no doubt that the final ceremony took place at Winchester. That the Biographer's account is rhetorical and somewhat confused is no more than his usual fashion. But it would be strange if a contemporary made a mistake on a point of this kind. Is it possible that the ceremony was performed twice? Coronations were sometimes repeated in those days. If we read the Biographer's account narrowly, it is plain that he distinguishes between the ceremony at Canterbury, which he evidently looks on as happening immediately on Eadward's landing, and the reception of the foreign ambassadors, which takes place when the news had reached foreign courts ("exhilaratus quod eum in paterna sede inthronizatum dedicerat"). But their reception must surely be placed at the final and solemn consecration at Winchester. A twofold coronation, as well as a twofold Gemót, will perhaps solve all difficulties.

There is one more point to be discussed. According to William of Malmesbury, there was an opposition, seemingly a rather strong one, made to Eadward's election. He does not say on whose behalf the objection was brought. But it is hardly possible that it could have been made on behalf of any one except Swend Estrithson. The English writers indeed make no mention of Swend in the matter, but in Adam of Bremen we find what may pass as Swend's own version. Adam knew the Danish King personally (ii. 73), and he probably put on record what Swend told him. It will be remembered that, just at the moment of Harthacnut's death, Swend was in Denmark, carrying on the war with Magnus (see vol. i. p. 583). Adam then goes on thus;

"Suein, victus à Magno, quum in Angliam remearet, Hardechnut mortuum repperit. In cujus locum Angli priùs elegerunt fratrem ejus Eduardum, quem de priori marito Imma genuit; vir sanctus et timens Deum. Isque suspectum habens Suein, quod sceptrum sibi Anglorum reposceret, cum tyranno pacem fecit, constituens eum proximum se mortuo regni Anglorum hæredem, vel si filios susceperit. Tali pacto mitigatus Suein in Daniam remeavit." (ii. 74.)

I may here note that the word "priùs" in this passage distinctly refers to the first election in London. And, whether we believe Swend's story of the bargain between himself and Eadward or not, we have here quite enough to make an opposition on Swend's behalf highly probable. "Tyrannus" is of course to be taken in the sense of "pretender."

Another passage of Adam (iii. 13) must here be mentioned;

"Simul eo tempore separabant se Angli a regno Danorum, filiis Gudwini rebellionis auctoribus, quos amitse Regis Danorum filios esse diximus, et quorum sororem Eduardus Rex duxit uxorem. Hi namque, facta conspiratione, fratres Suein Regis, qui in Anglia Duces erant, alterum Bern statim obtruncant, alterum Osbern cum suis omnibus ejecerunt à patria."

This at first sight appears to be an account of the separation between Denmark and England on the death of Harthacnut. It is not however really so. It must be taken in connexion with a passage two chapters back (iii. 11), in which Adam gives a most strange version of the events which followed the death of Magnus in 1048. In the true account, Swend then asked for English help, which was refused, and a peace was concluded between England and Harold Hardrada (see above, p. 93). But Adam makes Swend possess both Denmark and Norway, and then prepare to invade England ("Suein duo regna possedit, classemque parasse dicitur, ut Angliam suo juri subjiceret"). Eadward agrees to pay tribute, and renews the promise of the succession ("Verum sanctissimus Rex Edwardus, quum justitia regnum gubernaret, tunc quoque pacem eligens, victori obtulit tributum, statuens eum, ut supra dictum est, post se regni hæredem"). This must be another version of the intended expedition of Magnus (see above, p. 73). On the strength of this tribute, Adam seems to look upon Swend as at least overlord of England ("Quum Rex juvenis Suein tria pro libitu suo regna tenuerit"). He seems to look on Beorn and Osbeorn as Swend's representatives in England, and the murder of Beorn by Swegen is made into the groundwork of a story of "rebellio," "conspiratio," and what not, about the sons of Godwine in general.

The only historical value of this very confused account is that it helps us to the very probable fact of the banishment of Osbeorn, of whom we do not hear in the English writers till 1069. But the story is very curious, as it is the evident groundwork of the wonderful tale in Saxo (p. 202). Saxo looks on Swend as the natural sovereign of England after the death of Harthacnut. Going to Denmark to assert his rights there, he left his interests in England in the hands of his cousins the sons of Godwine. From Eadward himself he feared nothing, unlike Harthacnut, who (see vol. i. p. 583, n. 4) had dreaded his ambition, and who therefore made him his colleague in the Kingdom, lest he should attempt to gain the whole ("Retinendse insulse spem non solum in Godovini filiis, quibus sanguine admodum conjunctus fuerat, reponens, sed etiam ex ipså consortis sui"—Eadwardi sc.—" stoliditate desididque præsumens"). But Harold the son of Godwine betrays Swend's trust, makes Eadward King, and massacres the Danes, according to the story in vol. i. p. 592.

I do not profess to harmonize every detail of the conflicting stories about Eadward, Magnus, and Swend. But I think that there is enough evidence to lead us to believe that Eadward's election was opposed by a Danish party in Swend's interest, and that these were the persons who were marked at the time and gradually punished afterwards. See pp. 9, 63, 72, 90.

NOTE B. p. 21.

THE LEGENDARY HISTORY OF EADWARD.

THERE is something very remarkable in that gradual developement of popular reverence for King Eadward, which at last issued in his being acknowledged as the Patron Saint of England. I have endeavoured in the text to point out the chief causes from which this feeling arose; how Eadward was, in different ways, the one person whom Normans and Englishmen could unite in honouring. I will now attempt to trace out the growth of the feeling itself, and to point out some of the ways in which Eadward's true character and history have been clouded over by legendary and miraculous tales.

Every English writer, as I shall presently show, speaks of Ead-ward with marked respect, with a degree of respect, in most cases, which their own narratives of his actions hardly account for. Yet, alongside of this, we find indications of a counter feeling, as if there were all along some who thought of him pretty much as the modern historian is driven to think of him. The Scandinavian writers, placed beyond the influences which had effect upon both English and Norman writers, seem to have all along estimated him nearly at his true value. Saxo, though writing long after Eadward had become a recognized saint, treats him with great irreverence, and speaks openly of his "stoliditas et desidia." The biographer of Olaf Tryggwesson, according to whom Eadward was a special admirer of his own hero, gives him only the rather faint praise of being "princeps optimus in multis" ("oc var agetur Kongr i mórgum lutum." p. 262). In Snorro's time he had advanced somewhat; "Hann var kalladr Játvardr inn Gódi, hann var sva" (Ant. Celt. Scand. 189. Laing, iii. 75). But his sanctity still seems only local; Snorro says emphatically that "Englishmen call him a saint" ("oc kalla Enskir menn hann Helgan." Ant. Celt. Scand. 191. Laing, iii. 77). Adam of Bremen, who, as regards English matters, may almost pass for a Scandinavian writer, is Eadward's warmest admirer in that part of the world. He gives him perhaps the only unreserved praise which he gets in Northern Europe. With Adam he is not only "vir bonus et timens Deum" (ii. 74), but he rises to the dignity of "sanctissimus Rex Edwardus" (iii. 11). William of Malmesbury, in his accustomed way of letting us see both sides of a question, shows us that in his day there were still people in England by whom the royal saint was lightly esteemed, and he himself seems now and then to halt between two opinions. He gives him (iii. 259) no higher surname than "Edwardus Simplex," and over and over again, as if of set purpose, he speaks of his "simplicitas" as his chief characteristic. The utmost that he can say for him is that his simplicity won for him favour and protection both with God and man. He was (ii. 196) "vir propter morum simplicitatem parum imperio idoneus, sed Deo devotus, ideoque ab eo directus." "Fovebat profectò ejus simplicitatem Deus." (Ib.) "Quamvis vel deses vel simplex putaretur, habebat Comites qui eum ex humili in altum conantem erigerent." William believes in his holiness, and even in his miraculous powers, but he has not wholly given up the right of criticism upon his character and actions.

The English Chroniclers, and their harmonizer Florence, record Endward's actions with perfect impartiality. Nowhere in their narratives do they display towards him any of that affection which they do display towards Harold and other actors in the story. Nor do they ever speak of him with bated breath, as of an acknowledged saint. But the Abingdon and Worcester Chroniclers, and Florence also, all send him out of the world with a panegyric. The unbending Godwinist at Peterborough alone makes no sign. But Florence's panegyric is of the most general kind. He is (A. 1066) "Anglorum decus, pacificus Rex Eadwardus." And the elaborate poem in the two Chronicles attributes to the "baleless King" only the mildest and most monastic virtues. One can hardly keep from the mildest and most monastic virtues. One can hardly keep from the mildest and most monastic virtues of admiration with which the poet winds are in the poet winds are in the part of the praise to have "made fast his realm" makes it fad a mobble Earl."

to "Harold the noble Earl." The Chromia Bressed by Eadward Of Alice The Chrome Beesed by Eadward. Of these powers we get the nary powers P in the contemporary Biographs. first glimpses his death, Eadward was held, at least by those who eight years are favour with his widow, to have eight years at the wind was neld, at least by those who sought to wind as, to have been the subject of the minimum, to have been the subject of the minimum. sought to will was taken over as a boy to Normand was taken over a boy to Normand was ta have seen risked was taken over as a boy to Normandy, Brihtwold, When Eadward bury, had a vision in which he see a contract the visions of others. When Radward as King (Vita Eadw 201) m Bishop of Fadward as King (Vita Eadw. 394). The Biographer secreting 430, 1) records the unintelligible tellsecreting (pp. 430, 1) records the unintelligible talk of Eadward on his also (pp. 430, in which he already discerns a propher also (pp. 75 in which he already discerns a prophecy, and he severely death-bed, archbishop Stigand, whose practical ----death-warchbishop Stigand, whose practical mind set small store rebukes habble of the sick man. Endward also rebuse babble of the sick man. Eadward also appears in his pages by the first of the long line of English W: by the first of the long line of English Kings who undertook to the evil by the royal touch Dthe evil by the royal touch. By washing and touching he hesled (428) a scrofulous woman, and, what one would hardly have expected, whereas she had hitherto been barren, the touch of Eadchanged her into a joyful mother of children. But here William of Malmesbury again helps us. He is a full believer in Eadward's miraculous power, but he again (ii. 222) lets us see that there were two opinions on the subject. Some people affirmed that Eadward cured the evil, not by virtue of his holiness, but by virtue of his royal descent ("Nostro tempore quidam falsam sanctitate, sed ex regalis prosapise hæreditate fluxisse"). So others at a later time, as Peter of Blois (ep. 150, vol. ii. p. 82 Giles), held that the Kings of England possessed the gift by virtue of their royal unction. William argues against such views, but by so doing he proves that Eadward's claims to holiness and miraculous power were still a moot point in his time.

Besides this official kind of miracle, Eadward, according to his Biographer, wrought other wonderful works. A blind man was cured by the water in which the King had washed (429), and several cures were wrought at his tomb (435). One is almost tempted to suspect that these stories are interpolations, but there is no need for the supposition. An interpolator would surely have taken care to insert the more famous stories of the ring and of the Seven Sleepers, of which the Biographer tells us nothing. We must remember how men then, and for ages afterwards, instead of being surprised at miracles, looked for them. We must not forget that Queen Anne touched for the evil as well as King Eadward; we must remember that alleged miracles were wrought by the blood, not only of Thomas of London and Simon of Montfort, but also of Charles the First.

William of Malmesbury, clearly with the Biographer before him, enlarges greatly on Eadward's miraculous and prophetic powers (ii. 220-227), adding to the stories in the Life the vision of the Seven Sleepers (see above, p. 511). But the main disseminator of legendary lore about Eadward was Osbern or Osbert of Clare, Prior of Westminster, who had a hand in procuring his formal canonization, and who wrote a book on his life and miracles (Introduction to M. H. B. 16. Luard, Preface xxv. Hardy's Catalogue of British History, i. 637, 642). His work has never been printed, but it is the groundwork of the well known Life by Æthelred of Rievaux, printed in the Decem Scriptores. On this again is founded the French Life printed by Mr. Luard, which however adds many particulars which are not to be found in Æthelred. Both of theseare truly wonderful productions. Of the French writer I have already given a specimen in vol. i. p. 592. Perhaps his grandest achievement is to make Godwine kill Eadmund Ironside (p. 47. v. 775). Both he and the Abbot of Rievaux agree in describing King Æthelred as a mighty warrior, fighting manfully against the Danes. He is "Rex strenuissimus," "gloriosus Rex" (X Scriptt. 372. Cf. the Abbot's Genealogia Regum, 362, 363), and in the French Life (v. 131) we read—

"Li rois Aedgard avoit un fiz K'ert de force e sens garniz, Ædelred k'out non, bon justisers, K'en pees peisible en guerre ert fers."

In short, for historical purposes, the French Life is absolutely worthless, and Æthelred himself, though often preserving little authentic touches, must be used with the greatest caution. But he, or rather Osbert whom he follows, evidently drew largely from the Biographer. In some cases rhetorical expressions in the authentic Life seem, in the hands of the professed hagiographers, to have grown into legendary facts. Thus the Biographer tells us (393, 394) that, when Emma was with child of Eadward, popular expectation looked forward to the birth of a future King, and that, when the child was born, he was at once seen to be worthy to reign ("Antiqui Regis Æthelredi regiâ conjuge utero gravida, in ejus partûs sobole si masculus prodiret, omnis conjurat patria, in eo se dominum exspectare et Regem. . . . . Natus ergo puer dignus præmonstratur patriæ sacramento, qui quandoque paterni sullimaretur solio"). This, in another and more rhetorical passage (428), swells into "Felicissims mentionis Rex Ædwardus ante natalis sui diem Deo est electus, unde ad regnum non tam ab hominibus quam, ut supra diximus, divinitus est consecratus." All this is quite possible in a sense. That is to say, men may have speculated on the possibility of a son of Emma supplanting the children of the first Ælfgifu, just as Æthelred himself had supplanted his brother Eadward. In Æthelred of Rievaux (X Scriptt. 372) the rhetoric of the Biographer grows into a regular election of the unborn babe. He is, after much deliberation, chosen by all the people ("magnus episcoporum procerumque conventus, magnus plebisque vulgique concursus"), in preference alike to his halfbrother Eadmund Ironside and to his own brother Ælfred, who is erroneously supposed to be the elder of the two. A Norman Chronicler goes a step further. The historian of Saint Wandrille (Chron. Fontanellense, ap. D'Achery, ii. 286) describes Eadward as being not only elected but crowned in his childhood (" Eguvardus, qui prior natu erat, tener admodum et in puerilibus adhuc annis constitutus Rex, jubente patre et favente populo terre unctus est et consecratus"). Here the command of Æthelred comes first; the will of the people is something quite secondary. In the time of the French biographer, popular election of Kings was a thing which had altogether gone out of date, and which was not likely to be acceptable at the Court of Henry the Third. The story is left out accordingly.

No feature in the legendary history of Eadward fills a more prominent position in hagiography, none has won him more admiration from hagiographers, than the terms on which he is said to have lived with his wife. It is certain that, at a time when it was especially needful to provide direct heirs to the Crown, the marriage of Eadward and Eadgyth was childless. Eadward's monastic admirers attribute this fact to the resolution of Eadward, shared, according to some writers, by Eadgyth also, to devote himself to a life of perpetual virginity. When we come to examine the evidence, we shall find that this is one of those cases in which each The earliest later writer knows more than the writers before him. statements which have any bearing on the subject, though consistent with the monastic theory, do not necessarily imply it, and there are indications which look the other way. The tale grows as it is handed down from one panegyrist to another, in a way which naturally awakens suspicion. And when we consider the portrait of Eadward which is given us, his personal appearance, his personal temperament, and most of his tastes, we shall perhaps be led to guess that the unfruitfulness of Eadward's marriage was owing neither to any religious impediment nor yet to barrenness on the part of a daughter of Godwine. The story is The fact of Eadprobably due to a very natural process. gyth's childlessness was explained by her husband's admirers in the way which, to their monastic imaginations, seemed most honourable to him, and details of course grew in the usual fashion.

Let us now look through the evidence.

Florence and the prose text of the Chronicles are silent on the subject. The poem in the Abingdon and Worcester Chronicles says that Eadward was

"Kyninge cystum gód, Clæne and milde, Eadward se æðela."

But surely this is no more than might be said of any man who was chaste before marriage and faithful to his wife afterwards. The Biographer has several passages which may be thought to bear on the subject. He says (428) that Eadward "consecrationis dignitatem sanctam conservans castimonia, omnem vitam agebat Deo dicatam in verâ innocentiâ." This again need not mean anything more than the words of the poem. In the account of Bishop Brihtwold's vision (394), Saint Peter is seen to crown Eadward and "cœlibem ei vitam designare." One might say that this is vision and not history, but the vision would of course be devised so as to fit in with what was held to be the history. But, strange as it may seem, the word cœlebs, as used by the Biographer, does not imply either virginity or single life. He uses it (409. See above, p. 383) to express the conjugal fidelity of Tostig, who was undoubtedly the father of children. Elsewhere (p. 429) Eadward is called "columbinæ puritatis Rex," a phrase which may mean anything, but in the passage in which it occurs there is no special mention of chastity. Lastly, Eadward (433) on his death-bed is made to say of Eadgyth, "Obsequuta est mihi devotè, et lateri meo semper propius adstitit in loco carissimæ filiæ." But this is surely no more than might be said by any maundering old man of a wife much younger than himself. In none of these passages is there any direct assertion of any vow or of any practice of virginity on the part of Eadward. His chastity is undoubtedly praised. But the language in which it is praised does not necessarily imply anything more than might be said with equal truth of any faithful husband. If the Biographer had any idea of the religious virginity of his hero and heroine, he would surely have expressed himself more distinctly. He would hardly have called Eadgyth "tori ejus consocia" (418), without some sort of qualifica-If any one should say that the Biographer's work is dedicated to Eadgyth herself, and that he would not enlarge to her on such a subject, he is looking at the matter with the feelings of our own age. The age of Eadward felt quite differently on such points. The panegyrists of Queens like Pulcheria and Æthelthryth took care that the light of those saintly ladies should in no case be On the whole, I am inclined to think that hidden under a bushel.

the expressions of the Biographer, looked at critically, rather tell against the monastic theory. But such ambiguous expressions may well contain the germ of the legend.

One or two other points may be mentioned. Eadward is said (see above, p. 524) to have made an agreement with Swend Estrithson, by which the Danish prince was to succeed to the English Crown, "vel si filios susceperit." Such an agreement, or even any general belief in the existence of such an agreement, is inconsistent with such a vow on Eadward's part as the monastic writers pretend. William of Malmesbury again (ii. 228), in an unguarded moment, when he is discussing the policy of the King and not the merits of the saint, says that Eadward sent for the Ætheling from Hungary, "quod ipse non susceperat liberos." And Eadward himself, if it be Eadward who speaks in the Westminster charters, gives as his reason for not going in person to Rome, that the royal race would be jeoparded in his person, "maxime quod nullum habebam filium" (Cod. Dipl. iv. 174). Such language would hardly be used if the possibility of children had been cut off by any religious vow, formally made and generally known. Again, if Eadward had been known to be under such a vow, it is much less clear why Godwine should be anxious for the marriage of Eadward and Eadgyth. The sacrifice of his daughter would be much less intelligible, if there was no chance of its being rewarded by the succession of a grandson of Godwine to the Crown.

We will now look to the accounts which tell the other way. As might be expected, the earlier statements are very much less full and positive than the later. As long as Eadward, however deeply reverenced, was still not a canonized saint, the subject was one which might be discussed, and different opinions might be put forth about it. After the canonization, the slightest doubt would of course have passed for blasphemy.

Thus William of Jumièges (vii. 9) asserts the fact, but somewhat doubtfully; "Ut inter eos [Eadward and Godwine] firmus amor jugiter maneret, Editham filiam ejus uxorem nomine tenus duxit. Nam reverà, ut dicunt, ambo perpetuam virginitatem conservaverunt." William of Malmesbury, who, as we have seen, elsewhere forgets the story altogether, also asserts the fact, but he is in doubt as to the motive, and he seems certainly to know of no vow on the part of Eadgyth. He most likely had the words of the Biographer, "tori ejus consocia," before him when he wrote (ii. 197); "Nuptam sibi Rex hâc arte tractabat, ut nec toro amoveret nec virili more cognosceret; quod an familiæ illius odio, quod prudenter dissimulabat pro tempore, an amore castitatis fecerit, compertum non habeo. Illud celeberrimè fertur, numquam illum cujusquam mulieris contubernio pudicitiam læsisse." His account of Eadgyth is singular. She was suspected of unchastity, both during Eadward's lifetime and after his death; but on her death-bed she cleared herself by a solemn and voluntary oath, seemingly without calling in the help of compurgators. Wace again, in the Roman de Rou (9883), gives the report, but does not seem very certain or emphatic about it;

"Feme prist la fille Gwine,
Edif out nom, bele meschine,
Maiz entrels n'orent nul enfant;
E ço alouent la gent disant,
Ke charnelment od li ne jut,
Ne charnelment ne la conut:
Mais unkes hom ne l'aparçut,
Ne mal talent entrels ne fut."

Wace, as Prevost remarks in his note, seems hardly to have known of Eadgyth's disgrace, if not divorce, in 1051. The Hyde writer again, who, whoever he was and whenever he wrote, often preserved independent traditions, and who clearly exercised a sort of judgement of his own, knows the tale only as a report (288); "Fertur tamen Regem Edwardum numquam cum eâdem carnis habuisse consortium, sed mundissimæ vitæ semper dilexisse cœlibatum."

Here we get the story in its second stage. Eadward's reputation for sanctity is advancing: the fact of Eadgyth's childlessness, and the ambiguous expressions of the contemporary writers, are now commonly interpreted in a particular way. Still this interpretation has not yet become an article of faith. For the fully developed legend, setting forth the saint in all his glory, we must go to Æthelred of Rievaux and his followers. They of course know everything, down to the minutest details of everybody's thoughts and prayers. The story will be found in Æthelred (X Scriptt. 377, 378), and it is versified at great length in the French Life (p. 55 et seqq.). As soon as Eadward is established on the throne, his Witan, anxious about the succession, urge him to marry. The vow seems to be assumed. On the mention of marriage, Eadward is in a great strait; he is afraid to refuse; at the same time he is anxious not to violate his chastity. His prayers and meditations are given at great length, including much talk about the not exactly apposite examples of Joseph and Susanna. At last the difficulty is escaped by his marrying the daughter of Godwine, of whose piety as well as beauty a wonderful description is given. There is of course not a word about the suspicions spoken of by William of Malmesbury, any more than there is about the murder of Gospatric. Eadgyth happily chances to be of the same peculiar turn as Eadward himself; so they exactly suit one another. They marry; but they agree to live, and do live, in great mutual affection, but only as brother and sister. A new scriptural allusion happily presents itself, and Eadgyth is promoted to the rank of a "nova Abisac." The unlucky expression of the Biographer about "locus carissimse filiæ" is of course seized up and amplified. Eadward, on his death-bed, addresses Eadgyth as "filia mea" (X Scriptt. 402). The Biographer (433) had made Eadward commend Eadgyth to the care of her brother Harold, "ut pro domina [hlæfdige] et sorore, ut est, fideli serves et honores obsequio." Æthelred either misunderstood the passage, or else flew off at the word "soror." He tells us (402), "Reginam deinde fratri proceribusque commendans, ejus plurimum laudabat obsequium, et pudicitiam prædicabat, quæ se quidem uxorem gerebat in publico, sed sororem vel filiam in occulto."

It will be remembered that William of Jumièges, Wace, and the Hyde writer, mention the story only as a report; William of Malmesbury seems to accept the fact as undoubted, and is uncertain only as to the motive. According to Æthelred (378), the public mind in Eadward's own time was in the same state as the mind of William of Malmesbury a generation or two later. No one doubted the fact; "Ne aliquis huic Regis virtuti fidem deroget, sciat hoc tempore illius per totam Angliam sic divulgatum et creditum, ut de facto certi plerique de intentione certarent." People who-like William of Malmesbury—failed to rise to the full appreciation of Eadward's saintship, thought it might be because Eadward was unwilling to raise up grandsons to the traitor Godwine. rationalizing doubts are indignantly dismissed; "Quidam nihil nisi carnem et sanguinem sapientes, simplicitati regise [a clear hit at William] hoc imponebat, quod compulsus generi se miscuerit proditorum, et ne proditores procrearet, operi supersederet conjugali.

Sed si consideretur amor quo se complectebantur, facilè contemnitur talis opinio. Hoc idcirco inserendum putavi, ut sciatur neminem tunc de Regis continentià dubitàsse, quum de caussa taliter disputaverint." So it is that men get better informed, the further removed they are from personal knowledge of the events.

Having reached the perfect story in Æthelred, it is needless to carry on the examination any further. I will only add that some specially eloquent talk on the subject will be found in the Ramsey History, cap. cxx. (p. 461), and that in Æthelred (377) we first find the line which has become more famous through the false Ingulf, "Sicut spins rosam genuit Godwinus Edivam."

NOTE C. p. 29.

EADWARD'S FONDNESS FOR FOREIGN CHURCHMEN.

I MAY here quote a curious story about the relations between Eadward and Eadgyth and a foreign Abbot, which I cannot do better than give in the original Latin. The hero of the tale was Abbot of the famous monastery of Saint Riquier in Picardy. The church is a splendid one, but of late date; not far off is the municipal beffroi, to which the inhabitants still point with pride as the memorial of struggles waged with, and victories gained over, their ecclesiastical lords.

"Regi Anglorum Hetguardo Gervinus semper carus et venerabilis fuit, et ab illo, si ejus fines intrâsset, mirâ honorificentiâ attollebatur. Quique Rex, si eum in aliquâ vel pro aliquâ loci nostri necessitate angustiari comperisset, munificus valdè in succurrendo, remotâ omni excusatione, exsistebat. Regina etiam conjux ejusdem, nomine Edith, satis superque Gervinum pro suæ merito sanctitatis diligebat et venerabatur, et juxta mariti exemplum admodum libéralis, si aliqua petiisset, libens conferebat. Quâdam vero vice accidit ut Abbati nuperrimè terram illam ingresso osculum salutationis et pacis Regina porrigeret, quod ille gratiâ conservandæ sinceritatis abhorrens excipere noluit. At illa ferox, videns se Reginam spretam à monacho, nimis molestè tulit, et quædam quæ, ut pro se orâsset, illi donare statuerat, irata retraxit. Verum, marito id ipsum increpante, quod Abbatem tam religiosum pro non infracto rigore odio insequi voluisset, et aliis honestis viris suggerentibus non esse odiendum hominem qui sic Deo se mancipasset, ut ne Reginse quidem osculo se pateretur contra ordinem mulceri, placata est Regina, et hujusmodi factum non solum in illo non vituperavit, sed magnæ laudis attollens præconio, in sui regni Episcopis vel Abbatibus talem manere consuetudinem deinceps conquesta est. Multis ergo honoribus et donis eum fulciens remittebat onustum, hoc solum ab eo reposcens ut tempore orationis inter benefactores computari mereretur. Uxor etiam ipsius Regis donavit ei amictum valdè pretiosum, auro et lapide pretioso mirificè decoratum, quem Abbas detulit in nostræ ecclesiæ thesaurum." Chron. Centulense, iv. 22. ap. D'Achery, ii. 345.

This story is referred to, but inaccurately, in Mr. Thorpe's Lappenberg, ii. 244. There is no mention of it in the original, p. 504.

Saint Riquier however does not appear to have held lands in England in Eadward's time, but this was not the last begging expedition of Gervinus to our shores. On the gifts of Eadward and Eadgyth to Saint Denis, Fécamp, and other monasteries, see Ellis, i. 304, 307, 324. Cod. Dipl. iv. 229. cf. 251.

Another reference to Eadward's lavishness in this way is found in the Chronicle of Saint Wandrille in the same volume of D'Achery (ii. 286); "Uxorem quoque filiam Hotuvini [sic] magni illius terræ principis, qui fratrem suum Alureth jampridem cum multis crudeliter atque dolo peremerat, accepit, eosque quos secum de Nortmannis duxerat utriusque ordinis amplis honoribus extulit, auro et argento ditavit."

NOTE D. p. 31.

ENGLISH AND NORMAN ESTIMATES OF GODWINE AND HAROLD.

There is a remarkable passage of William of Malmesbury, in which, as his manner often is, he sets before his readers two different accounts or opinions of the same thing. He there contrasts the Norman and English accounts of Godwine and his sons, in words which seem, like several other passages, to show that he had the contemporary Biographer before him. His words (ii. 197) are;

"Hunc [Archbishop Robert] cum reliquis Angli moderni vituperant delatorem Godwini et filiorum ejus, hunc discordize seminatorem; hunc archiepiscopii emptorem; Godwinum et natos magnanimos viros, et industrios auctores et tutores regni Edwardi; non mirum si succensuerint quod novos homines et advenas sibi præferri viderent; numquam tamen contra Regem, quem semel fastigaverint, asperum etiam verbum loquutos. Contrà, Normanni sic se defensitant, ut dicant et eum et filios magnà arrogantià et infidelitate in Regem et in familiares ejus egisse, æquas sibi partes in imperio vindicantes; sæpe de ejus simplicitate solitos nugari, sæpe insignes facetias in illum jaculari: id Normannos perpeti nequivisse, quin illorum potentiam quantum possent enervarent."

In this passage William very fairly carries out his promise of letting each side tell its own story. Which of the two pictures is borne out by particular facts, we shall see at the proper stages of the history; it may not be amiss to collect here a few of the more general pictures of Godwine and Harold drawn according to the two models. In the case of Harold, I confine myself to those passages, whether panegyrics or invectives, which concern his general character and his administration as Earl. Those which concern either his relations to William or his character as King I reserve for notice at a later stage.

Of Godwine personally none of the Chronicles give any formal character, but the Worcester Chronicler (1052) gives a picture of the power of himself and house, setting forth their influence as strongly as any of the Norman writers, but with an exactly opposite colouring. "Foream be he [Godwine] wess ær to ham swyee up ahafen, swyce he weolde hess Cynges and ealles Englalandes, and his sunan wæron Eorlas and hæs Cynges dyrlingas, and his dohtor hæm Cynge bewedden and beæwnod." Of Harold both the Abingdon and the Worcester Chroniclers give a panegyric in the poem on Eadward which they insert in the year 1065. He is there, as if in direct answer to the Norman account, warmly praised for his strict loyalty to the King.

"And se froda swa beah
Befæste bæt rice
Heahbungenum menn
Harolde sylfum
Æbelum Eorle;
Se in ealle tid

Hyrde holdlice
Hærran sinum,
Wordum and dædum,
Wihte ne agælde
þæs þe þearf wæs
þæs þeodkyninges."

Florence gives no character of Godwine; of Harold-"strenuus

Dux Haroldus"—he always speaks with evident affection, but his formal panegyric, and a magnificent one it is, he keeps back till Harold's election to the Crown.

The Biographer's description of Godwine I have had occasion to refer to at vol. i. 450. Of Harold he gives a most elaborate portrait, of which I have made great use in the text. I spare the reader this writer's poetical panegyrics, except when they illustrate some special point: but I will quote one or two passages which compare the father and the son in a general sort of way. Godwine, he tells us, on his appointment as Earl of the West-Saxons (see vol. i. p. 469),

"Adeptus tanti honoris primatum non se extulit, sed omnibus bonis se pro posse patrem præbuit: quia quam à puero addidicerat mentis mansuetudinem non exuit; verum hanc, ut naturaliter sibi indita, erga subditos et inter pares seterna assiduitate excoluit. Undecumque emergerent injurise, in hoc jus et lex imprompta recuperabatur. Unde non pro domino habebatur, sed à cunctis patrise filiis pro patre colebatur. Nati sunt ergo filii et filise tanto patri non degeneres, sed paterna et materna probitate insignes, in quibus nutriendis studiosids his artibus agitur, quibus futuro regno munimen pariter et juvamen in his paratur." (392, 393.)

So, in p. 408, on describing the death of Godwine and the accession of Harold to his Earldom, he says;

"Haroldus... amicus gentis suse et patrise vices celebrat patris intentiùs, et ejusdem gressibus incedit, patientiâ scilicet et misericordiâ, et affabilitate cum benè volentibus. Porrò inquietatis, furibus, sive prædonibus, leonino terrore et vultu minabatur gladiator justus."

The Waltham writers are of course Harold's sworn panegyrists; their testimony must therefore be taken with caution, though certainly not with more caution than the testimony of Harold's calumniators, the sworn panegyrists of William. I forbear to enlarge on the "Vita Haroldi," where the hero of the piece figures as "vir venerabilis," "vir Dei," and so forth. These epithets of course refer far more to Harold's imaginary penance and seclusion as a hermit than they do to his real merits as Earl and as King. I will quote this romantic writer only for one passage, in which he is plunged into difficulties by the calumnious accounts of Godwine and his family, which in his time were generally received. Godwine, according to him, began to practise deceit only as far as was needful for his own safety in troublous times; corrupted by this dangerous familiarity with crime, he gradually grew into actual treason. But admiration of Harold, combined with at least partial censure of Godwine, is not peculiar to this romancer. It is the position of the Abingdon Chronicler.

The account of Godwine given by Harold's biographer runs thus; "Constat ipsius [Haroldi] genitorem vel cæterorum quosdam de illius genere, tantum proditionis, tantum et aliorum notă facinorum infamatos graviter fuisse. His vero malis, necessitate cavendi imminentis exitii, Godwinus se primò immiscuit, deinde ulterius evagatur. Tuendæ siquidem salutis obtentu dolum tentare compulsus, dum semel cedit ad votum, fraudibus in posterum minuendæ felicitatis intuitu licentius nitebatur." (Chroniques Anglo-Normandes, ii. 152.)

He then tells the story, which I have mentioned in vol. i. p. 467, about the way in which Godwine obtained Gytha in marriage. He then goes on;

"Quo tamen eventu Godwinus in Dacorum plusquam satis favorem effusus, gentis suse quampluribus fiebat infestus; nonnullos quoque de semine regio, quorum unus frater sancti Edwardi fuit, dolo perdidit; sicque non modò in concives, immo et in dominos naturales [cyne-hlafordas] non pauca deliquit" (154).

He then winds up by rebuking those who turned the crimes of Godwine to the discredit of Harold. Harold here, not Eadgyth, is the rose sprung from the thorn; "Sic rutilos producit, sic niveos quasi nutrit rosarum liliorumque spina flores" (155).

This writer's notion of Godwine favouring the Danes against the English is found also in the Roman de Rou (9809). He is telling the story of Ælfred (see vol. i. p. 544);

"Cuntre li vint Quens Gwine, Ki mult esteit de pute orine; Feme out de Danemarche née, De Daneis bien emparentée, Fils out Heraut, Guert, è Tosti. Pur li enfez ke jo vus di, Ki de Daneis esteient né, E de Daneiz erent amé, Ama Gwine li Daneiz
Mult mielx k'il ne fist li Engleis.
Oez cum fu fete déablie,
Grant traïsun, grant félunie:
Traistre fu, traïsun fist,
Ki en la lei Judas se mist."

To return to the Waltham writers, the witness of the writer "De Inventione" is worth infinitely more than that of Harold's biographer. The affectionate tribute which he pays to Harold is clearly something more than mere conventional panegyric on a founder. Harold was chosen King, "quia non erat eo prudentior in terra, armis strenuus magis, legum terræ sagacior, in omni genere probitatis cultior" (p. 25 Stubbs). At his death (27) the lament is, "Cadit Rex ab hoste fero, gloria regni, decus cleri, fortitudo militiæ, inermium clipeus, certantium firmitas, tutamen debilium, consolatio desolatorum, indigentium reparator, procerum gemma."

Such were the great father and son as they seemed in the eyes of Englishmen of their own times and in the eyes of those who in after times cherished purely English traditions. Let us see how they appeared to the Norman writers of their own day, and to those who follow that Norman tradition which permanently triumphed. It would be easy to prolong the list indefinitely, but I think it needless to refer to any but writers of the eleventh and twelfth centuries. On the whole, they are more fierce against Godwine than against Harold. They allow Godwine hardly any excellence beyond mere power of speech, while several of them are quite ready to do justice to Harold's great qualities in other respects, even while they condemn his supposed perjury and usurpation. The first however, and, in some respects, the most important, William of Poitiers, the immediate follower and laureate of the Conqueror, has not the slightest mercy for either father or son. He stops twice in the course of his history to apostrophize, first Godwine (p. 79 Giles) and then Harold (p. 111), in terms of virulent abuse, the declamation in the latter case being brought in with the formula, "Paucis igitur de affabimur, Heralde." But these addresses contain nothing but the old stories about the death of Ælfred and the oath to William. Elsewhere (126) the Lexovian Archdeacon gives his general character of Harold, describing him as "luxuriâ fædum, truculentum homicidam, divite rapinâ superbum, adversarium æqui et boni." "Truculentus homicida," as appears from the context, means "victor at Stamfordbridge;" "luxuriâ fœdus" may possibly mean "lover of Eadgyth Swanneshals."

William of Jumièges writes of Godwine in the same strain as William of Poitiers. Harold is of course usurper, perjurer, and so forth, but there is no such set abuse of him as we find in the Gesta Guillelmi. Of Godwine he writes (vii. 9);

"Ferox dolique commentor Godvinus eo tempore Comes in Anglià potentissimus erat, et magnam regni Anglorum partem fortiter tenebat, quam ex parentum nobilitate [a contrast to the description in Wace] seu vi vel fraudulentià vendicaverat. Edwardus itaque metuens tanti viri potentià lædi dolove solito, Normannorum consultu, quorum fido vigebat solatio, indignam Aluredi fratris sui perniciem ei benignitèr indulsit."

Other writers on the same side are more generous, at any rate towards Harold. Orderic, as usual, fluctuates between his two characters of born Englishman and Norman monk. In this Norman monastery he had been taught that Harold was a wicked usurper, and he speaks of him accordingly. But natural admiration for an illustrious countryman makes him, once at least, burst his trammels, and he ventures to say (492 B); "Erat idem Anglus magnitudine et elegantia, viribusque corporis animique audacia, et linguæ facundia, multisque facetiisque et probitatibus admirabilis." One can almost forgive him when he adds, "Sed quid ei tanta dona sine fide, quæ bonorum omnium fundamentum est, contulerunt?"

In the like spirit Benoît de Sainte-More, though denouncing Harold (Chroniques Anglo-Normandes, i. 174) as "Parjur, faus, pleins de coveitise," yet elsewhere (i. 193) gives him this generous tribute;

"Proz ert Heraut e vertuos, E empernanz e corajos. N'estoveit pas en nule terre Sos ciel meillor chevaler querre. Beaus estait trop e bons parlers, Donierre e larges viandiers."

The series of English writers under Norman influence may be said to begin with Henry of Huntingdon. It is strange that one who has preserved so much of old English tradition should be so absolutely without English feeling in the great controversy of all. We have already (vol. i. p. 543) seen some specimens of his way of dealing with Godwine. As for Harold, he tells the legend of his quarrel with Tostig, of which I shall speak elsewhere, and goes on (M. H. B. 761 B); "Tantæ namque sævitiæ fratres illi erant, quod quum alicujus nitidam villam conspicerent, dominatorem de nocte interfici juberent totamque progeniem illius, possessionemque defuncti obtinerent; et isti quidem justitiarii erant regni." This is somewhat expanded by Roger of Wendover—to quote an author rather later than the limit which I had laid down. All the sons of Godwine, Wulfnoth perhaps included, were partakers in these evil deeds ("Tantæ namque iniquitatis omnes filii Godwini proditoris erant." i. 508), and Henry's last clause is expanded into, "qui tamen, super tot flagitia, Regis simplicitatem ita circumvenerunt, quod ipeos regni justitiarios constituerit et rectores." What was the exact notion of "justitiarii" in the minds of Henry and Roger?

Eadward's own special panegyrist, Æthelred of Rievaux, is hardly so bitter against Harold as might have been looked for. Of course he speaks of his accession in the usual fashion, and he tells the legend of his enmity with Tostig. Of Godwine he gives (X Scriptt. 377) the following picture, which is at least valuable as witnessing to the still abiding memory of Godwine's power of speech;

"Erat inter potentes Anglise omnium potentissimus Comes Godwinus, vir magnarum opum sed astutise singularis, Regum regnique proditor, qui, doctus fallere et quælibet dissimulare consuetus, facilè populum ad cujuslibet factionis inclinabat assensum."

I will now turn to two or three writers who are neither English nor Norman. The biographer of Olaf Tryggwesson seems to stand alone in wishing to make a saint of Harold ("Haraldur Gudina son, er sumir kalla helgan vera." p. 263). This is remarkable, for, though he mentions, as we shall hereafter see, the tale that Harold was not killed on the field at Senlac, he seems to know nothing of his penitence and hermit life. But other Scandinavian and German writers seem quite to take the Norman view of things. Thus Adam of Bremen (iii. 13) says of the sons of Godwine, "Tenuerunt Angliam in ditione suâ, Eduardo tantum vitâ et inani Regis nomine contento." So also his Scholiast, "Harold . . . . ipsum cognatum et dominum suum, Regem Eduardum pro nihilo habuit." Elsewhere (iii. 51) he calls Harold "vir maleficus." Saxo, of whose ideas I have already given some specimens (see vol. i. p. 592), is more violent against Harold than any one else. Having told his wonderful tale about the slaughter of the Danes after the death of Harthacnut, he goes on (p. 203);

"Igitur Haraldus, Danicæ oppressionis simulque domesticæ libertatis auctor, Edvardo summam, factå non animi ejus sed sanguinis æstimatione, permittit, quatenus ille nominis, ipse rerum usurpatione regnaret, et quo nobilitate pervenire non posset, potentiå vallatus assurgeret. Edvardus vero, sola generis auctoritate non prudentise ratione munitus, vano majestatis obtentu pravorum ingenia majorumque petulantiam nutriebat, titulo Rex patrize, conditione miserabilis procerum verna, contentus quod alii fructum, ipse umbram tantum ac speciem occupasset. Ità Anglorum inter se summam nomen atque potentiam diviserunt, titulique jus ac rerum dominium veluti diversis ab invicem gradibus differebant." He then goes on with his wild tale, which I have had occasion to mention already (see p. 413), about Harold killing Eadward. Elsewhere (p. 207) he uses the words "Haraldus, cui scelera Mali cognomen adjecerant," in which it is not very clear whether he means our Harold or Harold Hardrada.

Snorro gives no portrait of Harold, and his genealogy, as we shall see, is utterly confused. But he gives a picture of Harold's relations to Eadward which is at least widely different from that of Saxo. He makes him the King's favourite and foster son ("Hann fæddiz upp í hird, Játvardar Konungs, oc var hans fóstr son, oc unni Konungr honöm geysi mikit, oc hafdi hann fyrir son ser; þvíat Konúngrinn átti eigi barn." Johnstone, 189. Laing, iii. 75).

I leave it to the reader to judge which description, either of father or son, is better borne out by the facts of the history. I will only add that, in this case also, calumny, as usual, preserves a certain propriety. Godwine was a crafty, and not always scrupulous, statesman; Harold was a hero. The calumnies levelled at each are such as would naturally be levelled at a crafty statesman and a hero respectively.

NOTE E. p. 32.

THE ALLEGED SPOLIATIONS OF THE CHURCH BY GODWI AND HAROLD.

The charge of sacrilege, of spoliation of churches teries, is one which Godwine and Harold share with almost every powerful man of those times. William of Malmesbury as a characteristic of the reign of Eadward; only he state that the King's paneovieta attributed in King's panegyrists attributed this, along with the other time, to Godwine and his sons. According to them, it was for these crimes of one sort or another that Eadward banished the whole family. The whole passage (ii. 196) is curious;

"Fuerunt tamen nonnulla que gloriam temporum deturpârunt; monasteria tunc monachis viduata; prava judicia à perversis hominibus commissa. . . . . Sed harum rerum invidiam amatores ipsius ità extenuare conantur; monasteriorum destructio, perversitas judiciorum, non ejus scientia, sed per Godwini filiorumque ejus sunt commissa violentiam, qui Regis ridebant indulgentiam; postea tamen ad eum delata, acritèr illorum exsilio vindicata."

This is of course Norman talk, and we know very well what to think of the "perversitas judiciorum." But for the charge of destruction of monasteries there is undoubtedly a groundwork of fact, and it will be worth while to go through the evidence on which Godwine and his sons are charged with this and other acts of sacrilege. On this evidence I have two general comments to make.

First, In estimating charges of this sort we must remember that we commonly hear one side only. The works of Ealdorman Æthelweard and Count Fulk form so small a portion of our authorities that we may say that the whole history of these times was written exclusively by churchmen. And those churchmen were far more commonly monks than seculars. The monks of course tell the story their own way, and we do not often get the layman's answer. A legal claim against a monastery or other ecclesiastical body runs a very fair chance of being represented as a fraudulent or violent occupation. And Domesday is hardly an impartial witness for a charge against Harold. If he acquired lands by as good a title as he acquired the Crown, the Norman writers would, if they had the least excuse, speak of their acquisition in the same way in which they speak of his acquisition of the Crown.

Secondly, It was a very common thing for the reeves or other officers of powerful men to deal very freely with both monastic and other lands that came in their way. This they sometimes did without the knowledge of their masters. Thus Heming, in the Worcester Cartulary (p. 391), reckons three classes of "maligni homines" who unjustly deprived the Church of Worcester of its possessions. First come the "Dani hanc patriam invadentes;" secondly, after them ("postea"), are the "injusti prepositi et regii exactores;" lastly, in his own day ("istis temporibus") come the "violenti Normanni." Sir Henry Ellis (ii. 142) has collected a number of instances of spoliation by underlings, of one of which, the story about Christ Church and Harold Harefoot, I have already spoken (see vol. i. p. 562). Some of these I shall have to mention again.

Now we shall come across distinct evidence that some of the charges againt Godwine and Harold come under one or other of these heads. And in estimating other charges of the kind against Godwine, Harold, or anybody else, we should always bear in mind that we are hearing one side only, and that it is quite probable that an equally good defence might be forthcoming. The charge of sacrilege is brought against Godwine in the one English Chronicle which may be called in some degree hostile to him. The Abingdon Chronicle (1052) recording his death, adds, "Ac he dyde ealles to lytle dædbote of pære Godes are pe he hæfde of manegum halgum stowum." But even this must be read with the same qualification.

The general picture of destruction of monasteries mentioned by William of Malmesbury sounds strange at a time when so many monasteries were being founded and endowed and their churches being rebuilt. I conceive that it rests mainly on two remarkable cases, those of the Abbeys of Berkeley and Leominster, which seem to have got confounded together in legendary history. I trust that I have shown elsewhere that Leominster Abbey was dissolved after the affair of Swegen and Eadgifu in 1046 (see above, p. 89). I conceive it to be a legendary version of this story when Walter Map (De Nugis Curialium, p. 201, ed. Wright) tells a tale of the destruction of Berkeley nunnery, how Godwine sets a handsome nephew to seduce the nuns, how he then complains to the King of their misconduct, how he procures the dissolution of the house and the grant of its possessions to himself. It is certain that there was a real suppression of a monastery at Berkeley, and that Godwine profited by it in some way or other. As in Domesday we find Leominster in the hands of the Lady Eadgyth, with only a most incidental mention of the nuns, so we find Berkeley (163) in the hands of the King, without any mention of monks or nuns, or of Godwine either. But that there had been a monastery at Berkeley appears from a variety of evidence. See Cod. Dipl. i. 276. ii. 111. Flor. Wig. 805. 915 in the former of which years we find an Abbess, Ceolburh by have presiding over the house, while in the latter it was governed by a Abbot, Æthelhun. But, as Professor Stubbs has shown in in Archæological Journal, vol. xix. (1862), p. 248, the existence of a Abbess does not necessarily imply the presence of nuns, as many monasteries seem to have had either Abbots or Abbesses, as sum family convenience. There is also mention of nuns at Berkeley : a time later than Godwine, in a charter of Adeliza, Queen of Heart the First (Monasticon, iv. 42, and vi. 1618), and in the Pipe Rai of 31 Hen. I. (ed. Hunter, p. 133; "in vestitura iii. monialium lx.s." For this last reference I have to thank Professor By the Charter of Adeliza the Church of Berkeley, with the "Prebends of two nuns," was granted to the new Abbey & Reading, by which the church was afterwards transferred to Seiz Augustine's at Bristol (Smyth's Lives of the Berkeleys, p. 49). But the whole account of these later nuns of Berkeley is very obscure. and whatever they were, they must have been a revival of the old foundation later than the time of Godwine. For the destruction of the monastery at Berkeley, and Godwine's share in it, are undoubted facts, though we are left without any explanation as to their causes. A most remarkable entry in Domesday (164) tells us that, when Godwine was at Berkeley, his wife Gytha refused to est anything which came out of that lordship, because of a pious scruple arising out of the destruction of the Abbey. Godwine therefore bought of Azor, a man of whom we often hear, the lordship of Woodchester (a place near Stroud, noted for its Roman remains), for her maintenance when in Gloucestershire ("Gueda mater Heraldi Comitis tenuit Udecestre. Godwinus Comes emit ab Azor, et dedit suse uxori, ut inde viveret, donec ad Berchelai Nolebat enim de ipso manerio aliquid comedere, propter maneret. destructionem Abbatiæ." We have no further account, except the evidently mythical tale told by Walter Map. means clear whether there were or were not any nuns at Berkeley in Godwine's time, and probably no one would accept Walter Map's tale as it stands. But that tale may very likely be a romantic improvement of the story of Swegen and Eadgifu, transferred from Leominster to Berkeley. Both Leominster and Berkeley were monasteries suppressed in the reign of Fadward. Godwine or his

Both were restored, in one shape or another, in later ways; both became connected with the Abbey of Reading. To substitute one name for the other was one of the most obvious of confusions. The details of the story of course grew, like the details of other stories. Berkeley Abbey, at all events, was suppressed, and Godwine had a power of disposing of its revenues. Here then we have one clear case in which Godwine was concerned in the destruction of a monastery. We do not know whether he had any justification to offer for his conduct, but we know that it was not approved by his own wife.

It appears also that Godwine was charged by the Norman Archbishop Robert with converting some lands belonging to the see of Canterbury to his own use. Here however we for once get the Godwinist version. The lands of the Earl and the Archbishop joined, and there was a dispute about boundaries. We cannot, at this distance of time, say in whose favour a jury would have decided; but it is plain that Robert claimed lands of which Godwine was in actual possession, and that Godwine's friends looked upon the Archbishop and not the Earl as the intruder. This is a very important case, from our having the tale told from the side of the layman. It is a case which by itself would be enough to make us always weigh the possibility that there may have been another side to many other cases in which we get only the churchman's statement. It is impossible for us now to tell on whose side the legal right lay in the dispute between Godwine and Robert; but there ' is every appearance that it was simply a question for a legal tribunal, one in which each side may well have urged its claims in good faith. The story, as told by the Biographer of Eadward (p. 400), runs as follows;

"Accedebat autem ad exercendos odiorum motus pro Episcopo in caussam justam quod terræ quædam Ducis contiguæ erant quibusdam terris quæ ad Christi attinebant Ecclesiam [that is, Christ Church, Canterbury]. Crebræ quoque erant inter eos controversiæ, quod eum dicebat terras archiepiscopatûs sui invasisse, et in injuriâ suâ usibus suis eas tenere. Ferebat autem idem industrius Dux incautiùs furentem Episcopum pacificè. . . . . Coquebat tamen vehementiùs quosdam suorum illa Ducis injuria, et nisi ejus obstiterit prohibitio, gravi Episcopum persæpe multâssent contumeliâ."

In this last clause we seem to see the over-zealous officers, of whom we hear in other stories, and whom Godwine so characteristically keeps in order.

These are, as far as I know, the only particular cases in which it is possible to test the value of the general remark made by the Abingdon Chronicler as to Godwine's occupations of Church property. In the case of Berkeley we can say absolutely nothing either way, except so far as Gytha's scruple may be held to tell against her husband. In the Kentish case Godwine may well have had a perfectly good defence. The charges against Harold are more numerous. They rest mainly on certain entries in Domesday, which have been carefully collected by Sir Henry Ellis (i. 313). Harold is there said to have taken, or to have held unjustly, various pieces of ecclesiastical property, and in most cases it is carefully noted that William caused them to be restored by some legal process. Thus, in Sussex (21 b), we find a virgate of land at Apedroc which Harold "habuit et abstulit à Sancto Johanne." This seems not to have been restored; it had become a chief dwelling-place of William's half-brother Earl Robert ("ubi Comes habet aulam suam"), and Robert was to be as much preferred to Saint John, as Saint John was to be preferred to Harold. In Wiltshire (69), at Allington, were four hides "quas injuste abstraxit Heraldus ab ecclesiá Ambresberie testimonio tainorum sciræ." Three lordships in Dorset (75 b, 78 b) are said to have been taken by Harold ("abstulerat Heraldus Comes") from Shaftesbury Abbey, and to have been restored by William on the evidence of a charter of Eadward ("Willelmus Rex eam fecit resaisiri, quia in ipsâ ecclesiâ inventus est brevis cum sigillo Regis Eadwardi præcipiens ut ecclesiæ restituerentur"). So in Cornwall (121) an estate is in like manner restored to Saint Petroc's. One in Hertfordshire (132) helps us to a date; "Heraldus Comes abstulit inde, ut tota syra testatur, et apposuit in Hiz manerio suo, tribus annis ante mortem Regis Eadwardi (1063)." Another entry, in nearly the same words, but without a date, follows in fol. 133. There are two others in which we see the agency of the reeves or other officers. In Dorset (80) we find that "Elnod tenuit T. R. E. per Comitem Heraldum, qui eam abstulit cuidam clerico." So in Kent (2), "Alnod cild per violentiam Heraldi abstulit Sancto Martino Merclesham et Hauochesten, pro quibus dedit Canonicis iniquam commutationem." This last entry is important. The act, though called "violentia," was really an exchange, and the spirit of these entries in Domesday is so clear that we can hardly venture to say that it may not have been a fair and legal exchange.

There is also a whole string of entries in Herefordshire (181 b, 182), where it is said, "Hoc manerium tenuit Heraldus Comes injustè. Rex Willelmus reddidit Walterio Episcopo." These must be taken in connexion with two writs addressed by Eadward to Harold in Herefordshire. One (Cod. Dipl. iv. 218) is addressed to him jointly with Bishop Ealdred, and therefore belongs to the time (1058-1060) when Ealdred administered the see after the death of Leofgar (see above, p. 398). This writ confirms to the Priests of Saint Æthelberht's minster all their ancient rights, it speaks of them as suffering poverty "for God's love and mine," and calls on all men to help them. The other (iv. 194), addressed to Harold together with Osbern (see above, p. 346), announces the appointment of Walter to the Bishoprick (in 1060), and requires the restoration of all property alienated from the see. The earlier description of the poverty of the Canons can hardly fail to refer to losses sustained through the ravages of Ælfgar and Gruffydd in 1055 (see above, pp. 388, 391).

There is also a will of Leofric, Bishop of Exeter (Cod. Dipl. iv. 274), in which that Prelate leaves to his Church the land which Harold had lawlessly taken at Topsham ("Sæt land æt Toppeshamme, Se ah Se Harold hit mid unlage útnam"). The Bishop died in 1072, but the land had not then been recovered. Topsham appears in the Exon Domesday (p. 87) as a possession of the Crown formerly held by Harold, without any mention of the rights of the Church of Exeter.

The reader must judge how far any of the qualifications with which I set out can be made to bear on any of these cases. What if the land at Topsham, afterwards the port of Exeter, was needed for the defence of the coast? The Bishop would very likely look on its appropriation for such a purpose, even if it were paid for, as a thing done "mid unlage."

There remains the great story of the alleged quarrel between Harold and Gisa, Bishop of Wells. Of this we know the details, we can trace the growth of misrepresentation, and it may perhaps statement on Harold's side, but the original charge against him, as contrasted with its later shapes, pretty well explains itself. The story however is a somewhat long one, and it may moreover fairly count as a part of the general history. I shall therefore keep back its consideration till its proper chronological place in the narrative, when I shall make it the subject of a distinct note. I will now add a few instances which illustrate the general subject by showing that Godwine and Harold by no means stand alone in bearing accusations of this sort. In the case of nearly every powerful man, including the most munificent benefactors to ecclesiastical bodies, we find the same story of the detention of Church property in some shape or other, or of transactions in which it is easy to see the possible groundwork of such a charge.

I mentioned in a former Chapter (i. 289) that the very model of monastic benefactors, Æthelwine the Friend of God, laid claim to, and made good his claim to, certain lands possessed by the Abbey of Ely. As the Ely historian (Hist. El. i. 5) himself tells the story, it is plain that the claim made by the Ealdorman was certainly legal and probably just. Yet the monastic writer clearly thinks that he ought to have given way even to an unjust claim on the part of the Church, and he uses just the same language which Domesday applies to Harold; "postpositâ Sanctse Ecclesise reverentia, eamdem terram invadentes sibi vindicarunt." Soon after (c. 8) we come to a story of the same kind about Æthelwine's son Ælfwold. Godwine of Lindesey, one of the heroes of Assandun, is spoken of as a pertinacious enemy of the Church of Evesham (see vol. i. p. 568). The story about Harold Harefoot I have mentioned The passage which I quoted from William of more than once. Malmesbury at the beginning of this note also shows that Saint Eadward himself was by some people personally blamed for the destruction of monasteries in his reign. And it is, at any rate, clear that the estates of the dissolved houses of Leominster and Berkeley had become royal property-more legally folkland-just as they would have done in the time of Henry the Eighth. Eadgyth, the rose sprung from the thorn, enjoyed the revenues of Leominster, seemingly without any of the scruples which her mother felt in the case of Berkeley. We find her also (see above, p. 46) engaged in some other transactions about ecclesiastical property, which look at least as doubtful as an thing attributed to her father and brother. Nay, one writer goes 60 far as to charge her sainted husband himself with complicity in her doings of this kind. Twice does the Peterborough historian (Hugo Candidus, Sparke, p. 42) say of possessions held or claimed by that monastery, "Rex et Regina Edgita illam villam vi auferre conati sunt." So one of the charges brought against Tostig, the benefactor of the Church of Durham (see p. 383), was that he had "robbed God" (see p. 481). Siward also, the founder of Galmanho, and his son Waltheof, who, as a monastic hero, ranks by the side of Æthelwine, both stand charged with detaining lands belonging to the Abbey of Peterborough (see above, p. 374). Eadwine, the brother of Leofric, possessed lands claimed by the Church of Worcester, and the local writer Heming (p. 278) evidently looked on his death at Rhyd-y-Groes as the punishment; "Sed ipse diu hâc rapinâ gavisus non est. Nam ipse non multo post a Grifino Rege Brittonum ignominiosa morte peremptus est." Nay, Leofric and Godgifu themselves, the models of all perfection, do not seem to have been quite clear on this score. Her reverence for Saint Wulfstan led Godgifu to suggest to her husband the restoration of certain lordships in his possession which had belonged to the Church of Worcester ("Terras quas antea Dani cæterique Dei adversarii vi abstulerant, et ab ipsa Wigornensi ecclesia penitus alienaverant." Heming in Ang. Sacr. i. 541). Her son Ælfgar followed her example There is also in Domesday (283 b) a most curious entry about certain lands at Alveston in Warwick-They are inserted among the estates of the Church of Worcester; but it is said of the sons of the former tenant Bricstuinus (Brihtstán?); "Hoc testantur filii ejus Lewinus [Leofwine], Edmar [Eadmer] et alii quatuor, sed nesciunt de quo, an de Ecclesiâ an de Comite Leuric [Leofric], cui serviebat, hanc terram tenuit. Dicunt tamen quod ipsi tenuerunt eam de L. Comite, et quò volebant cum terra poterant se vertere." Here we may discern a case of free commendation, whether to the Church or to the Earl, but here are also ample materials for a charge against Leofric of detaining the lands of the Church of Worcester. Lastly, I may mention cases in which Prelates like Bishop Ælfweard (p. 69) and Archbishop Ealdred (p. 467) stand charged with wrongfully transferring property from one church to another. These last cases, if they can be made out, seem to an impartial eye just as bad as the occupation of Church lands by laymen. The breach of law is equal, and when a Prelate, as Ealdred is said to have done, robbed the church which he was leaving in favour of the church of which he was taking possession, the personal greediness is equal. In fact, in all these cases, the real crime lies in the breach of law which is implied in the violent or fraudulent occupation of anything, whether the party wronged be clerk or layman, individual or corporation. We must be on our guard alike against the exaggerated notions about the crime of sacrilege put forth by ecclesiastical writers, and also against the opposite prejudices of some moderns, who sometimes talk as if the robbing of a monastery were actually a praiseworthy deed.

On the whole, considering all the instances, we shall perhaps see reason to think that all charges of this kind, charges in which we can very seldom hear both sides, must be taken with great doubt and qualification. On the other hand it is plain that the tenure of Church property, perhaps of all property, was in those rough days very uncertain. Men, we may well believe, often gave with one hand and took with the other. No one did this more systematically than the Great William himself. I will end this long note with the comments of his namesake of Malmesbury on William's doings in this respect, comments which seem to have been equally applicable to many others among the great men of his age;

"Ita ejus tempore ultro citroque cœnobialis grex excrevit, monasteria surgebant, religione vetera, ædificiis recentia. Sed hic animadverto mussitationem dicentium, melius fuisse ut antiqua in suo statu conservarentur, quam, illis semimutilatis, de rapinâ nova construerentur" (iii. 278).

NOTE F. p. 36.

THE CHILDREN OF GODWINE.

THE question of Godwine's marriage or marriages I examined in my first volume (p. 467), and I there came to the conclusion that there is no ground for attributing to him more than one wife, namely Gytha, the daughter of Thurgils Sprakaleg and sister of Ulf. There is no doubt that Gytha was the mother of all those sons and daughters of Godwine who play such a memorable part in our history.

The fullest lists of Godwine's sons are those given by William of Malmesbury (ii. 200) and Orderic (502 B). William's list runs thus, Harold, Swegen, Tostig, Wulfnoth, Gyrth, Leofwine. That of Orderic is, Swegen, Tostig, Harold, Gyrth, Ælfgar, Leofwine, Wulfnoth. Saxo (196) speaks of Harold, Beorn, and Tostig as sons of Godwine; that is, he mistook Beorn the nephew of Gytha for her son. Snorro (Laing, iii. 75. Ant. Celt. Scand. 189) has a far more amazing genealogy. He seems to assume that Godwine must have been the father of every famous Englishman of his time, and he reckons up his sons thus—Tostig the eldest, Maurokari (Morkere), Waltheof, Swegen, and Harold. He pointedly adds that Harold was the youngest. It must be on the same principle that Bromton (943) seems to make Godwine the father of Gruffydd of At least his list runs thus, Swegen, Wulfnoth, Leofwine, Harold, Tostig, and Griffin. So Walter of Hemingburgh (i: 4) gives Godwine a son Griffus, which may be a confusion between Gruffydd and Gyrth. Knighton (2334) gives the sons as Swegen, Harold, Tostig, Wulfnoth, Gyrth, and Leofric. But elsewhere, as Bromton had given Godwine a Gruffydd, Knighton in the same spirit helps him to a Llywelyn. At least he talks (2238) of the "malitia et superbia Haraldi et Lewlini filiorum Godwini."

The Biographer mentions four sons, Harold, Tostig, Gyrth, and Leofric. This last mistake is odd, as from the combined authority of the Chronicles, Florence, Domesday, and the Tapestry, there can be no doubt that the true name is Leofwine. But the two names are much alike, and both were current in the great Mercian house, whence they probably came into the house of Godwine. If Earl Leofric was the godfather of Godwine's son, and gave him, not his own name, but that of his father Leofwine, the confusion would be easily accounted for.

Of these sons, there is no doubt about six, namely Swegen, Harold, Tostig, Gyrth, Leofwine, Wulfnoth, who all figure in the history at different points. The only question is whether we ought, on the sole authority of Orderic, to add a seventh son named Ælfgar. According to him, Ælfgar lived and died a monk at Rheims, and Wulfnoth did the like at Salisbury. This is undoubtedly false as regards Wulfnoth; and the tale of a son of Godwine, otherwise unknown, spending his whole life in a French monastery has a somewhat apocryphal sound. At any rate we may dismiss Align, as a person of whose actions, if he ever existed, we have no knowledge, while of the other six brethren we know a good deal.

Of the daughters of Godwine, there is no need to prove the existence of Eadgyth the Lady. Another daughter, Gunhild, rests on the sure evidence of the Exon Domesday (pp. 96, 99, "Gunnila filia Comitis Godwini"). She also has a history. A third daughter. Ælfgifu, is more doubtful. Kelham (Domesday, 153) and Sw Henry Ellis (i. 309) speak of "Ælveva soror Heraldi" as occurring in Domesday, but they give no reference, and I have not as yet been able to find her name in the great record. But it seems likely that Godwine had a third daughter, and it is not unlikely that her name was Ælfgifu. It is part of the story of Harold's oath (Sim. Dun. 1066 and elsewhere) that he promised to marry his sister to one of William's nobles. Obviously this cannot apply to Eadgyth, nor yet to Gunhild, who was devoted to a religious life. I shall, in my next volume, discuss the question whether this sister may not be the puzzling Ælfgyva of the Tapestry.

Of the order of the sons there is no doubt. Swegen ("filius primogenitus Swanus," Fl. Wig. 1051) was the eldest. Harold came next. That Harold was older than Tostig is plain from the Biographer ("major natu Haroldus," 409), and indeed from the whole history. So even Saxo (207) speaks of "minores Godovini filii [which at least includes Tostig] majorem perosi." Orderic's notion (492 D) that Harold was younger that Tostig is simply a bit of the Norman legend, devised to represent Harold as depriving his elder brother, sometimes of the Earldom, sometimes of the Kingdom. Snorro's idea that Harold was the youngest of all is wilder still. The order of the several brothers is marked very plainly in the dates of their promotion to Earldoms; this is Swegen, Harold, Tostig, Gyrth, Leofwine. Wulfnoth, who never held an Earldom, was doubtless the youngest.

The order in which the brothers sign charters is worth notice. Setting aside one impossible charter (Cod. Dipl. iv. 80-84), Swegen always signs before Harold, Harold always before Tostig, Tostig always before Gyrth and Leofwine. But Harold, Gyrth, and Leofwine do not observe so strict an order among themselves. May we not infer from the recorded disposition and actions of Swegen and Tostig that a certain attention to ceremony was needed in their cases, while the other three brothers, who lived and died firm friends, could afford to dispense with it?

The order of the daughters among themselves must have been Eadgyth, Gunhild, Ælfgifu, if there was an Ælfgifu. For a daughter of Godwine and Gytha to have been talked of as an intended wife for any one in 1066, she must have been the very youngest of the family.

The order of the sisters with regard to their brothers is more difficult to fix. It is hopeless to try to fix the place of Gunhild. But, as Ælfgifu must have been the youngest, there is some reason to believe that Eadgyth was the eldest of the family. The Biographer (p. 397) compares four children of Godwine, seemingly Eadgyth, Harold, Tostig, and Gyrth—he never mentions Swegen—to the four rivers of Paradise;

"Felix prole più Dux, stirpe beatus avità,
His quatuor natis dans Anglia pignora pacis.
Prodit gemma prior, varize probitatis amatrix,
In medio Regni, tanto Duce filia patre Ædgit digna suo, Regi condigna marito."

This looks as if Eadgyth was the eldest of all. Godwine and Gytha were married in 1019 (see vol. i. p. 467). Harold therefore, the second son, could not, even if Eadgyth was younger than himself, have been born before 1021, perhaps not till 1022 or later. He therefore could not have been above twenty-four when he became Earl, nor above forty-five at his death—he may of course have been younger. But none of Godwine's sons who held Earldoms could have been so young as William of Malmesbury fancied Gyrth to be in 1066, when he calls him (iii. 239) "plus puero adultus et magnæ ultra ætatem virtutis et scientiæ." He had then been Earl of the East-Angles for nine years.

NOTE G. p. 36.

THE GREAT EARLDOMS DURING THE REIGN OF EADWARD.

It is not always easy to trace the succession of the men who ruled the different Earldoms of England during the reign of Eadward. In several cases the Chronicles give us notices of the death, deposition, or translation of one Earl and of the appointment of his successor. But these entries taken alone would not enable us to put together a perfect series of the Earls. For instance, Eadwine (1065), Gyrth (1066), Leofwine (1066), Waltheof (1066), are all spoken of as Earls without any account of their appointment, and, in the last three cases, without any hint as to the districts over which they ruled. To make out anything like a perfect list, we must go to various incidental notices in the royal writs and elsewhere. By their help we shall be sble to recover, not indeed an absolutely complete account, but one much fuller than appears on the face of the history, and one which reveals to us a great number of anomalies which we should not have expected. The way in which several Earls held isolated shires detached from the main body of their Earldoms, and the way in which shires were transferred from the jurisdiction of one Earl to that of another, are both of them very remarkable.

For a complete view of these changes, and indeed of the general succession of the Earls, we must go back to the four fold division of England by Caut in 1017 (see vol. England by Cnut in 1017 (see vol. i. P. 448). Cnut then kept Wessex in his own hands and approximately the process. Wessex in his own hands, and appointed Eadric over Mercia, Thurkill over East-Anglia Eric over Thurkill over East-Anglia, Eric over Northumberland. In 1020 Now in these four great government. Earldom under Godwine. Now in these four great governments sion of Earls without difficulty with +1. Anglia. We have no account of that Romanial Bright exception of East-Anglia. We have no account of that Earldom from the banishment of Thurkill in 1021 (see vol. i. p. 4 and 100 from the banishment of of Thurkill in 1021 (see vol. i. p. 473) to the appointment of Harold, seemingly in 1045 (see above, P. 37). As For Northumber-land, I have already traced out the 37). As land, I have already traced out the succession of its Earls (see vol. i. p. 585 et seqq.). There is no decreasion of Eadward, Siward was in possession that, the accession of the old of Eadward, Siward was in possession of that,

Northern realm, and that he remained to both of them till Northern realm, and that he remained in both possess of them till his death. The succession in Wessex is possess. Godwine was his death. The succession in Wessex is Plainer still? Godwine was appointed in 1020, Harold succeeded him er still? there is no appointed in 1020, Harold succeeded him er still; there is no room for any question, except as to the in 1053; the Earldon room for any question, except as to the disposal the Earldon during the year of Godwine's banishment. And the mere succes. during the year of Godwine's banishment. sion in Mercia is equally plain. Leofwine And the ed Eadric in 1017; Leofric succeeded Leofwine some succeeded Eadric in en 1024 and 1017; Leofric succeeded Leofwine some time succeeden 1024 and 1032 (see vol. i. p. 461); Ælfgar succeeded bet Fric in 1057; Eadwine, there can be no reasonable doub.

Eligar succeeded Leo Fric in 1057; Eadwine, there can be no reasonable doubt, succeeded Eligar on his death, at some time between 1062 and 1065. Our difficulties are of other kinds. There is, first, the great uncertainty as to the meaning of the name Mercia. There is the fact that various shires, especially in Mercia, are found in the hands of other Earls than those to whom the fourfold division would seem to have committed them. There is the fact that we find mention of Earls holding Earldoms other than the four great ones, and seemingly formed by dismemberments of the four. Lastly, we find, especially under Cnut, the names of several Earls whom it is not easy to supply with Earldoms.

This last difficulty need not greatly trouble us. It does not follow that every Danish chief who signs a charter of Cnut with the title of Earl was actually established in an English Earldom. On the other hand, some one must have ruled in East-Anglia between 1021 and 1045, and it is a fair guess, though nothing more, that the successive husbands of Gunhild, Hakon and Harold (see vol. i. p. 475 et seqq.), who are spoken of as if they had some permanent connexion with England, were Earls of the East-Angles during some parts of that interval. The main difficulty springs from what seem to have been the constantly fluctuating arrangements of the Mercian shires. The old chaotic state of central England seems to revive. First, it is not always clear what we are to understand by the name Mercia. The name at this stage sometimes includes, sometimes excludes, those parts of old Mercia which were ceded by Ælfred to Guthrum. Secondly, we find various shires, Mercian in one or the other sense, which are not under the government of the person spoken of as the Earl of the Mercians.

Now when, as in the fourfold division made by Cnut, Wessex, Northumberland, East-Anglia, and Mercia are spoken of as an exhaustive division of England, there can be no doubt that Mercia is taken in the widest sense, meaning the whole land from Bristol on the Avon to Barton on the Humber. With this great government Eadric was invested. But it is equally plain (see vol. i. p. 580) that, at a somewhat later time, either Mercia in this sense was dismembered in favour of independent Earls, or else subordinate Earls were appointed under a superior Earl of the Mercians. I will now put together the evidence which we find on these heads.

The first hint which we come across of a dismemberment of this kind is in 1041, when we find Thuri or Thored, "Comes Mediterraneorum" and Rani or Hranig, "Comes Magesetensium," distinguished from Leofric, "Comes Merciorum." ()f Thored we also know that his Earldom took in Huntingdonshire. See vol. i. p. 580, where a writ of Harthacnut addressed to him is quoted. And one may suspect that we ought to substitute the same name for "Toli comes" who in a Huntingdon writ of Eadward (Cod. Dipl. iv. 243) is addressed along with Bishop Eadnoth, fixing the date of the writ to the years 1042-1050. (This Toli can hardly be Tolig who is elsewhere addressed in Suffolk, seemingly as Sheriff under the Earldom of Gyrth. Cod. Dipl. iv. 222, 223.) Of Ranig we know that he held the rank of Earl as early as 1023 (see vol. i. p. 580). We may therefore be inclined to suspect that Mercia was dismembered on the death of Eadric, and that, besides the Mercian Earldom held by Leofwine and Leofric, two fresh Earldoms, whether subordinate or independent, were formed within the limits of the old Mercian Kingdom. On the whole I am inclined to think that a certain superiority was always retained by Leofric, as chief Earl of the Mercians. He always fills a special place, alongside of Godwine and Siward, and we shall come across evidence to show that some of the dismembered shires did, in the end, revert to him or to his house.

As to this Earldom of the "Mediterranei" or Middle-Angles, held by Thored, we have no distinct account of its extent. But it is a probable guess that it took in the whole eastern part of Mercia, the part in which the Danish element was strongest. I am inclined to think that in this Earldom Thored was succeeded by Our indications are certainly slight, but they look that way. We hear nothing distinctly of Thored in Eadward's time, while it is plain (see p. 36) that Beorn held some Earldom from about the year 1045 till his murder. We know also that his Earldom took in Hertfordshire (Cod. Dipl. iv. 19c). I infer then that Reorn was Earl of the Middle-Angles, of Eastern or Danish Mercia. I also infer that in that Earldom he had no one successor. Earl is spoken of in the later days of Eadward who can show any claim to such a description, and several of the shires contained within the country which I conceive to have been held by Thored and Beorn seem to have remained in a sort of fluctuating state, ready to be attached to any of the great governments, as might be convenient.

Thus Huntingdonshire was within the Earldom of Thored. But in 1051 (Flor. Wig. in anno) we find it, together with Cambridgeshire, a shire still so closely connected with it as to have a common Sheriff, detached altogether from Mercia, and forming part of the East-Anglian Earldom of Harold. "Men" of Harold's in Huntingdonshire accordingly occur in Domesday (p. 208). But Huntingdonshire was afterwards separated from East-Anglia, perhaps on Harold's translation to Wessex in 1053. It then became, strange to say, an outlying portion of the Earldom of Northumberland. It does not however appear that Cambridgeshire followed it in this last migration. That Huntingdonshire was held by Siward is shown by a writ (Cod. Dipl. iv. 239) coming between 1053 and 1055. It is certain that it was afterwards held by Waltheof. Domesday also (208) implies the succession of Siward, Tostig, and Waltheof, by speaking of "men" and rights belonging first to Tostig and afterwards to Waltheof. It might be worth considering whether some confused tradition of these transfers of the shire formed an element in the legend of Tostig, Earl of Huntingdon, slain by Siward. See vol. i. pp. 461, 587.

Northamptonshire, like Huntingdonshire, was separated from Mercia and attached to Northumberland. This is distinctly shown by a royal writ addressed to Tostig as its Earl (Cod. Dipl. iv. 240). The only other Northamptonshire writ that I know (iv. 216) is addressed to Bishop Wulfwig without any Earl's name. to Northamptonshire, another question might arise. The singular description of the daughter of the Northumbrian Earl Ælfhelm as Ælfgifu of Northampton (see vol. i. p. 453) may possibly point to an earlier connexion between the two districts. This last is a mere guess, but the connexion between Northumberland and Northamptonshire during part of the reign of Eadward is quite certain. But Northamptonshire and Huntingdonshire were afterwards again detached from Northumberland, and held as a separate Earldom by Waltheof. On this point the evidence seems quite plain; the only question is as to the exact date. Waltheof held some Earldom at the end of the year 1066, when he is spoken of as an Earl with Eadwine and Morkere (Chron. Wig. 1066). Under William, besides his great Northumbrian government, he was certainly Earl of Northamptonshire (Ord. Vit. 522 C) and of Huntingdonshire (Will. Gem. viii. 37). We may therefore infer that these fragments of his father's government formed the Earldom which he had held under Harold. The false Ingulf (Gale, i. 66) makes him receive both these shires on his father's death in 1057, Tostig receiving Northumberland. The Chronicle of John of Peterborough, which, though not contemporary, has some authority as being a local record, distinctly makes Waltheof succeed to Northamptonshire on his father's death in 1055; "Siwardus Dux Northanhumbrorum obiit; . . . cujus filius Waldevus, postea martyr sanctus, factus est Comes Northhamptoniæ; comitatus autem Northanhumbrorum datus est Tostio fratri Haroldi" (Giles, p. 50). But this is shown to be incorrect by the charter just quoted, which shows that Tostig was Earl in Northamptonshire. And the course taken by the Northumbrian rebels in 1065 (see p. 489) seems to point to a still abiding connexion between that shire and Northumberland. We can therefore hardly doubt that both Northamptonshire and Huntingdonshire were obtained by Waltheof as a result of the Northumbrian revolt in 1065.

About Nottinghamshire I do not feel quite certain. It appears from Domesday (280) that Tostig had certain rights in the town of Nottingham; but he is not distinctly spoken of as Earl of the shire. But the connexion between this shire and the Northumbrian Primate makes a connexion with the Northumbrian Earl far from unlikely.

Hertfordshire formed part of the Earldom of Beorn. We have no further account of it till after the redistribution in 1057 (see above, pp. 418, 419), when it appears in the hands of Leofwine. Two writs (Cod. Dipl. iv. 217, 218) are addressed to him as Earl, conjointly with Wulfwig, Bishop of Dorchester—the Prelate of the Middle-Angles—whose episcopacy ranges from 1053 to 1067. In Domesday also (132) eighteen burghers in the town of Hertford are described as being "homines Heraldi Comitis et Lewini Comitis," perhaps a sign of the superiority exercised by Harold over the Earldoms of Gyrth and Leofwine. Men of Leofwine occur also in the town of Buckingham (143) and in other parts of that shire (144, 145), suggesting that Buckinghamshire also made part of his Earldom. Of Bedfordshire we seem to have no distinct account. Waltheof (Domesday, 210 b) held lands there, but it need not have been in his Earldom.

Oxfordshire PPears in 1015 (Flor. Wig. in anno) as part of the Earldom of Swegen. (See above, p. 36.) After 1057 it appears as an outlying appendage of the East-Anglian Earldom of Gyrth. Two writs for Oxfordshire are addressed to him conjointly with Bishop Wulfwig (Cod. Dipl. iv. 215, 217). The former is the well known grant of Islip to the church of Westminster.

THE

Of the other East-Mercian shires we have no account. But I am inclined to believe that they must have reverted to Leofric, perhaps on the death of Beorn. I am led to this belief by the almost certain fact that Lincolnshire did. All history and tradition connects Leofric and his house with that shire; one of the great objects of his bounty, the minster of Stow, is within its borders, and it is plain that, in 1066 (Flor. Wig. in anno), Lindsey formed part of the Earldom of his grandson Eadwine.

The shiftings of the East-Mercian shires are thus frequent and perplexing, but those of West-Mercia are equally so. That the north-western shires remained constantly under Leofric and his house there can be no reasonable doubt. Our one writ in those parts (Cod. Dipl. iv. 201) is addressed to Eadwine in Staffordshire, and the entries of property held in that shire and in Cheshire by him and his father are endless. The same may be said of Shropshire, but as soon as we get south of that limit, we are at once in the region of fluctuations. We have seen that Ranig was Earl of the Magessetas or of Herefordshire in 1041. It is impossible to say whether his government extended beyond that One can hardly doubt that Ranig was succeeded by Swegen, whose Mercian possessions (Flor. Wig. 1051) consisted of the shires of Hereford, Gloucester, and Oxford. It is therefore not unlikely that Ranig's government was of the same extent, but we cannot be certain. But it is quite certain that Herefordshire was detached from the government of Leofric and his successors during the whole reign of Eadward. It is not clear what became of the shire during Swegen's first banishment. Something belonging to Swegen, either his Earldom or his private estate, was (see pp. 89, 101) divided during his absence between Harold and It is therefore quite possible that one or other of them may have governed Herefordshire from 1046 to 1050. But it is equally possible that the shire was, during that interval, held by Ralph of Mantes, Ralph the Timid, the son of Walter and Godgifu.

Indeed this last view becomes the more likely of the two, when we remember the firm root which the Normans had taken in Herefordshire before 1051 (see p. 138), which looks very much as if they had been specially favoured in these parts. That Ralph succeeded Swegen on his final banishment in 1051 I have no doubt , at all. Sir Francis Palgrave (English Commonwealth, ii. ccxc.) calls this fact in question on the grounds that, at the time when William of Malmesbury (ii. 199) calls him "Comes Herefordensis," Herefordshire was under the government of Swegen, and that, when Florence (1055) speaks of his doings in the Herefordshire campaign, he does not formally describe him as Earl of the shire. But surely, when a certain shire is invaded, and a certain Earl goes forth to defend it, the presumption, in the absence of some distinct evidence the other way, is that the Earl who so acts is the Earl in charge of the shire. The passage of William of Malmesbury is simply one of his usual confusions of chronology. Speaking of Eustace of Boulogne and his visit to England in 1051, he mentions his marriage with Godgifu, and goes on thus, "quæ ex altero viro, Waltero Medantino, filium tulerat Radulfum, qui eo tempore erat Comes Herefordensis, ignavus et timidus, qui Walensibus pugna cesserit, comitatumque suum, et urbem cum episcopo, ignibus eorum consumendum reliquerit; cujus rei infamiam maturè veniens Haroldus virtutibus suis abstersit. Eustachius ergo . . Regem adiit." Undoubtedly, according to strict grammatical construction, "eo tempore" ought to mean in 1051, but William so jumbles together the events of 1051 and of 1055 that it is hardly safe to argue from this expression that he meant distinctly to assert that Ralph was Earl of Herefordshire in 1051. He may just as well have meant that he was so when he waged his unfortunate campaign with the Welsh, and certainly no one who got up his facts from William of Malmesbury only would ever find out that that campaign happened four years after the visit of Eustace.

Ralph then, I hold, was certainly Earl of Herefordshire in 1055, and the natural inference is that he succeeded Swegen in 1051, and that, as Swegen never came back, he was allowed to retain his Earldom in 1052. That Ralph was succeeded by Harold in 1057 there can be no doubt. But Harold's Herefordshire Earldom is so important as a piece of national policy, and it is connected with so many points in Harold's character, that I have spoken of it somewhat largely in the text. See pp. 395, 417, and, for writs addressed to Harold in Herefordshire, see p. 547.

But we have also the fact that Ralph certainly held the rank of Earl in the year 1051, while Swegen was still acting as Earl of the Magesætas (see p. 141). We have also his signatures as Earl as early as 1050 (see p. 111). Sir Francis Palgrave is therefore very possibly right in quartering him in Worcestershire. That shire, he is inclined to think, was in Cnut's time held by Hakon the doughty Earl, the first husband of Gunhild. This view he rests on a writ of Cnut's (Cod. Dipl. iv. 56) addressed to him as Earl in Worcestershire. The writ is clearly spurious, but it is perhaps one of those cases in which a spurious document proves something. Would a forger insert a name so little known as that of Hakon in a spurious writ, unless he had seen it in a genuine writ? Again, it is rather remarkable that in two Worcestershire documents (see a deed of Bishop Ealdred, Cod. Dipl. iv. 137, evidently passed in a Worcestershire Scirgemot, and another, iv. 262) there is mention of Danish Thegns ("ealla & yldestan begnas on Wigeraceastrescire, Denisce and Englisce") as a distinct class in Worcestershire. This is what we should hardly have looked for so far west, and it may possibly be taken in connexion with the complaints about Danish spoilers of the Church of Worcester, which we have seen in pp. 544, 560. This prevalence of Danes in the shire looks of itself like the effect of the administration of a Danish Earl, and we find also what seems to be a distinct mention of a Hakon as holding a prominent position in the shire. In a document of Bishop Æthelstan of Hereford in Cod. Dipl. iv. 234 we find, joined together in a transaction of the time of Cnut, "Leofwine Ealdorman and Hacc.. and Leofric, and eal seo scir." In Mr. Thorpe's Diplomatarium, p. 376, the name is supplied in full, "Hacun," which one might almost have ventured to do without manuscript authority. Hakon is thus placed between Ealdorman Leofwine and his son and successor Leofric. This looks very much as if Hakon were a subordinate Earl of Worcestershire under Leofwine as superior Earl of the Mercians. If so, he may, or may not, have been removed from Worcestershire to the greater government of the East Angles. But, if we admit Hakon, we still have no means of bridging over the interval between his death in 1030 and Ralph's appearance in 1041. Ralph, I suspect, when he received Herefordshire, gave up Worcestershire to Odda. Of this Earl I must say a little more, and he forms a natural means of transition from Mercia to Wessex.

The West-Saxon Earldom, during the administration of Godwine and Harold, seems, except during the year of banishment, to have suffered no dismemberment beyond the surrender of certain shires to be held by the sons or brothers of its two Earls, doubtless under Thus Swegen, during the superiority of the head of the family. his father's life-time, held, besides his three Mercian shires, the government of Somersetshire and Berkshire (Flor. Wig. 1051).
On the fell of Godwine Wasser On the fall of Godwine, Wessex was for a momment dismembered (see p. 160). As we hear of no Earl of the West-Saxons being appointed, the eastern shires, Berkshire included, probably reverted to the Crown But Somersetshire western shires to form a new cover western shires to form a new government under the King's kinsman Odda ("Odo et Radulfus Comites et Regis cognati," says He had already some con-William of Malmesbury, ii. 199). nexion with that part of England, as he signs (Cod. Dipl. vi. 196)
a charter of Bishop Ælfwold of Share in a charter of Bishop Ælfwold of Sherborne relating to matters in Dorsetshire and Devonshire which Dorsetshire and Devonshire, which,

Lyfing, must be older than 1046.

From the mention of Bishop Lyfing, must be older than 1046. He was now set as Earl over the whole of the ancient Wealhour or an amount of the older than 1046. whole of the ancient Wealheyn, or as the Peterborough Chronicler (1048) puts it. "ofer Defenseire and ofer (1048) puts it, "ofer Defenascire and ofer Peterboroseton and ofer Dorseton and ofer Weslas." The Walsh of Dorseton and ofer Wealas." The Welsh of Cornwall. (There is something sinon) are of course the Welsh of Cornwall. (There is something singular in the territorial form being applied to Devonshire and the tribe. applied to Devonshire and the tribe form to the Sumorsætas, but the same distinction is made by the the same distinction is made by the Worcester Chronicler in the next year.) Dr. Lappenberg (510) suggested to have been next year.) Dr. Lappenberg (510) suspects this

An "Odo

An" Odo a Frenchman. I see no reason for this this sur mise. An "Odo Comes" is certainly mentioned in the this sur many established Comes" is certainly mentioned in the list of Normans established in England in Eadward's time given list of Normans established in England in Eadward's time given in Duchès p. 1023, 8 list clearly made up of bits from Florence Duchès bare. But he is clearly made up of bits from Florence Duchès here. But he is said to have been "ante Edwardi tennad elso railium ejectus." said to have been "ante Edwardi tempora in exsilium ejectus." Henry of Huntingdon too (M. H. B. 761 E) special with Archbial E) special But these are Consul" as banished along with Archbishop E) specific But these are no great authorities. A banishment of Open Robert out of the no great authorities. A banishment of Odda see quite out of the question, and there is not a word in the see fo imply that question, and there is not a word in the Chronic less to imply that he was a foreigner. Foreigners are companied to the chronic less to imply that he was a foreigner. Foreigners are commonly specified ken of as such, and a foreign descent is certainly not in only specified Odda's kindred and a foreign descent is certainly not implied in

He may have sprung from some of the more with the King. distant branches of the royal family, or he may have been connected with the King through his grandmother Ælfthryth. His name, in its various forms, Odda, Oda, Odo, Oddo, Otto, Eudes, and the like, is one of the few names which are common to England, Germany, and France. But, in the shape of Odda, it is thoroughly English, and it appears in English local nomenclature in such names as Oddington. Odda had also a brother and sister, who bore the distinctively English names of Ælfric (Cod. Dipl. iv. 137, 262. Chron. Wig. 1053) and Eadgyth ("Eddied soror Odonis Comitis," in Domesday 186). He himself also, after his monastic profession, bore the no less truly English name of Æthelwine (Flor. Wig. 1056. A signature of "Odda monachus" in Cod. Dipl. iv. 132 cannot be his, by the date). His signatures as Earl are rare; there is one in Cod. Dipl. iv. 139. But both Odda and Ælfric often sign charters as "minister" and "nobilis," sometimes, as in one of 1048 (Cod. Dipl. iv. 116, so also vi. 196), in company with one Dodda, whom one suspects to be a kinsman. Odda of course resigned his West-Saxon government on the return of Godwine, and both Somersetshire and Berkshire henceforth remained in the immediate possession of the Earl of the West-Saxons. (See writs to Harold in Somersetshire, Cod. Dipl. iv. 195 et seqq., in Berkshire, iv. 200, in Dorsetshire, iv. 200.) But Odda continues to be spoken of as Earl (Chronn. Ab. and Wig. 1056); and his connexion with the Hwiccian land and its monasteries points to Worcestershire, or possibly Worcestershire and Gloucestershire, as the district under his charge. Three of the documents just quoted as bearing his signatures are the deeds of Bishop Ealdred concerning lands in Worcestershire of which I have already spoken (Cod. Dipl. iv. 137, 138, 262, see above, p. 562). The signatures to be noted are "Leofr Eorl and Odda Eorl and Ælfric his brodor," "Leofricus Dux, Ælfgarus Dux, Odda Dux," "Leofric Eorl and Odda and Ælfric his brofor." There is also a signature of Azor or Atsor, a well known Hwiccian Thegn (see above, p. 545). The special mention of Danish Thegns in Worcestershire I have already spoken of (p. 561). It is therefore most probable that Odda held the Earldom of the Hwiccas from the return of Godwine till the time when he forsook the world. It must then have reverted to the House of Leofric, as in Domesday (172) we find the city of Worcester making payments to Eadwine as Earl.

In the East of England the ancient boundaries both of Wessex and of East-Anglia were freely tampered with when the younger sons of Godwine had to be provided with Earldoms. There can be no doubt that the Earldom of East-Anglia was conferred on Gyrth, when Ælfgar was translated to Mercia in 1057. The only question is whether he had not received some smaller government at an earlier time. Gyrth appears as "Eorl" in the Chronicles and as "Comes" in Domesday (Suffolk, 283 et al.). In one Suffolk entry (290) it is distinctly said that "Comes Guert tertiam partem That his Earldom took in Oxfordshire as an outlying habebat." possession we have already seen; his possession of the two strictly East-Anglian shires is shown by a variety of writs. In Cod. Dipl. iv. 208 he is addressed for Norfolk and Suffolk, in iv. 222 for Suffolk only, in iv. 223 and 225 for East-Anglia generally, in iv. 221 for Suffolk only, conjointly with Harold. In all these writs he is joined with Æthelmær, Bishop of the East-Angles from 1047 to 1070. date of his appointment seems certain, as no earlier date is possible, and there is no reason to suspect one at all later. But the words in which the Biographer of Eadward describes Gyrth's elevation are not very clear. After speaking of the appointments of Harold and Tostig, he adds (Vita Eadw. p. 410), "Juniorem quoque Gyrth, quem supra diximus, immunem non passus est idem Rex à suis honoribus, sed comitatum ei dedit in ipso vertice Orientalis Angliæ, et hunc ipsum amplificandum promisit, ubi maturior annos adolescentise exuerit." This may mean that Gyrth was first invested with the government of some part of East-Anglia, perhaps under the superiority of Ælfgar, and was encouraged to look forward to the possession of the whole. Or it may mean that, when invested with the government of all East-Anglia, he was encouraged to look forward to something beyond its bounds, a promise of which the addition of Oxfordshire may have been the fulfilment. This last view is incidentally confirmed in a singular manner by the way in which the town of Oxford is spoken of in Domesday (154). The duties payable to the Earl are described as paid to Ælfgar. Here of course, as in several other cases, the record describes a state of things existing "in the time of King Eadward," but not "on the day when King Eadward was quick and dead." A mention of Eadwine would have excluded Gyrth; a mention of Ælfgar does not exclude him. But it shows that Oxfordshire was at one time held by Ælfgar; it shows therefore that Gyrth did not receive Oxfordshire at the same time as Norfolk and Suffolk. may have been taken from Ælfgar at his second outlawry, or it may have been conferred on Gyrth after Ælfgar's death. But at all events, Gyrth became Earl of the East-Angles in 1057, only with a narrower jurisdiction than had been attached to that title when it was held by Harold, probably narrower than when it was held by Ælfgar. Harold had, together with the two strictly East-Anglian shires, held Huntingdonshire, Cambridgeshire, and Essex, probably including Middlesex. None of these, except perhaps Cambridgeshire, fell to the lot of Gyrth. He seemingly took the remote Oxfordshire in their stead. Of Huntingdonshire I have already spoken. The shires of Essex and Middlesex, together with that of Hertford, and probably Buckinghamshire (see above, p. 560), fell to the lot of Leofwine. Of Bedfordshire I cannot speak with any certainty.

We have no record of Leofwine's appointment as Earl, but one can hardly doubt that his investment with the large and important government which the writs set him before us as holding took place at the general distribution in 1057. But, as in the case of Gyrth, a question arises whether he had held a smaller government at an earlier time. There is a writ in Cod. Dipl. (iv. 191) addressed to Leofwine in Kent conjointly with Archbishop Eadsige, who died in 1050, and with Godwine, Bishop of Rochester, who died in 1046. If this document be genuine, it reveals the very curious fact that the young son of Godwine, while still hardly beyond boyhood, held, under his father's immediate eye, the government of the shire which had been his father's first possession. If this be so, it may decide us as to the interpretation of the doubtful passage of the Biographer about Gyrth, and we shall have to look for some similar earlier endowment for Tostig. But, on the other hand, the Chroniclers, in recording the events of the years 1049-1052, while they carefully give the title of Earl to Godwine, Swegen, Harold, and Beorn, never give it to Tostig, Gyrth, or Leofwine. "Harold Eorl and Tostig his brodor," says the Peterborough Chronicler (1046). Leofwine's early promotion is therefore very doubtful; but of the extent of his later government there is no doubt. It took in the shires of Essex, Middlesex, Hertford, Surrey, Kent, and probably Buckinghamshire. Writs are addressed to him for Surrey, jointly with Stigand

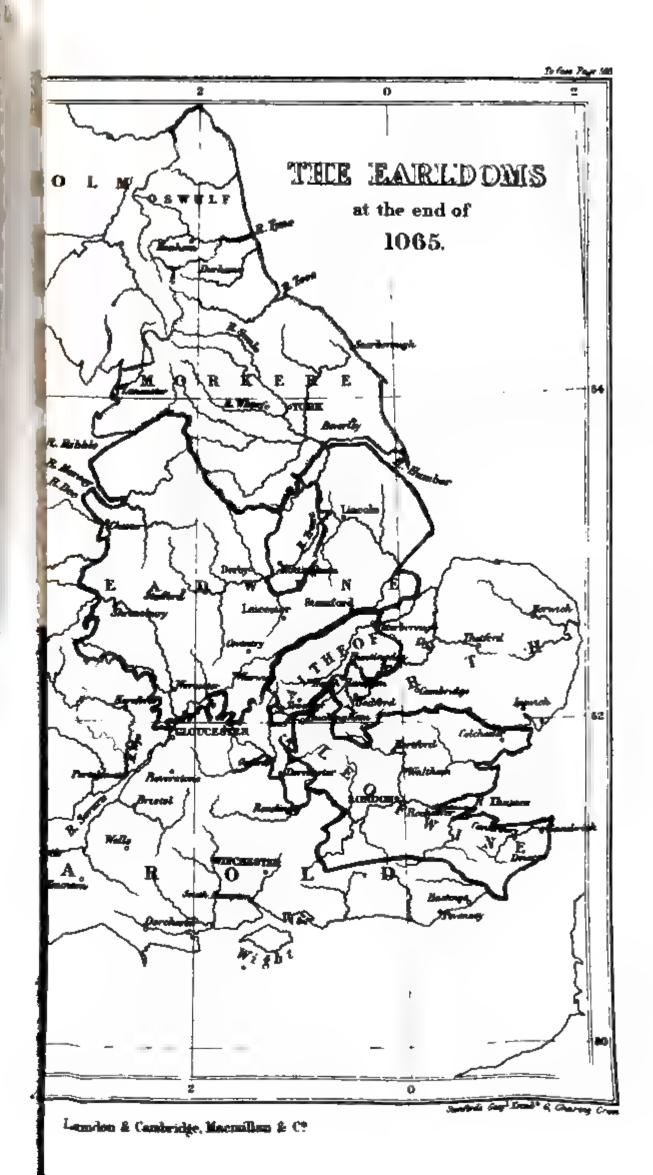

(Cod. Dipl. iv. 205), for Essex (as he is coupled with Bishe William, iv. 213), for Middlesex jointly with William (iv. 21. for Hertfordshire, as we have seen, jointly with Wulfwig. "Men of Earl Leofwine in Middlesex are also mentioned in Dome day, 130 b. But the general superiority of Harold, whether elder brother or as elected Ætheling, seems shown by a writ a dressed to him in Middlesex, jointly with Bishop William (iv. 212 It can hardly belong to the time between September 1052 and Easter 1053, between which dates it is just possible, and no most that there may have been some moment at which Harold was E4 of the East-Angles and William also was in possession of the se of London (see pp 345, 358). The Earldon of Leofwine thu answered pretty well to what Londoners sometimes speak of the Home Counties. But the great city itself was not subject to the jurisdiction of any Earl. The King's writs for London are addressed to the Bishop, the Portreeve or Portreeves, the Burgh-thegas, and sometimes the whole people ("ealle &e burhware"). See Cod. Dipl. iv. 212, 213, 214.

I have thus tried, as well as I could, to trace out these singular fluctuations in the boundaries of the great Earldoms. To make matters clear, I have endeavoured to represent them by a comparative map of England at two stages of the reign of Eadward. The idea of such an attempt was suggested by the map given by Sir Francis Palgrave in his History of the Anglo-Saxons, p. 327. Some points of course are conjectural, and I have not been able to express the various fluctuations which happened at dates between the two years which I have chosen for illustration. But I trust that the two maps between them fairly represent the state of things in the earlier and in the later days of Eadward.

NOTE H. p. 62.

THE LEGEND OF EMMA.

As the name of Godgifu is most familiar to the world in general through the legend of her riding naked through Coventry (besides the references in p. 48, see R. Wendover, i. 496), so the name of Emma is best known through the legend of her walking unhurt over the hot ploughshares. The tale appears to have grown out of the real history of her disgrace at this time, mixed up with other particulars from various quarters. And when a prince stands in such singular relations both to his mother and to his wife as those in which Eadward stood to Emma and Eadgyth, it is not wonderful that, in the process of legend-making, the two injured Ladies got confounded.

	•	•	•		•
				•

The tale may be seen in Bromton, X Scriptt. 941. He seems to place the event in 1050, when Robert was already Archbishop of Canterbury. He calls it indeed the fourth year of Eadward, but he places it immediately before the events of 1051. The Norman Primate persuades the King that Emma-forty-eight years after her first marriage, fifteen years after the death of her second husband—had been guilty of too close an intimacy ("nimia familiaritas") with Ælfwine, Bishop of Winchester. The choice of an episcopal lover was unlucky, as Ælfwine had already been dead three years (see p. 94); a more ingenious romancer would have named Stigand. The Bishop is imprisoned; the Lady is spoiled of her goods and sent to Wherwell, a manifest confusion with Eadgyth's banishment thither in 1051. From her prison, where she was not very strictly kept ("laxiùs custodita"), Emma writes to those Bishops in whom she trusted, saying that she is far more shocked at the scandal against Ælfwine than at that against herself. She is even ready to submit to the ordeal of burning iron in order to prove the Bishop's innocence. The other Bishops advise the King to allow the trial, but the Norman Archbishop uses very strong language indeed. Emma is "fera illa, non fœmina;" her daring went so far that "amasium suum lubricum Christum Domini nominavit," and so forth. She may make compurgation for the Bishop ("vult purgare pontificem"), but who will make compurgation for herself? She is still charged with complicity in the death of Ælfred, and with having made ready a poisoned bowl for Eadward himself. Yet, if she will make a double purgation, if she will walk over four burning shares for herself and five for the Bishop, her innocence shall be allowed. By dint of prayer to Saint Swithhun, the ordeal is gone through The penitent King implores pardon, and receives successfully. stripes ("disciplinas recepit") both from his mother and from the Bishop; he restores their confiscated goods; and Robert, if not actually banished, finds it convenient to leave England. In honour of the deliverance of the Lady and the Bishop, each gives nine manors, one for each ploughshare, to the Church of Winchester.

The account in the Winchester Annals (p. 21 et seqq. Luard) is substantially the same, and it sometimes agrees in words with Unless Bromton has simply abridged the that in Bromton. Winchester story, both are borrowed from the same source. the Winchester annalist is very much fuller, and, after his manner, he puts long speeches into the mouths of his actors, that made by the Norman Archbishop displaying a remarkable acquaintance with the less decent parts of the satires of Juvenal. important difference is the introduction of Godwine. The event is placed in 1043. Archbishop Robert—he is already Archbishop —persuades the King to banish Godwine and his sons, to send his mother to Wherwell, and to forbid Ælfwine to come out of the city of Winchester. The tale then follows much as before, only, together with the restoration of Emma and flight of Robert, Godwine and his sons are restored at the petition of Emma. Also, it was after these doings that Eadward seems to have first taken to working miracles ("Rex Edwardus magnis post hæc cœpit coruscare miraculis etiam in vitâ suâ").

I suspect that this is the older version. This is the Winchester writer's only mention of the banishment and return of Godwine. Bromton, or whoever is represented by that name, knew that Godwine's banishment happened at quite another time and from quite other causes; he knew also that Robert was not Archbishop in 1043. He therefore left out all about Godwine, and moved the tale to the year 1050, when Robert was Archbishop. But he failed to mark that he thus brought in a chronological error as to the death of Ælfwine. On this last point the local Winchester writer is of course accurate.

I cannot help adding good Bishop Godwin's inimitable account of the charges brought by Robert against Emma. "He began therefore to beate into the king's head (that was a milde and soft natured gentleman) how hard a hand his mother had held upon him when he lived in Normandy; how likely it was that his brother came to his death by the practise of her and Earle Godwyn; and lastly that she used the company of Alwyn Bishop of Winchester, somewhat more familiarly then an honest woman needed."

I may add that M. de Bonnechose ("ut erat miræ simplicitatis et innocentiæ," as the Winchester writer says of Eadward) believes everything. All about Godgifu, all about Emma, the "cruelle épreuve" and the "tragique scène," will be found in his Quatre Conquêtes, ii. 81-88. In short, his history gives us, as Sir Roger de Coverley says, "fine, reading in the casualties of this reign." Mr. St. John exercises a sound judgement, and Thierry seems to hold his peace.

NOTE I. p. 110.

THE WELSH CAMPAIGN OF 1049.

THE whole account of this campaign is full of difficulties. mentioned by the Worcester Chronicler only, whose narrative is There are also some entries in somewhat expanded by Florence. the Welsh Chronicles which seem to refer to the same event, but the readings of the manuscripts are so different that it is hard to tell their exact meaning. The Worcester writer mentions the coming of thirty-six ships from Ireland to the Usk; there, with Gruffydd's help, they do much harm; then Bishop Ealdred gathers a force against them, but he is defeated, and many of his men slain, by a sudden attack in the early morning. Florence is more detailed. First, he explains that the Gruffydd spoken of is Gruffydd of South Wales, Gruffydd the son of Rhydderch ("adjutorio Griffini Regis Australium Brytonum"). This is very likely; the last time we had to do with Welsh affairs, the Northern Gruffydd was leagued with England against his Southern namesake (see p. 87). But a difficulty immediately follows. The pirates, with Gruffydd's good will, begin plundering by sea, seemingly on the coast of Gwent. words are "circa loca illa"—this immediately follows the mention of the Welsh Axe or Usk—"prædam agentes." This may mean the Somersetshire coast just opposite, but it would more naturally mean the coast by the mouth of the Usk. But Gruffydd ap Rhydderch would hardly consent to the harrying of his own dominions; so we are led to suspect that Gwent must have passed into the hands of Gruffydd ap Llywelyn, perhaps as a result of the campaign waged by him in concert with Swegen. Or is it possible that Gwent had already, for a time at least, passed into English hands? We should certainly infer as much from the language of the Chronicler, who seems to make Ealdred gather his force to defend the country at the mouth of the Usk. But it is more likely that this is only a confused way of telling the story, for Florence tells us very clearly that the invaders crossed the Wye and harried some district, which must therefore have been part of Gloucestershire. "Dein, conjunctis viribus, Rex [Griffinus] et ipsi [Hibernienses piratæ] flumen quod Weage nominatur transeuntes Dymedham incenderunt, et omnes quos ibi reperiebant peremerunt." But what is Dymedham? One would expect to find it the name of a town in Gloucestershire, but I know of no such place. It almost looks as if Florence had got hold of some Welsh account, and had been led astray by some such word as Dyfed or Deheubarth. Anyhow one may accept the fact that they crossed the Wye, and so entered the Hwiccian diocese. It is then that Ealdred brings his force against them. In the Chronicle that force is simply called "folc," without further description; it is Florence who tells us that it consisted of small bodies from Gloucestershire and Herefordshire ("pauci de provincialibus Glawornensibus et Herefordensibus"), together with that body of Welshmen to whose treachery he attributes the defeat of the English.

The mention of these Welshmen in the English army raises some further questions. Were they mere mercenaries hired for the occasion, subjects possibly of the Northern Gruffydd, or were they men of Welsh blood and speech living under the immediate sovereignty of the King of the English? It can hardly be doubted that much Welsh blood must have lingered among the inhabitants of Herefordshire and Western Gloucestershire, just as it lingered among the inhabitants of Somersetshire and Devonshire. A small part of modern Gloucestershire, and a larger part of modern Herefordshire, consists of the districts added to those shires at the dissolution of the Welsh Marches. This part of Herefordshire was, till quite recent ecclesiastical changes, included in the Diocese of Saint But it would seem that, as late as the seventeenth century, Welsh must have been spoken in Herefordshire beyond these limits, as the Act of Uniformity joins the Bishop of Hereford with the Welsh Bishops in the duty of providing a Welsh translation of the Prayer-Book. We can therefore well believe that, in the days of Eadward, considerable remains both of Welsh blood and of the Welsh language must have remained in large districts of the Magesætas and even of the Hwiccas. Still the picture given us in Domesday of the Herefordshire borderers (see above, p. 388), though in no way decisive of their ethnology, sets them before us as a race eminently loyal to the English Crown. It is therefore more likely that these traitorous Welshmen were mere hirelings, and an expression of Florence seems to look the same way. calls them "Walenses quos secum habuerant [provinciales Glawornenses et Herefordenses], eisque fidelitatem promiserant." This certainly looks as if they were not immediate English subjects, but strangers who would serve only on receiving some sort of pledge of good faith from their English comrades. Such at least is the only meaning which I can get out of the text, and there seems to be no question as to the reading. Otherwise I should be strongly tempted to read, "quique eis fidelitatem promiserant," so as to make the "fidelitas" a pledge given by the Welshmen. In any case the "fidelitas" seems to be given or received by the army as a body, not by the Bishop or any other commander. We seem here to have a military Scirgemót, just as we elsewhere have military Gemóts of the whole Kingdom.

One can hardly doubt that this fleet from Ireland is the same as that of which the Welsh Chroniclers speak under the year 1050. But they say nothing of the alliance between Gruffydd and the pirates, and they seem rather to speak of the fleet as one which came to attack Wales. The variations in the manuscripts are remarkable. The text of the Brut y Tywysogion calls it a fleet which "failed coming from Ireland to South Wales" ("balla6d llyges o Iwerdon yn dyfot y Deheubarth." I quote the original, though ignorant of the Welsh language, as Welsh scholars may be able to judge of the translation). But another reading is "a fleet from Ireland endangered South Wales" ("y periglawd llynghes o Iwerdon Dehavbarth"). The text of the Annales Cambrize has "Classis Hibernize in dextrali parte periit," but another manuscript reads "Classis Hibernise in dextrali parte Cambrise prædavit." It is quite possible that the Danes may have begun with plundering, and may have afterwards been won over by Gruffydd to join him against the English.

The most perplexing thing, after all, about this campaign, is its ending, or rather its lack of an ending. What happened after the escape of Ealdred?

NOTE K. p. 124.

DANEGELD AND HEREGELD.

IT can hardly be doubted that the original meaning of the word Denagyld must have been money paid to the Danes to buy them off, a practice of which I need not multiply instances during the reign of Æthelred. But it so happens that the word itself does not occur till much later times. As far as I know, the single appearance of the word in Domesday (336 b) is the earliest instance. It occurs also in the so-called Laws of Eadward, c. 11 (Schmid; 496), in the Laws of Henry the First, first in the Charter of London (Schmid, 434) and afterwards in c. 15 (Schmid, 446). There are also well known passages in Bromton (942, 957) and the Dialogus de Scaccario, (ap. Madox, Exchequer, p. 27). In all these passages, (except perhaps in that of Bromton, who calls it "tallagium datum Danis,") the Danegeld is described as a tax levied, not to buy off Danes, but to hire mercenaries, whether Danes or others, to resist them. Thus in the "Laws of Eadward" the description given is as follows;

"Denegeldi redditio propter piratas primitùs statuta est. Patriam enim infestantes, vastationi ejus pro posse suo insistebant; sed ad eorum insolentiam reprimendam statutum est Denegeldum annuatim reddendum; i. e. duodecim denarios de unâque hidâ totius patriæ, ad conducendos eos, qui piratarum irruptioni resistendo obviarent."

The description in the Laws of Henry (Schmid, 446) is more remarkable, as it distinctly connects the Danegeld with the famous force established by Cnut. "Denagildum, quod aliquando pingemannis dabatur."

But it is plain, from the passage with which we are concerned in the text, and from the other passage in the Peterborough Chronicle (1040) describing the payment to Harthacnut's fleet in 1041, that the formal name for a tax levied for the payment of soldiers or sailors was Heregyld, Heregeold, Heregeld. I conceive that Denagyld was a popular name of dislike, which was originally applied to the payments made to buy off the Danes, and which was thence transferred to these other payments made to Danish and other mercenary troops, from the time of Thurkill onwards. This would account for the name not occurring in any early Chronicle or document.

It is commonly assumed, with great probability but without direct proof, that the Danegeld of Domesday is the same as the "mycel gyld" recorded in the Peterborough Chronicle to have been laid on by William in the winter Gemôt of 1083-1084. This is looked on as the revival of the tax now taken off by Eadward. Yet it would be strange if no taxes at all for the support of warlike forces of any kind were levied between 1051 and 1083. The Housecarls certainly continued; we hear of them by name, besides Florence's mention of "stipendiarii et mercenarii" in 1066. Are we to infer that the Housecarls were henceforth maintained out of the ordinary royal revenues, or, what seems more likely, that the tax now remitted related wholly to the fleet?

While on the subject of Danegeld, I may mention that the Liber de Hydâ contains a document purporting to be the Will of King Eadred, which, if genuine, shows that the possibility of a payment to the Danes was contemplated even in his time. The document is given in Old-English, with a later English and a Latin translation; but it is curious enough that, in the two latter versions, the passage is left out. In the Old-English text it stands thus (p. 153);

"Dænne an he his sayla to anliesnesse, and his deodscipe to pearfe, sixtyne hund punda, to pan öæt hi mege magan hu[n]gor, and hæpenne here him fram aceapian gif hic bepurfen."

The language seems to be corrupt, but the meaning can hardly be doubted.

See also on Danegeld, Pegge's Short Account of Danegeld (London 1756) and Ellis, i. 350, 351.

NOTE L. p. 131.

THE BANISHMENT OF GODWINE.

Or the events which led to the banishment of Godwine and his sons we have three original narratives. The Worcester and Peterborough Chronicles give accounts which at first sight seem to be widely different, and the Life of Eadward contains another account which seems to be still more widely different from either of the others. The narrative in Florence is mainly founded on that in the Worcester Chronicle, while William of Malmesbury, as in many other cases, plainly had the Peterborough Chronicle before him. These Latin writers serve in some cases to explain and illustrate their English originals, while in other places they have curiously mistaken their meaning. When, fifteen years back, I wrote my papers on the Life and Death of Godwine in the Archæological Journal (vol. xii. p. 48), I thought that there was a wide difference between the accounts of the two Chroniclers, and that a choice had to be made between them. I now think that there is little or no discrepancy as to the facts. The main difference is that in the Worcester narrative there are many omissions, which are supplied by the Peterborough writer. There is also, as usual, a marked difference in tone. The Peterborough writer is here, as ever, a devoted partizan of Godwine, and he carefully brings into prominence every circumstance which can tell in his favour. The Worcester writer, without showing the least feeling against the Earl, is not so strongly committed to his side. The curious result is that the Normannizing William of Malmesbury, following the Peterborough version, gives a more strongly Godwinist account than our English Florence. Also, since my former papers were written, the contemporary Life of Eadward has come to light. The Biographer's account is very singular. As usual, his rhetorical way of dealing with everything, and the necessity under which he felt himself of justifying both Eadward and Godwine, hamper him a good deal in his story. also gives an account of the origin of the dispute, which is quite different from that mentioned in the Chronicles, and which yet is in no way inconsistent with it. He agrees with the Chroniclers in the main facts as to places and persons, and he adds, especially towards the end, some of those minute touches which increase one's confidence in the writer, as they seem to come from personal knowledge. The chief difference between him and the Chroniclers is the difference inevitably involved in their several positions. Chroniclers were monks, writing in their monasteries for the edification of their brethren. They might err through ignorance, they might exaggerate through party spirit; but they had no temptation to win anybody's favour by wilful omissions or perversions. The Biographer, with far better means of knowing the exact truth, laboured under all the difficulties of a courtier. He had to please one who was at once the daughter of Godwine, the widow of Eadward, the sister of Harold, and the favoured subject of William.

The two Chroniclers agree in making the outrages of Eustace at Dover the main cause of the dispute. The Peterborough writer adds, as a collateral cause, the misconduct of the Frenchmen in Herefordshire. There is here no inconsistency, but simply an omission on the part of the Worcester writer. And, after all, the Worcester writer, though he does not directly tell the Herefordshire story, yet incidentally shows his knowledge of it, both in his present narrative (see p. 142, note 5, where I have mentioned the singular mistake of Florence) and in his entry of the next year (see p. 311). The Biographer says nothing about either Eustace or Herefordshire; he speaks only of a revival of the old calumnies by Archbishop Robert. Of this last cause the Chroniclers say nothing. But there is no real inconsistency between these accounts. Nothing is more likely than that Robert would seize such an opportunity again to poison the King's mind against Godwine. But these private dealings in the royal closet would be much more likely to be known, and to seem of great importance, to a courtier and royal chaplain than to men who were watching the course of public affairs from a distance. And we must not forget that, when the Biographer wrote, Robert was dead and had no one to speak for him, while Eustace and Osbern of Herefordshire were high in William's, therefore probably in Eadgyth's, favour. It might therefore be inconvenient to enlarge too fully on their misdeeds. Biographer in short reports the intrigues of the court, while the Chroniclers record the history of the nation. I accept his account, not as an alternative, but as a supplement, to the account in the Chronicles, and I have accordingly worked in his details into my own narrative. As to the broad facts of the story, the meeting at Gloucester, the presence of the great Earls, and the adjournment to London, all our witnesses agree.

One great apparent discrepancy between the two Chroniclers at the very outset of the story, is, I am now convinced, merely apparent. As we read the tale in Florence (1051), the violent conduct of Eustace took place immediately upon his landing at Dover ("Eustatius.. paucis Doruverniam applicuit navibus; in quâ milites ejus vol. II.

. . . unum è civibus peremerunt," &c.). Now it is impomble a reject the clear and detailed story of the Peterborough wme. according to which the affair took place, not on Eustace's know but on his return from the court at Gloucester. It now seems a me that there is here simply an omission on the part of the Wacester writer, and that Florence was misled by his expression, 's ham ylean geare com Eustatius up set Doferan," &c. Taken ales. this would certainly give one the idea which it seems to have give Florence, but, with the fuller light of the Peterborough narrative we may fairly take it the other way. If this explanation be as accepted, there can be no doubt that the Peterborough story is the one to be followed. But it must be remembered that, if any me chooses to accept Florence's story, the case of Godwine and is clients is thereby made still stronger. As Florence tells the take the men of Dover were not simply resisting an act of violence des within the Kingdom; they were resisting what would seem to that to be an actual foreign invasion.

In the narrative of the events in Gloucestershire each of the Chronicles fills up gaps in the other. The Worcester writer leaves out Eadward's command, and Godwine's refusal, to subjet Dover to military chastisement. On this point the Peterborough writer is naturally emphatic, and this part of the story seems to have awakened a deep sympathy in his copyist William of Malmebury. Worcester also leaves out the King's summons to the Witan, so that Godwine seems to levy his forces at once, as soon as he hears of the behaviour of Eustace. A quite different colour is thus given to the story, but it is merely by omission, not by contradiction. On the other hand Peterborough leaves out, what we cannot doubt to be authentic, Godwine's demand for the surrender of Eustace and the other Frenchmen, and his threat of war in case of refusal. In fact the Worcester writer seems to dwell as much as he can on the warlike, and the Peterborough writer on the peaceful, side of the story. But the particular facts on which each insists are in no way contradictory, and I accept both. The Biographer confirms the Peterborough statement of a summons to the Witan, only he leaves out all the warlike part, and tells us of Godwine's offer to renew his compurgation. This last fact is not mentioned by either Chronicler, but it does not contradict either of them. The mediation on both sides is mentioned in both Chronicles; the personal intervention of Leofric comes from Florence, but it is eminently in character. I was puzzled fourteen years back at finding what appeared in one account as an Assembly of the Witan, described in the other as a gathering of armies. I did not then realize so well as I do now that in those days an army and a Witenagemót were very nearly the same thing.

In the account of the adjourned Gemôt in London, or perhaps rather under its walls, there are a good many difficulties, but no distinct contradictions. The Peterborough narrative is still the fuller of the two, and that which seemingly pays more regard to the strict order of events. The Biographer tells the story from his own special point of view, and helps us to several valuable personal notices of Stigand, Robert, and Godwine himself. great object is to represent Godwine, no doubt with a good deal of exaggeration, as a model of submissive loyalty towards Eadward. It is too much when he tells us (p. 402), how the Earl "legationes mittens petiit ne præjudicium innocentiæ suæ inferretur à Rege, agebatque se in omnibus modis paratum ad satisfaciendum Regi, et cum jure et ultra jus, ad nutum voluntatis suæ." On one small point we find a good instance of the way in which one authority fills up gaps in another. The Worcester Chronicle tells us that, when the Gemót was summoned to London, Godwine went to Southwark. Why to Southwark? It is easy to answer that it was a convenient spot, as being at once in his own Earldom and yet close to the place appointed for holding the Gemót (on Southwark and its relation to Godwine as Earl, see Domesday, 32). But the Biographer helps us to a still closer connexion between Godwine and Southwark (p. 402); "Dux quoque insons et fidens de propriâ conscientia semper immuni à tanto scelere, è diverso adveniens cum suis, assederat extra civitatis ejusdem flumen Temesin, loco mansionis propriæ." So it is from the Peterborough and Worcester Chronicles put together that we see that Eadward summoned forces of two kinds, both fyrd and here (see p. 147), to his help at the London Gemot. The Worcester Chronicler says, "And man bead be folce bider ut ofer ealne bisne nor ende, on Siwardes eorldome and on Leofrices and eac elles gehvær." Here is the fyrd of the Northern Earldoms and something else. The last words, not being very clear, are slurred over in the version of Florence; "Rex vero de tota Mercia et Northhymbria copiosiorem exercitum congregavit et secum Lundonium duxit."

But Peterborough tells us more; "And het se cyning bannan út here, ægter ge be sutan Temese ge be nortan eall pa æfre betst was." The fyrd of the North came, and the King's comitatus, the "best men," were also summoned, in virtue of their personal obligations, even within Godwine's Earldom. But the fyrd of Wessex was, at first at least, on the side of its own Earl; for the Worcester writer says that Godwine came to Southwark "and micel mænegeo mid heom of Westsæxum." He also directly after calls the King's force here; Godwine and his force come to meet the King "and pone here be him mid wæs."

The main difficulty in this part of the story arises from an expression of each Chronicler about the surrender to the King of certain Thegas who were in the hands of Godwine or Harold. The first stage of the discussion in the Worcester Chronicle stands thus, "And man borh fæste þam kyninge ealle þa þegnas þe wæron Haroldes Eorles his [Godwine's] suna." In the Peterborough account, Godwine first demands hostages and a safe-conduct; then follows, "Da gyrnde se cyng ealra þæra þegna þe þa eorlas ær hæfdon, and hi letan hi ealle him to hande." Then the King again summons Godwine to come with twelve companions only, and Godwine again demands hostages and a safe-conduct. One would think that the transactions spoken of in two Chronicles must be the same; but, if so, the Worcester writer must have placed the demand for these Thegas out of its proper order, as he makes it come before the renewed outlawry of Swegen, which it clearly followed. who were these Thegas? I once thought, with Mr. Kemble (Saxons in England, ii. 231), that they were the hostages who had been given to Godwine at the Gloucester Gemót. This would give an excellent meaning. Godwine has already received hostages, as leader of one of the two great parties who are recognized as equally in the King's favour. He now demands further hostages for his own personal safety. The King, instead of granting them, demands the restoration of the former hostages. But, had this been the meaning, they could hardly fail to have been spoken of by the regular name gislas. Who then were the Thegns spoken of? I can hardly fancy that Godwine and Harold surrendered all their own personal Thegas, the members of their own comitatus. This seems to have been the notion of William of Malmesbury, though his account is very confused. The Earls are bidden "ut duodecim solum homines adducerent; servitium militum, quos per Angliam habebant, Regi contraderent." (So Lappenberg, p. 509 of the German original, Thorpe, ii. 249.) But surely such a surrender is improbable in itself, and it is hardly consistent with the licence to bring twelve companions, which implies that, after the surrender, they had still some comitatus left. I am therefore driven to suppose that some of the King's Thegns within the Earldoms of Godwine and Harold had, notwithstanding the King's summons, followed the Earls, that these Thegns were now called on to join the King, and that the Earls put no hindrance in their way.

It is curious, after reading William of Malmesbury's account of all these matters, grounded on the patriotic Peterborough Chronicle, to turn to the passage quoted in a former note (p. 543) where he speaks of Godwine and his sons as banished on account of their sacrilege and other wickedness.

NOTE M. p. 174.

THE SURNAMES OF WILLIAM.

It has been pointed out by more writers than one that a certain amount of confusion is involved in the familiar description of the great King-Duke as William the Conqueror. He is not often called "Conquestor" by writers of or near his own time. Moreover, "Conquestor" hardly means "Conqueror" in the common use of that word, but rather "Acquirer," or "Purchaser," in the wider legal sense of the word "purchase." A former colleague of mine in the Oxford Schools always made a point of describing him as "William the Purchaser." But the title of William the Conqueror, even as commonly understood, is so familiar, so true, and so convenient, that I have not the least wish to interfere with its use.

As far as I can see, he was known to his contemporaries as William the Bastard, and was, after his death, distinguished from his successor by the name of William the Great. The title of Bastard indeed stuck so close to him that some writers, who could hardly have known what it meant, seem almost to have taken it for his real name. Even Adam of Bremen, who certainly knew its meaning, uses it almost as a proper name. He introduces William

(iii. 51) as "Willehelmus, cui pro obliquo sanguine cognomen est Bastardus," and goes on to speak of "Bastardus victor," and (c. 53) to say how "inter Suein et Bastardum perpetua contentio de Anglia fuit." So Marianus Scotus, a. 1089 (Pertz, v. 559), talks of "Wil lihelmus, qui et Bastart;" Lambert of Saint Omer (Pertz, v. 65) says, "Terra Anglorum expugnata est a Willelmo Notho Bastart;" and most curiously of all, Lambert of Herzfeld, a. 1074 (Pertz, v. 216), calls him "Willehelmus, cognomento Bostar, Rex Anglorum." In our own Worcester Chronicle, a. 1066, he appears as "Wyllelm Bastard," and in Olaf Tryggwasson's Saga (p. 263), as "Vilialmur Bastardur Rudu Jarl." So in Orderic (663 C), "Guillelmus Nothus." So in the Annales Formoselenses (Pertz, v. 36), "Willelmus Bastardus invasit regnum Anglorum." One writer (Chron. Gaufredi Vosiensis, Labbe, iii. 284) for "Bastard" uses the equivalent word "Mamzer"—"Normannorum Ducis filius Mamzer Guillelmus."

It has been often said that William himself used the description in formal documents. This assertion rests on very slight authority. There is a charter in Gale's Registrum Honoris de Richmond, p. 225 (a reference for which I have to thank Professor Stubbs), beginning "Ego Willielmus, cognomento Bastardus, Rex Anglise." But it seems to me to be palpably spurious, and those who accept it allow it to be unique.

The other title may be seen growing from the vaguer form of "the great William" to the more distinct "William the Great." We read in a charter of William Rufus (Rymer, i. 5), "Ego Willelmus, Dei gratiâ, Rex Anglorum, filius magni Regis Willelmi." So Eadmer (lib. iii. 57. Selden), "quando ille magnus Willielmus hanc terram primò devicit:" so William of Jumièges (vii. 16; cf. his description of Robert, vii. 1; see vol. i. p. 529), "Willelmus Dux magnus:" so the Ely History (ii. 41), "deditio Wilhelmi Regis magni." But we find more distinctly in Orderic (706 C), "Henricus Guillelmi Magni Regis Anglorum filius," and still more distinctly in William of Malmesbury (Prol. in lib. iv.), "Willelmus filius Willelmi Magni," and in Æthelred of Rievaux (X Scriptt. 393), "Vixit autem ad Willielmi Magni tempora."

The earliest instance, as far as I know, of "Conquestor" is in Orderic (603 A), who joins it with "Magnus"—"Guillelmus Magnus, id est Conquestor, Rex Anglorum." One of the foreign writers quoted above (Chron. Gaufredi Vosiensis, Labbe, iii. 293) comes still nearer to the modern idea. William Rufus is "Guillelmus filius magni Triumphatoris Guillelmi;" and elsewhere (284) he speaks of "Triumphator ille Guillelmus Mamzer."

NOTE N. p. 177.

THE BIRTH OF WILLIAM.

SEVERAL questions arise out of the narratives, historical and legendary, of the birth of the great William. No one doubts that he was the natural son of Duke Robert, or that he was born at Falaise; but there are several points open to doubt,—

1st, As to the origin of his mother;

2nd, As to the exact date of his birth;

3rd, As to the exact place of his birth;

4th, As to the number of his mother's other children.

I will discuss these questions in order.

I. I have mentioned in the text, as a curious illustration of English feeling, the story which made William's mother a descendant of the royal house of England. It will be found at length, with some curious details, in the Winchester Annals of Thomas Rudborne, Anglia Sacra, i. 247. Rudborne professes to get the story from a book called "Chronica Danorum in Anglia regnantium." As a piece of chronology and genealogy, the tale is strange enough. The tanner is called Richard, which looks rather as if he were a Frenchman, and he bears the surname of "Saburpyr," the meaning of which is far from clear. His wife is distinctly said to be a daughter of Eadmund and Ealdgyth. Now Eadmund married Ealdgyth in 1015 (see vol. i. p. 412), and he died before the end of 1016. There is therefore hardly room for the birth of a daughter besides the apparently twin (see vol. i. p. 455) Æthelings, Eadmund and Eadward. Such a daughter must have eloped with the tanner at about the same time of life as Hermes when he stole the cows, and, as the mother of the mother of William, who was born at the latest in 1028, she must have been a grandmother at the age of twelve. William must also, besides being a distant cousin of Eadward, have been also a distant nephew, a fact nowhere else alluded to. In this tale William's mother is called Helen, perhaps through some similarity of letters with Herleva.

The trade of Herleva's father seems to be agreed on at all hands. He was a burgess of Falaise and a tanner. So the Chronicle of Saint Maxentius (Labbe, ii. 202); "Robertus Willelmum genuit ex ex quæ fuit filia pelletarii burgensis." In the narrative of William of Jumièges, the bastardy of the Conqueror and the calling of his maternal grandfather dawn upon the reader by degrees. when describing Robert's nomination of William as his successor, simply calls him "Willelmum filium suum, quem unicum apud Falesiam genuerat" (vi. 12). When he speaks of the indignation of the Norman nobles at William's accession, he is driven to mention his bastardy; "Willelmus enim, ex concubina Roberti Ducis, nomine Herlevâ, Fulberti cubicularii Ducis filia, natus, nobilibus indigenis, et maximè ex Richardorum prosapia natis, despectui erat utpote nothus" (vii. 3). The later dignity of the grandfather is here put forward as a sort of forlorn hope; but when it is necessary to explain the point of the insults offered to William at Alençon, the unsavoury trade of Fulbert at last unavoidably peeps out; "Parentes matris ejus pelliciarii exstiterant" (vii. 18).

It is possible that the word "indigenis" in the second of the extracts just made may be taken to confirm the story according to which Fulbert was not only of a low occupation, but of foreign birth. Besides the English legend, which may possibly contain this small grain of truth, there is a tale in the Chronicle of Alberic "Trium Fontium" (a. 1035, Leibnitz, Accessiones, ii. 66), which is told with great glee by Sir Francis Palgrave (iii. 144). According to this version, Herbert, as he is called, was not a native of Falaise, but came with his wife Doda or Duixa from some place, either Chaumont or Huy (Hoium), in the Bishoprick of Lüttich. tale however does not represent the tanner's daughter as the original object of the fancy of Robert. The Count sees the daughter of his provost or bailiff (præpositus) at Falaise dancing, and asks for her; but the lover is made the subject of a trick, and the daughter of the tanner takes the place of the daughter of the bailiff. is food for the Comparative Mythologists, as this tale is the same as the tale of Richard and Gunnor, and as one of the legends of our own Eadgar. See vol. i. p. 279.

II. The date of William's birth has been discussed by M. Deville in the Memoires de la Société des Antiquaires de Normandie, 1837, vol. xi. p. 179, and, after him, by M. Florent Richomme, in a pamphlet published at Falaise under the title of La Naissance de Guillaume-le-Conquérant à Falaise. There is no doubt that William was born in 1027 or 1028; M. Deville endeavours to fix the exact date to June or July, 1027. William was seemingly between seven and eight when Robert set out on his pilgrimage. "Habebat tunc," says William of Malmesbury (iii. 229), "filium septennem." So Wace (14360);

"N'aveit encor que sol set anz, Petit esteit, n'ert mie granz, Quant li Dus Robert se croisa Et en Jerusalem alla."

The date of Robert's departure seems to be fixed to January, 1035, by a charter quoted by M. Deville from the Departmental Archives at Rouen. It is granted by Robert on the Ides of January, "quo et Hierusalem petiturus ibi licentiam eundi à Deo et sanctis ejus petii." But it is argued that William was full eight years old when the news of his father's death reached Normandy, and when he was accordingly invested with the Duchy. William of Jumièges (vii. 44) calls him "fere sexagenarius, anno ducatûs in Normanniâ LII," at his death in September, 1087. This puts his birth in 1027, and his accession in 1035. Orderic (459 D) says that, at his accession, "tunc octo annorum erat," and again (656 C) William is made to call himself at that time, "tenellus puer, utpote octo annorum." It is therefore inferred that William attained the full age of eight years at some time after his father's departure, but before his death, or at least before his death was known in Normandy. purpose six months or thereabouts is allowed, and it is thus ruled that William was eight years old in June or July, 1035, and was therefore born in June or July, 1027.

I am not fully convinced by these arguments. The expression of William of Jumièges, "ferè sexagenarius," would seem to imply that William was not fully sixty in September, 1087, and, if he succeeded in July, 1035, he would then be in the fifty-third and not in the fifty-second year of his reign. Orderic indeed (459 D) says that he reigned fifty-three years, but, succeeding in 1035 and dying in 1087, he certainly did not reign fifty-three years full. And Orderic's chronology is very confused on the matter; in the passage (656 C) where William calls himself eight years old at his accession, he calls himself sixty-four years old at his death ("mala que feci per Lx quatuor annos"). This would put his birth in 1023, quite contradicting Orderic's other statement. Moreover the Chronicle of Saint Michael's Mount (Labbe, i. 348) calls him "septennis" at the time of his accession. It seems to me therefore that it is not safe to attempt to fix the date of William's birth so minutely as M. Deville does, but that it certainly happened in 1027 or 1028, and more probably in 1027.

M. Deville connects the birth of William with that siege of Falaise which made Robert submit to his brother Richard (see vol. i. p. 517). This, and the death of Richard, he places in August, 1027. But William of Jumièges (vi. 2) distinctly says that Richard died in 1028, after a reign of two years (see vol. i. p. 517). Orderic (459 D), by making Richard reign a year and a half, might agree with M. Deville. Most of the Chronicles however make Richard die in 1026, the year of his accession. See the Chronicles of Fécamp (Labbe, i. 326), of Rouen (i. 366; cf. Duchèsne, 1017 B), of Saint Michael's Mount (i. 348). The authority of William of Jumièges is no doubt much the highest, but his chronology is inconsistent with M. Deville's view.

M. Deville has however done good service in bringing prominently forward the fact, which is commonly forgotten, that Robert, at the time of his first amour with Herleva, was not yet Duke of the Normans, but only Count of the Hiesmois, in which character Falaise was his capital. He has also well pointed out his extreme youth. Robert was the second son of Richard and Judith. The marriage contract of Judith, dated in 1008, is given in Martène and Durand's Thesaurus Novus, i. 123. Robert could therefore hardly have been born before 1010; he could have been only eighteen at the most at the time of the birth of William, and only twenty-five at the time of his pilgrimage and death. His brother Richard, the father of the monk Nicholas, must have been equally precocious. Edward the Third too was only eighteen years older than the Black Prince; but at any rate he was married.

III. That William was born at Falaise all accounts agree; but there is not the faintest authority for placing his birth in the present donjon. M. Deville says that the tradition is a very modern one. A room is shown as that where William "fut engendré et nâquit," and a sufficiently absurd inscription commemorates the supposed fact. But we have seen (see above, p. 176) that the existing keep is, in all probability, of a later date than William's birth; and, if it did exist in Robert's time, and if William were born in the castle at all, it is far more likely that Herleva would be lodged at such a time in some other part of the building, and not in the keep. The keep was not the common dwelling-place of the lord of a castle, but only his occasional place of defence. See Mr. G. T. Clark, Old London, pp. 14, 39, 43.

But there is another statement which, if it be trustworthy, as it seems to be, puts it beyond all doubt that William was not born in the castle at all, but elsewhere in the town of Falaise. The local historian of Falaise, M. Langevin (Recherches Historiques sur Falaise, 1814. p. 134), says, on the authority of "les anciens manuscrits extraits du chartier" of Trinity Church, Falaise, that William was born in 1027, in that parish, in a house belonging to him—that is, seemingly to his mother or her father—in the old market-place, and that he was baptized in Trinity Church. See Richomme, p. 12, who follows Langevin. One would like to have the exact extracts from the manuscripts, and to know something of their date; but in any case they are better authority than a romantic modern story, which seems not even to be a genuine tradition.

IV. Most writers state, or rather assume, that William was the only child of Robert and Herleva. The lioness was bound to bring forth only a single cub. But Mr. Stapleton, who pried into every corner in Norman matters, has, in a paper in the Archæologia (xxvi. 349 et seqq.), brought some strong arguments to show that William had a sister by the whole blood, Adelaide or Adeliza, wife of Enguerrand, Count of Ponthieu. This Adelaide was the mother of two daughters, one bearing her own name, who married Odo of Champagne, the other Judith, the too famous wife of our Earl Waltheof. The elder Countess Adelaide has been commonly taken to be only a half-sister of William, a daughter of Herleva by her husband Herlwin. She appears to have been so considered by the continuator of William of Jumièges (viii. 37), who calls the mother of Judith "soror uterina Willelmi Regis Anglorum senioris," words which he would hardly use of a daughter of Robert. Still Mr. Stapleton's case is very strong. It rests mainly on a charter, which

Mr. Stapleton prints, granted to the College (afterwards Monsetery) of Saint Martin of Auche (Alcis) near Aumale. Adelaide is there distinctly called the wife of Enguerrand and sister of William, and her daughters, Adelaide and Judith, are spoken of. After the death of her husband, she enriched the church of Saint Martin, and, while still young ("quum esset adhuc in juvenili ætate"), she had it hallowed by Archbishop Maurilius. Now Count Enguerrand died in 1053, and Maurilius was Archbishop of Rouen from 1055 to 1069. Mr. Stapleton thinks that these dates better suit a daughter of Robert and Herleva, who must have been born between 1028 and 1035, than a daughter of Herlwin and Herleva, who could not have been born before 1036. There are also two statements which, though erroneous as they stand, point to the parentage argued for by Mr. Stapleton as their groundwork. Thus Orderic (522 C) makes Odo of Champagne marry a sister of William and daughter of Duke Robert. The two Adelaides, mother and daughter, are here confounded, but the fact that Duke Rolert had a daughter is preserved. So Robert de Monte, under the year 1026 (Pertz, vi. 478), preserves the name of Aeliz or Adelaide, daughter of Duke Robert, though he makes her the child of another mistress and not of Herleva. This is doubtless an attempt to reconcile the existence of Adelaide with the belief that William was an only child.

The Norman writers, it must be remembered, know nothing, or choose to say nothing, of the marriage of Robert with Cnut's sister Estrith. See vol. i. p. 521. They look upon Herleva as Robert's only consort, lawful or unlawful. So William of Malmesbury, iii. 229; "Unicè dilexit et aliquamdiù justæ uxoris loco habuit." But no writer asserts any actual marriage, except the Tours Chronicler in Bouquet, x. 284. He marries Herleva to Robert soon after William's birth ("Dux Robertus, nato dicto Guillelmo, in isto eodem anno matrem pueri, quam defloraverat, duxit in uxorem"). He also transfers the story of Herleva from Falaise to Rouen. Possibly also some notion of a marriage may have floated across the brain of our own Knighton, when he said (2339) that William was called "Bastardus," "quod ante celebrationem matrimonii natus est."

The story of the Tours Chronicler cannot be true, as such a marriage would have legitimated William, and he then could not have been known as William the Bastard. But Herleva might seem from William of Malmesbury's words to have been looked on as something more than an ordinary concubine. It is strange that he should be the only writer who makes Herleva marry Herlwin during Robert's lifetime. His words (iii. 277) are, "Matrem, quantum vixit, insigni indulgentia dignatus est, quæ, ante patris obitum, cuidam Herlewino de Comitisvilla, mediocrium opum viro, nupserat." But William of Jumièges (vii. 3) distinctly puts the marriage after Robert's death; "Postquam Hierosolymitanus Dux obiit, Herluinus quidam probus miles Herlevam uxorem duxit, ex quâ duos filios, Odonem et Robertum, qui postmodum præclaræ sublimitatis fuerunt, procreavit." According to Orderic (660 B), Herleva was the second wife of Herlwin, whose son Ralph by a former marriage was also promoted by The honours shown by William to his mother seem to have struck writers at a distance. Besides William of Malmesbury just quoted, the Tours Chronicle in the French Duchèsne (iii. 361) says, "Matrem dum vixit honorifice habuit," and the Limousin writer William Godell (Bouquet, xi. 235) says, "Guillelmus Rex matrem suam, quamvis esset inferiori genere orta, multum honoravit." He goes on to mention the promotion of her sons.

Of the sons of Herleva, Odo and Robert, I need not speak here; but I may mention that she had also a daughter by Herlwin, named Muriel, who has naturally béen confounded with William's other sister Adelaide. Wace says (Roman de Rou, 11145),

"Ki à fame avait Muriel, Seror li Dus de par sa mere E Herluin aveit_à pere."

See Taylor's note, p. 102.

One would have thought that the story of Robert and Herleva was one which could never have been forgotten. Yet later writers did not scruple to provide the Conqueror with new and strange mothers. Thomas Wikes, the royalist chronicler of the thirteenth century (Gale, ii. 22), gives William the following wonderful pedigree. He was "natus ex nobilissima muliere Matilde, quæ fuit filia strenuissimi militis Richardi dicti Sanz-peur, filii Willielmus [sic, at least in the printed text] Lungespeye, filii Rolandi, qui fuit primus Dux Normannorum." And in an unpublished manuscript of the famous Sir John Fortescue of the fifteenth century (for a knowledge of which I have to thank the Right Hon. Chichester Fortescue), William is said to be Eadward's "consanguineus germanus ex Gunhilda amita sua, sorore patris sui." The confusion is delightful, but it preserves the fact that the kindred between William and Eadward had something to do with an aunt of one or other of them.

NOTE O. p. 254.

THE BATTLE OF VAL-ES-DUNES.

Since my account of the battle was written, I have received a small work by the Abbé Le Cointe, Curé of Cintheaux, called "Conspiration des Barons Normands contre Guillaume-le-Bâtard, Duc de Normandie, et Bataille du Val-des-dunes, 1047" (Caen, 1868). M. Le Cointe has examined the ground very carefully, both before and since my visit of last year, and the result of his researches is a most minute topographical account, full, accurate, and rich in local interest. I am glad to say that I do not find anything which calls upon me to alter my own shorter description. Since I was there, the foundations of the Chapel of Saint Lawrence have been brought to light, and many skeletons have been found there and in other parts of the field.

With regard to more strictly historical matters, M. Le Cointe, following in the main the same authorities as I do, gives essentially the same account. But he also makes use of a manuscript Chronicle of Normandy, which however seems not to be earlier than the fifteenth century, and whose mistakes he often stops to point out. Late writings of this kind are of course valuable only when there is reason to believe either that their authors had access to earlier written authorities now lost, or else that they embody trustworthy local traditions. The Chronicle in question contains two statements which, if true, are highly important, and the truth of which it would be most desirable to test. One is that the rebels were strengthened by a party of Angevins and Cenomannians, commanded by Enguerrand, nephew of Count Geoffrey Martel (Le Cointe, pp. 19, 35). The other is that the men of Caen—faithful among the faithless—took the side of the Duke (p. 18). It is quite possible that the influence of the local chieftains would be smaller in so considerable a city than it was at Coutances and Bayeux.

I would call particular attention to M. Le Cointe's excellent remarks on the position of the rebel forces, in p. 25.

NOTE P. p. 274.

THE COUNTS OF ANJOU AND OF CHARTRES.

With Geoffrey Grisegonelle, and still more with Fulk Nerra, we begin to get on firmer historical ground than we can find in the days of the earlier Counts. Fulk occupies an important place in the history of Rudolf Glaber, having two whole chapters (ii. 3, 4) pretty well to himself. And the exploits of Geoffrey derive more or less of corroborative testimony from several independent sources. The panegyrist of the family (Gest. Cons. 246) tells us that Geoffrey took an active part in resisting Otto's invasion of France in 978 (see vol. i. p. 265). We learn from a distinct and contemporary authority that Geoffrey had before that taken a part in that wild raid against Aachen (see vol. i. p. 264) by which Lothar had provoked the German inroad. "Lotarius . . . Lotharingiam calumniatus est. Cujus expeditionibus Gosfridus Comes Andegavorum, pater Fulconis ultimi, interfuit, nostræque ætatis multi viri" (Chron. S. Maxentii, Labbe, ii. 203). The words "Fulconis ultimi" could hardly have been used during the life of Fulk Nerra; it looks therefore as if the Chronicler wrote, in extreme old age, after Fulk's death in 1040. These entries about Geoffrey's attendance on Lothar fit in curiously with a Breton account (Chron. Brioc., Morice, p. 32), how Geoffrey seized on Guerech, the Breton Bishop and Count, on his return from the King's Court, and forced himsetting a precedent for two more famous acts of his grandson—to surrender Nantes.

Rudolf Glaber is very full on the war between Geoffrey and Conan, and the battle of Conquereux (Concretus in Rudolf, Conquerentium in the Angevin, Concruz in the Breton, Chronicles) in the County of Nantes. The Bretons mention two battles on the same spot, one in 982, the other in 992 (v Kal Julii), when Conan was killed (Chron. Bret. ap. Morice, i. et seqq.); the Angevin writer (Labbe, i. 275) speaks of the latter only. In the battle recorded by Rudolf, Conan seems not to be killed, but only "truncatus dexterâ" (ii. 3). Conan, according to Rudolf, had taken the title of King, like several of his predecessors. This assumption may not have been unconnected with the great revolution of 987. Rudolf's account of the Bretons (ii. 3) is amusing. Their land, "finitimum ac perinde vilissimum, Cornu Galliæ nuncupatur." This vile country "habitatur diutiùs à gente Brittonum, quorum solæ divitiæ primitùs fuere libertas fisci publici et lactis copia, qui omni prorsùs urbanitate vacui, suntque illis mores inculti ac levis ira et stulta garrulitas." Rudolf indeed is just now so full on Angevin matters that the local panegyrist is often content to copy him.

As for the Counts of Chartres, I was in vol. i. pp. 508, 509, misled by a passage of William of Jumièges (v. 10) into confounding the first and the second Odo. Odo the First died in 995, and was succeeded by his son Theobald, who was followed in 1004 by Odo the Second. It was this second Odo who waged the war about Tillières. In D'Achery, iii. 386, there is a charter of Richard the Good, restoring to the Church of Chartres lands which had been alienated from it, doubtless in the war of Tillières.

Rudolf Glaber (iii. 2) calls the younger Odo, "secundus Odo, filius scilicet prioris Odonis, qui quantò potentior, tantò fraudulentior ceteris." He goes on to say, "Fuit etiam juge litigium et bella frequentia inter ipsum Odonem et Fulconem Andegavorum Comitem, quoniam uterque tumidus superbiâ, idcirco et pacis refuga." The Angevin Chronicles, on the other hand, charge King Robert with leaving Fulk to fight their common battles all by This first war, especially the battle of Pontlevois, will be found narrated in most of the Chronicles of the time. See Gest. Cons. 253. Chronn. Andeg. (Labbe, i. 275, 286, 287) 1016, 1025, 1026, 1027. Chron. S. Maxent. (Labbe, ii. 206) 1016, 1026. Chron. S. Florentii, ap. Morice, 122. The most striking piece of detail, the intervention of Aldebert of Perigeux in 990, comes from Ademar (iii. 34, ap. Pertz, iv. 131); "Urbem quoque Turonis obsidione affectam in deditionem accepit et Fulchoni Comiti Andegavensi Sed ille ingenio doloso civium amisit post paullulum, et donavit. iterum Odo Campanensis eam recuperavit." Odo is prematurely called "Campanensis," as he did not become Count of Champagne till 1019.

Odo's last war (see p. 277) is described, among French writers, by Rudolf Glaber, iii. 9; in Gest. Cons. 254; and Chron. S. Petri Senonensis (D'Achery, ii. 475), where the date is given as 1046. It is described also by all the German writers, whom the matter more immediately concerned. See the authorities collected by Struvius, Hist. Germ. i. 342, to which may be added the very brief notices of Lambert under the years 1033 and 1037. The Kingdom of Burgundy, which came to an end in 1032 by the death of King Rudolf (see vol. i. p. 479), was claimed by Odo as well as by the Emperor Conrad, both being sisters' sons to Rudolf. Odo obtained some advantages in Burgundy, and he is said to have received an offer of the Crown of Italy. He then contemplated a restoration of the Lotharingian Kingdom and a coronation at Aachen. In Germany he was clearly looked upon as the representative of French aggression. While one manuscript of Hermann calls him "Princeps Gallicæ Campaniæ," another calls him "Princeps Carlingorum" (see Pertz, v. 121, and the old edition of Pistorius, p. 137). On this very remarkable expression, see vol. i. p. 172.

But still more remarkable is the sort of echo of these distant events which reached Ireland. In the Annals of Ulster, a. 1038 (O'Conor, Rer. Hib. Scriptt. iv. 324), we read of "Prœlium inter Cuana Regem ferorum Saxonum et Othonem Regem Francorum, in quo cæsi sunt millia plurima." So in Tigernach, under the same year (O'Conor, i. 287), "Prœlium inter Cuanum Regem Saxonum et Otam Regem Francorum, in quo occisi sunt mille cum Otâ." "Cuana" reminds us of "Cona" in our own Chronicles (1056), where however Henry is meant. It is also to be noticed that Conrad the Frank is called King of the Saxons. Not only is the Imperial dignity forgotten, but the memory of the great Saxon dynasty seems to extend itself over all succeeding Kings and Then Odo, a French Count, striving after the Kingdom of Burgundy, or in truth after any Kingdom that he could get, is magnified into a King of the French. Lastly, "feri" seems to be a standing epithet for all Saxons, whether continental or insular. The Ulster Annals (O'Conor, iv. 326) in the very next year record the death of "Haraldus Rex Saxonum ferorum," that is, Harold the son of Cnut.

NOTE Q. p. 276.

THE IMPRISONMENT OF WILLIAM OF AQUITAINE.

This imprisonment of William of Aquitaine is described at greater or less length by a whole crowd of writers. See the Gesta Consulum (257, 258), where the war is very fully narrated; the Angevin Chronicles under 1033; Chron. S. Mich. ap. Labbe, i. 350. Will. Pict. 86. Will. Malms. iii. 231. Chron. S. Maxent. 1032, 1035. According to the Gesta the war began out of the quarrel about Saintonge, and it is probably with reference to that County that both William of Poitiers and William of Malmesbury speak of the Duke of Aquitaine as the "lord" (dominus) of Geoffrey. The Chronicle of Saint Maxentius also speaks of the battle "juxta monasterium Sancti Jovini ad Montem Cærium" (Labbe, ii. 207). It is of course dwelt on at much greater length in the Gesta.

The cession of Bourdeaux, asserted by William of Malmesbury, seems hardly credible. The author of the Gesta, generally not indisposed to underrate the successes of the Angevin house, speaks only of the cession of the disputed territory of Saintonge. William of Poitiers (86) says only "argenti et auri pondus gravissimum, atque prædia ditissima extorsit." And the Chronicles of Saint Maxentius (a. 1036) speak of no territorial cession at all, but only of a ransom; "Isembertus Episcopus Pictavis fecit synodum, ubi magnam pacem [doubtless the Truce of God] firmavit. Qui, cum Eustachia uxore Guillelmi Comitis, aliquantulum exspoliavit monasteria auro et argento, unde redimerent eum." He then mentions the deaths of William and Eustachia. It was perhaps the flourish of William of Poitiers (86) about Poitiers, Bourdeaux, and other cities obeying Geoffrey ("Andegavi, Turoni, Pictones, Burdegala, multæ regiones, civitates plurimæ") which suggested a formal cession of Bourdeaux to the mind of William of Malmesbury.

There can be no doubt that Eustachia was the real wife of William the Fat, the prisoner of Geoffrey, and that Agnes, whom Geoffrey married, was only his father's widow. William of Poitiers says distinctly that, after the death of William, Geoffrey "novercam præcipuè nobilitatis [she was daughter of Otto-William, Count of Burgundy] toro suo sociavit" (p. 86). He is followed by William of Malmesbury (iii. 231), who says, "Martellus, ne quid deesset impudentiæ, novercam defuncti matrimonio sibi copulavit." Chronicle of Saint Maxentius, which places the death of William in 1036, places the marriage in 1037. This last Chronicle is the only one which gives us an intelligible reason for Geoffrey's conduct in contracting this marriage. Agnes could not have been very young, fifteen or sixteen years after her first marriage in 1018 (Art de vérifier les Dates, ii. 354. The date, according to the Chronicle of Saint Maxentius, is ro23, but then the second marriage is put later also); but Geoffrey had a political motive. "Willermo Comite mortuo, Pictavenses in magno angore et anxietate positi de morte principis sui, sicut oves sine pastore relicti, Odonem Comitem, germanum ejus ex patre supradicto, ex Gasconiâ convocaverunt. Per hæc tempora Gaufredus Martellus duxerat uxorem supradictam Agnetem, caussa Pictavensium, ut haberet sibi subditos adhuc duobus filiis suis, scilicet Petro et Gaufredo parvulis" (Labbe, ii. 207). The two boys were in the end (1044) established by Geoffrey as Counts of Poitiers and Gascony respectively.

Some of the Angevin and Norman Chroniclers seem to have confounded the two Williams, William the Great, the husband of Agnes, and William the Fat, her stepson, who was imprisoned by Geoffrey. They therefore make a strange hash of the story, making Geoffrey marry the wife of the prince whom he imprisoned, and The Angevin Chronicler that even during her husband's lifetime. in Labbe, i. 276, puts the marriage of Agnes a year before the imprisonment of William (1032 and 1033). "Gaufridus Martellus," he says, "Agnetem duxit incesto conjugio." It is not clear whether there was any kindred between Geoffrey and Agnes, or whether the Chronicler called the marriage "incestum" because he fancied that Agnes had a husband alive. The Chronicle of Saint Michael's Mount (Labbe, i. 350) is still more express. The marriage is recorded under 1032, and under 1033 we read that Geoffrey took prisoner William "cujus uxorem Agnetem ante duxerat." There can be no doubt that both the chronology and the facts are altogether confused, and we are thus led to look with some little suspicion on the other events which the Angevin Chronicler connects both with the imprisonment and with the marriage. Under 1032, after recording the marriage, he adds, "Inde bellum illud exsecrabile quod contra patrem suum per annos ferè septem subsequentes impiè gessit." On the imprisonment in 1033 he adds, "Quare orta est discordia inter patrem et matrem." What could these things have to do with one another?

NOTE R. p. 319.

THE RAVAGES ATTRIBUTED TO HAROLD AND GODWINE.

THE only writer who puts on anything like a tone of censure with regard either to Harold's conduct at Porlock or to Godwine's plundering along the south coast, is William of Malmesbury, and he does not draw the proper distinction between the doings of father and son. His words (ii. 199) are, "Exsulum quisque, de loco suo egressi, Britanicum mare circumvagari, littora piraticis latrociniis infestare, de cognati populi opibus prædas eximias conjecture."

There is however a marked difference of tone in the way in which the story of Harold's landing at Porlock is told by the different Chroniclers. The Abingdon writer, as I have often noticed, may be looked on as to some extent hostile to Godwine, and the Worcester writer, though on the whole favourable to the Earl, yet constantly follows the Abingdon narrative. The Peterborough version, I need hardly say, is quite independent, and is always strongly According to Abingdon and Worcester (1052), for Godwine. Harold landed and plundered, and then the people of the country came together to withstand him. He landed, they say, and "per mycel gehergode, and þæt landfolc him ongean gaderodan." the Peterborough writer makes the local force to have been already brought together, and speaks of no ravaging till after Harold had found the country hostile. Harold came to Porlock-"and wes beer mycel folc gegaderod ongean. Ac he ne wandode na him metes to tylienne; eode up, and ofsloh per mycelne ende pes folces." That is to say, the partizan of Godwine tells the tale in the way least unfavourable to Harold, while the hostile or indifferent writer tells it in the way most unfavourable. pains taken in both directions show that both writers agreed in thinking that the harrying and slaying, unless done in strict selfdefence, was discreditable.

The Biographer of Eadward seems to have thought differently. He greatly exaggerates the ravaging, and tells the tale (405) in a tone of distinct triumph; "Ab ipsis Occidentalium Britonum sive Anglorum finibus usque quò Dux consederat, ferro, igne, et abductâ prædâ omne regnum sunt devastati." It has been ingeniously suggested to me from this passage that the Biographer was a foreigner. way of looking at this particular matter certainly stands out in distinct contrast to that of all the native writers. The supposition that he was a foreigner would account for many of the characteristics of his work. It would quite explain his evidently minute personal knowledge of many things, combined with his frequent inaccuracy about others. It would account for his invariable tendency to dwell on all personal details about the King, the Lady, and the Earls, and rather to slur over the political affairs of the Kingdom. But, if he was a foreigner, the spirit in which he writes forbids the notion that he was a Frenchman. Probably he was a member of the other importation from Lotharingia.

But it is very singular that, in the account of the plundering of Godwine in Wight and Portland, it is the Peterborough writer who puts matters in the strongest light; "And eodon beer up, and hergodon swa lange beer beet folc geald heom swa mycel swa hi heom on legden; and gewendon heom be westweard, or bethi comon to Portlande, and eodon beer up, and dydon to hearme swa hwet swa hi dón mihton." Abingdon, on the other hand, mentions the plundering only incidentally, when saying that it ceased after the meeting of Godwine and Harold; "And hi na mycelne hearm ne dydon syroan hig togædere comon, buton beet heo metsunge namon." And the juxtaposition of the words which follow is remarkable; "Ac speonnon heom eall beet landfolc to be dam sæ riman, and eac up on lande." The people joined Godwine, notwithstanding his plunderings.

The mention of the plundering in Sheppey (see p. 323) comes also from the Peterborough Chronicle only. These differences show that the several writers, though one often wrote in a different spirit from another, all wrote honestly, and that they did not wilfully either invent or conceal things for party purposes.

In the name of common fairness, as wishing to give to our common hero his due praise and no more, I must protest against the way in which the Porlock story is slurred over by Thierry and Mr. St. John.

This part of Harold's conduct cannot be defended, and it ought not to be concealed. It is enough that he wiped out the stain by his refusal on a later day to ravage one inch of the Kingdom which had been given him to guard.

NOTE S. p. 319.

THE NARRATIVES OF THE RETURN OF GODWINE.

Or the return of Godwine, as of his banishment, we have three original narratives, those of the Abingdon and Worcester Chroniclers, which may be reckoned as one, that of the Peterborough Chronicler, and that of Eadward's Biographer. again shows its respective character; each has its characteristic tone; each brings some particular facts into greater notice than the others; but there are no really important contradictions among them. The Peterborough writer retains his old character as the stoutest of all adherents of Godwine. The Abingdon Chronicler may be looked on as in some sort an enemy; it is at the end of this year that he breaks out into that complaint about Godwine's appropriation of ecclesiastical property of which I have spoken elsewhere (see above, pp. 32, 351, 546). But he is not an uncandid enemy; some of the points which tell most strongly in Godwine's favour come out with great force in his narrative; it is from him that we get the fullest picture of the zeal with which Godwine was received by the maritime shires. He also, as we have seen (see Note R.), though he makes the most of Harold's ravages, makes the least of those of Godwine. This last feature is not what one would have expected. His dislike to Godwine follows him to his death, but in his late narrative it certainly is not extended to Harold. On the whole we may say that, as a monk, he has a certain personal feeling against Godwine, but that, as an Englishman, he is true to Godwine's cause.

The Biographer takes his usual line. He is a courtier, comparatively careless of the march of public events, but full of personal incidents which are not to be found elsewhere. His narrative is nowhere richer than in those little indirect and unconscious touches which are often worth more than direct statements. I need hardly say that he is the most careless as to chronology of all three. The Peterborough writer, on the other hand, is the most attentive. I therefore make him my main guide throughout the story, but I draw touches and incidents from both the other sources without hesitation.

Thus, at the very beginning, the Abingdon writer makes the great accession which the men of Kent and Sussex made to Godwine's force (p. 322) happen immediately on his first coming from Flanders, before he was pursued by the King's ships. This is hardly possible, and we accordingly find from the Peterborough narrative that it really happened later, after the storm and the return to Flanders, incidents which the Abingdon writer leaves out. But it is from the Abingdon writer that we get that most emphatic expression of the popular attachment to Godwine, how the men of Kent, Surrey (a shire which I should have mentioned more distinctly in p. 322), and the other south-eastern districts, pledged themselves to "live and die" with the Earl. William of Malmesbury, as he so often does, follows Peterborough, though he is not without touches of his own.

Somewhat later in the story (p. 324), we find a good illustration of the peculiar value of the Biographer. The Abingdon and Worcester Chronicles clearly imply that Eadward knew nothing of the second attempt of Godwine till the Earl had reached Sandwich; "Pa Eadwerd cyng bet geaxode," &c. The question in the text as to the whereabouts of the King naturally occurs. Florence (1052) made a very obvious inference from his authorities, when he wrote, "Regi Eadwardo, tunc temporis Lundonia demoranti, illorum adventus nunciatur." But these words are simply an inference; they do not translate any statement in the Chronicles, and we find from the Biographer, the best authority for the King's personal movements, that it is a wrong inference; "Audito itaque Rex ejus [Godwini] violento et absque ejus nutu in regnum suum ingressu, quamquam fidem referentibus non accommodaret, tamen cum militari copia qua poterat, Lundoniam venit" (Vita Eadw. 405). He therefore was elsewhere when he heard the news. The writer goes on to say, "Utque acri erat animo et promptissimæ strenuitatis, ingressum civitatis, quà tendebat, prohibere tentabat." The words in Italics must apply to Eadward, and the Biographer would hardly venture upon satire.

Æthelred himself, as we have seen, had his fits of energy, and Eadward also had his fits, if not of energy, at least of passion.

When we get to the negotiations on the evening of Monday, it is to the Peterborough Chronicler only that we owe our knowledge of the personal agency of Stigand (p. 329). A year before, the Biographer was the only writer who spoke of him. This is just the way in which, in a story of this kind, our several accounts fill up gaps in each other, and strengthen each other's authority. The conduct attributed to Stigand at one time by one account exactly agrees with the conduct attributed to him at another time by another and quite independent account. The Abingdon Chronicle simply says, "Geræddon þa þæt man sende wise men betweonan, and setton grið on ægere healfe." So Florence, "Sapientiores quique [Roger of Wendover, or his copyist, or his editor, turns this into "sapientes quinque," i. 491] ex utrâque parte, inter Regem et Ducem pacem redintegrantes, exercitum ab armis discedere jusserunt." The Canterbury writer follows Peterborough in mentioning Stigand, but adds, rather unluckily, "be was bes cinges rædgifa and his handprest."

The adjournment till the morning of Tuesday appears from the words of Florence, "Mane autem facto, concilium Rex habuit." These words answer to nothing in the actual narrative of any of the Chroniclers; but they are implied in what the Abingdon writer says afterwards; "Dæt wæs on bone Monandæg æfter Sca Marian mæsse þæt Godwine mid his scipum to Suðgeweorce becom, and bees on merigen, on bone Tiwesdæg hi gewurdon sehte, swa hit her beforan stent." We thus see that, in the flow of narration, especially in the rhetorical language of the Biographer, the events of two days have been run into one. This is especially shown in one expression of the Biographer. He makes one of the reasons which made Eadward finally yield at the Gemót to be because he saw that Godwine's military force was the stronger ("Ducem, quem utique videbat, sibi satis, si uti vellet, superiorem armis"); this consideration would rather belong to the former day. It is clear that the "mycel Gemót," as the Peterborough Chronicler triumphantly calls it, was held on Tuesday morning. Its details must be gathered from all Bits of the official decrees peep out both in Abingdon and Peterborough, but it is the Peterborough writer, the stoutest Englishman that ever took pen in hand, who loves emphatically to dwell on the democratic character of this great gathering. It is from his expression "wibutan Lundene," combined with the description which the Biographer gives of Godwine and Eadward afterwards going together to the Palace (see p. 337), that we learn that the assembly was held in the open air. The Biographer cares little for the political character of the meeting, but there is no part of his whole narrative in which he is richer in those little personal touches which give him his chief value. His account is most graphic and animated, and the reader will easily see that I have largely drawn upon him.

The flight of Robert, Ulf, and the other Normans (see p. 300) certainly happened before the meeting of the Gemot, therefore doubtless on Monday evening. From the account in the Abingdon Chronicle and in Florence it might seem that it was on Tuesday, after sentence had been pronounced against them in the Gemót. But, in the more careful order of the Peterborough writer, it becomes plain that it happened immediately after the mission of Stigand, that is, on Monday; "Da geaxode Rotherd arcebiscop and pa Frencisce menn pæt [the agreement made by Stigand] genamon heora hors and gewendon." Then, after the details of their ride, comes the account of the Gemót. So William of Malmesbury, ii. 199. Before the Gemót, "Ille [Robert], non exspectatâ violentiâ, sponte profugerat, quum sermo pacis componeretur." And this is confirmed by one of the incidental references in the Biographer. He does not directly describe the flight of Robert and his companions, but he speaks of the King at the Gemot as "destitutus imprimis fugâ Archipræsulis et suorum multorum, verentium adspectum Ducis, qui scilicet auctores fuerant illius concitati turbinis."

The personal reconciliation between the King and Godwine, distinct from, and following after, the public votes of the Gemót (see p. 337), rests on the direct authority of the Biographer only. The Chroniclers naturally think mainly of the proceedings in the Assembly, and merge the private reconciliation in the public one. The chaplain of the Lady, as naturally, looks at things in an opposite way. It is possible however that, in one passage of his story, the Peterborough writer had the private reconciliation in his mind. Once, and once only, is his way of speaking less popular than that of his Abingdon brother. Where Abingdon says, "And man sealds Godwine clæne his eorldom swa full and swa for swa he fyrmest ahte," Peterborough has "and se cyng forgeaf pam eorle and his bearnum his fulne freondscype and fulne eorldom," &c. This sounds very much as if the Peterborough writer was combining in his mind the public restoration by the Gemót and the personal reconciliation with the King. But in any case we cannot mistake the minute and local description given by the Biographer; "Rexitaque coactus tum misericordia et satisfactione Ducis . . . devictus quoque precibus supplicantium, redditis armis suis, cum Duce in palatium processit, ibique, paullatim defervente animi motu sedatus, sapientium consilio usus, Duci osculum probuit," &c. (p. 406).

One or two points may be here noticed. In the text (p. 337) I have said that the King and the Earl went "unarmed to the Palace." But "redditis armis suis" would rather mean that Eadward returned to Godwine the arms which Godwine had laid at his feet (p. 334). The restoration of the official axe was not unlikely to be the outward sign of the restoration of the office itself. Again, it may be asked whether "sapientium consilio usus" means merely "following the advice of wise men," or whether it is a technical expression, "in accordance with the decree of the Witan." In a simpler writer I should be inclined to take it in the latter sense; but the Biographer, if he had chosen to talk directly about the Witan at all, would probably have used some more rhetorical phrase. Besides we have already, in the course of the story, read in the Chronicles of "wise men," where the reference is clearly not to official but to personal wisdom.

There is certainly something very striking in the way in which our account of this great event has to be put together from several independent accounts, and in the amount of precision, even in very minute points, which we are able to reach by carefully comparing one with another. It is hardly necessary to collect together the shapes which the story takes in later writers, but I cannot pass by the way in which the Winchester annalist (p. 25) weaves the return of Godwine into the legend of Emma, which he places in 1043 (see above, p. 570). Eadward recalls Godwine at the prayer of his mother; "Precibus matris suse revocavit Godwinum Comitem et filios ejus ab exsilio, et conceptum in eos rancorem remisit ad plenum, et singulis honores suos reddidit." Selden also (Titles of Honour, pp. 525, 526) seems to have confounded this reconciliation between Eadward and Godwine with that imaginary reconciliation soon after Eadward's election of which Bromton is so full. See vol. i. p. 574.

The story adopted by some writers, ancient and modern, about Godwine giving his son Wulfnoth and his grandson Hakon as hostages to the King, by whom they were immediately handed over to the keeping of Duke William, I mention here only lest I should seem to have forgotten it. It is part of the story of Harold's oath, which I shall discuss at large in my next volume.

NOTE T. p. 338.

THE PILGRIMAGE OF SWEGEN.

I cannot help noticing the strange perversion of the story of Swegen which has been adopted by a writer generally so accurate as Dr. Lingard. "But to Sweyn," he tells us (i. 341), "Eadward was inexorable. He had been guilty of a most inhuman and perfidious murder; and seeing himself abandoned by his family, he submitted to the discipline of the ecclesiastical canons." This seems to come from Roger of Wendover (i. 491); "Rex . . . pristinum honorem restituit Godwino et filiis ejus omnibus, præter Suanum, qui Beornum peremerat Regis [sic] consobrinum, unde, pænitentiam agens, de Flandria nudis pedibus Hierosolymam petens, in reditu suo per viam defunctus est." This would most naturally mean that Swegen set out on his pilgrimage after the restoration of his family, and it might also seem to imply that the pilgrimage was an imposed penance. But there is no doubt that Swegen had already set out for Jerusalem before his father left Flanders, and the expressions of the best writers seem to show that the penance was altogether self-imposed. On the former point the words of the Abingdon Chronicle (1052) are decisive; "Swegen for æror to Hierusalem of Bricge." So Florence (1052), who also gives a hint on the other point; "Ille enim ductus pænitentia, eo quod, ut prælibavimus, consobrinum suum Beorn occiderat, de Flandriâ nudis pedibus Jerusalem jam adierat." William of Malmesbury (ii. 200; see above, p. 102) does not mention the time, but says that he went "pro conscientia Brunonis cognati interempti." About the chronology then there is no doubt, and there is no reason to suppose that the pilgrimage was other than a self-imposed one. Swegen, in short, if a great criminal, was also a great penitent, and it is rather hard to deprive him of that character in order to exalt Saint Eadward and the ecclesiastical canons. Eadward had no opportunity of being inexorable; Swegen's family had no opportunity of abandoning him; he probably did not need the discipline of the ecclesiastical canons; his own conscience had already pronounced sentence upon him. It was probably Florence's expression "pœnitentiâ ductus" which suggested Roger's "pœnitentiam agens," and from the latter Dr. Lingard clearly got his idea of the ecclesiastical canons.

Thierry (i. 201) seems, contrary to the best accounts, but in conformity with a possible interpretation of Roger, to bring Swegen to the Gemót, and to make him banish himself there; "Tous les membres de cette famille populaire rentrèrent dans leurs honneurs, à l'exception d'un seul, de Sweyn, qui y renonça volontairement." Out of this view Lord Lytton (Harold, i. 196 et seqq.) has made a fine scene.

The Abingdon Chronicle makes Swegen die at Constantinople; Florence places his death in Lykia. He adds that he died of the cold—"invalitudine ex nimio frigore contractâ." Florence, writing with the Abingdon Chronicle before him, could have no motive to change the well known Constantinople into the less known Lykia, unless he had good information that Lykia really was the place. But the Chronicler might very easily put Constantinople, a thoroughly familiar name, instead of Lykia, of which he had perhaps never heard. William of Malmesbury (ii. 200) has quite another story; "A Saracenis circumventus et ad mortem cæsus est."

A close parallel to the pilgrimage of Swegen is found in that of Lagman (on the name see vol. i. p. 510) King of Man, 1075-1093 (Munch, p. 4); "Rebellavit autem contra eum Haraldus frater ejus multo tempore. Sed tandem captus a Lagmanno, genitalibus et oculis privatus est. Post hæc Lagmannus, pœnitens quod fratris sui oculos eruisset, sponte regnum suum dimisit, et signo crucis dominicæ insignitus, iter Jerosolimitanum arripuit, quo et mortuus est."

NOTE U. p. 342.

THE ECCLESIASTICAL POSITION OF STIGAND.

STIGAND, as might have been expected, is as favourite an object of Norman abuse as Godwine himself. And abuse of Stigand is one degree more reasonable than abuse of Godwine. For, though Stigand's conduct seems to have in no way infringed the laws of England, and though it might easily have been justified by abundance of English precedents, there can be no doubt that it offended against the strict laws of the Church as understood by continental canonists. Of the mingled state of English feeling with regard to him I have spoken in several passages of the text (see above, pp. 343, 432, 446); I will here bring together some of the chief authorities on the subject.

The offences of Stigand, as seen in the eye of the Canon Law, are thus stated by Florence, when recording his degradation in 1070;

"Stigandus Doruberniæ archiepiscopus degradatur tribus ex caussis, scilicet, quia episcopatum Wintoniæ cum archiepiscopatu injustè possidebat; et quia, vivente archiepiscopo Roberto, non solum archiepiscopatum sumpsit, sed etiam ejus pallium, quod Cantwariæ remansit, dum vi injustè ab Angliâ pulsus est, in missarum celebratione aliquamdiu usus est; et post à Benedicto, quem sancta Romana ecclesia excommunicavit, eo quod pecuniis sedem apostolicam invasit, pallium accepit."

On Stigand's plurality of Bishopricks, an offence in which he was far from standing alone, William of Malmesbury, as might be expected, gets more rhetorical, and yet, after all, he seems to see that, as things went, there was nothing so very monstrous in it. He mentions the matter in the Gesta Regum, ii. 199;

"Invasit continuò, illo [Roberto] vivente, Stigandus, qui erat episcopus Wintoniæ, archiepiscopatum Cantuariensem; infamis ambitûs pontifex, et honorum ultra debitum appetitor, qui, spe throni excelsioris, episcopatum Saxonum Australium deserens, Wintoniam insederit, illam quoque cum archiepiscopatu tenuerit."

But in the Gesta Pontificum (116 b), after a good deal of abuse, he gets somewhat mollified;

"Nonne illud belluinæ rapacitatis dices, quod Wintoniæ episcopatum et Cantuariæ archiepiscopatum, præterea multas abbatiss [see Hist. Eliens. ii. 41] solus ipse possidebat, quæ singula satis superque sufficerent alicui probo viro? Sed ego conjicio illum non judicio sed errore peccasse, quòd homo illiteratus (sicuti plerique et penè omnes tunc temporis Angliæ Episcopi) nesciret quantim delinqueret, rem ecclesiasticorum negotiorum sicut publicorum actitari existimans."

The feeling on the subject among strict churchmen comes out very forcibly in the words of the Abingdon Chronicler in 1053, when he records the foreign consecration of Wulfwig and Leofwine; "On tisson geare ness ná arcebisceop on tissan lande, butan Stigand bisceop heold best bisceoprice on Cantwarabyrig on Christes cyrcean, and Kynsige on Eoforwic; and Leofwine and Wulfwi form ofer sæ and leton hig hadian hær to bisceopum." I suppose all that is meant about Cynesige is that he had not yet received the pallium, as I do not know of any objection having been made to his appointment. The Waltham writer (De Inventione, c. 16) has an expression which in a contemporary writer would be still more forcible. He tells us that Harold had his minster consecrated by Cynesige, "quia tunc vacabat sedes Cantuariæ." But, a hundred years later, the words may simply imply an imperfect understanding of the facts.

I have mentioned in their proper places the various Bishops who declined consecration at the hands of Stigand, and sought it elsewhere (see pp. 343, 453). The most important instance is that of Saint Wulfstan (see p. 466), on account of the distinct, though at first sight apparently contradictory, evidence which we have on the subject. I think that the distinct statement of Florence (1062) cannot be got over. It runs thus;

"Consecratus est igitur Episcopus à venerando Aldredo Eboracensium Archiepiscopo, ed quod Stigando Dorubernise Archiepiscopo officium episcopale tunc à Domino Apostolico interdictum erat, quia, Rodberto Archiepiscopo vivente, archiepiscopatum suscipere præsumpsit; canonicâ tamen professione præfato Dorubernensi Archiepiscopo Stigando, non suo ordinatori Aldredo, factă."

This seems to show that, in Florence's belief, the Legates brought with them a distinct and fresh decree against Stigand ("officium ... tunc interdictum est." Cf. Vita Wlstani, Ang. Sacr. ii. 251;

"Quod Cantuariensi Stigando Romanus Papa interdixisset officio"); that Wulfstan, in obedience to the Papal orders, refused consecration at the hands of Stigand, but that he nevertheless made canonical profession to him as the de facto Archbishop. Now this account is not a mere obiter dictum of Florence; it is one of those statements of his which have a controversial force. It is evidently meant as an answer to some other statement; it is akin to his memorable description of Harold's election and coronation, in which every word disposes of some Norman calumny. It expresses, in short, the deliberate conviction of a man of local knowledge and sound judgement. On the other hand, the words of the later profession of Wulfstan to Lanfranc (a document which is not printed, but for a copy of which I have to thank Professor Stubbs) seem to deny that he had ever made any earlier profession at all. His words are;

"Quo tempore ego Vulstanus ad Wigorniensem Wicciorum urbem sum ordinatus episcopus, sanctam Dorobernensem ecclesiam, cui omnes antecessores meos constat fuisse subjectos, Stigandus jampridem invaserat, metropolitanum ejusdem sedis vi et dolo expulerat, usumque pallii quod ei abstulit contemptà apostolice sedis auctoritate temerare præsumpserat. Unde à Romanis Pontificibus, Leone, Victore, Stephano, Nicolao, Alexandro, vocatus, excommunicatus, damnatus est. Ipse tamen, ut cœpit, in sui cordis obstinatione permansit. Per idem tempus jussa eorum Pontificum in Anglicam terram delata sunt prohibentium nequis ei episcopalem reverentiam exhiberet, aut ad eum ordinandus accederet. Quo tempore Anglorum præsules, alii Romam, nonnulli Franciam sacrandi petebant; quidam vero, ad vicinos coepiscopos accedebant. Ego autem Alredum Eboracensis ecclesiæ antistitem adii; professionem tamen de canonica obedientia usque ad præsente diem facere distuli."

I suspect that Wulfstan meant to say that he had made no profession to Ealdred, and that Lanfranc, or some cunning foreign clerk, wrapped the matter up in the folds of a subtilty which the English Bishop most likely did not above half understand. A document which ventures to say that Stigand—and not the English people—drove Robert into exile could hardly be the genuine composition of the chosen friend of Harold. The simplicity of the saint was doubtless imposed upon, and his hand was set to a paper which gave a false view of the case. Florence seemingly thought it his duty to put a counter-statement on record.

NOTE W. p. 351.

THE DEATH OF EARL GODWINE.

THE Biographer gives no details of the death of Godwine. He merely says (408) that he died in the year after his return ("reconciliatis ergo Duce et ejus filiis cum Rege, et omni patrià in pacis tranquillitate conquiescente, secundo post hæc anno, obiit idem Dux felicis memoriæ"). He then mentions the grief of the nation, the Earl's solemn burial in the Old Minster ("tumulatur condigno honore in monasterio, quod nuncupant, veteri Wintoniæ"), and the offerings made for the repose of his soul.

All the Chronicles mention the Earl's death. The Winchester Chronicle, in one of its rare entries at this time, says simply, "1053. Her Godwine Eorl foreferde." The late Canterbury Chronicle adds the exact date; "1053. Her was Godwine Eorl dead on xvii. Kal. Mai." Peterborough adds the place of burial; "1053. Her on pisum geare for ferde Godwine Eorl on xvii. Kal. Mai, and he is bebyrged on Winceastre on ealda mynstre." But it is from the Worcester, and still more from the Abingdon Chronicler, that we learn the details which I have followed in the text, and on a perversion of which the Norman romance is evidently founded. The Worcester writer's account (1053) is put out of place, after events which happened later in the year. He tells us that the Earl was taken ill while he sat with the King at Winchester ("him geyfelode pær he mid pam cynge sæt on Wincestre"). The Abingdon Chronicler is much fuller. He mentions the death of Godwine twice. First, in 1052, he gives us the very important fact that the Earl began to sicken soon after his return (see above, p. 348), and it is here that he makes his complaint of Godwine's spoliations of holy places (see above, p. 545). Under 1053 he gives the story The King is at Winchester at Easter, and Godwine, of his death. Harold, and Tostig ("Godwine Eorl, and Harold Eorl his sunu, and Tostig." See p. 567 on the way of describing the two brothers) are with him. He then goes on,

"Da on o'ran Easter dæge sæt he mid þam Cynincge æt gereorde; þa færinga sah he niver wid þæs fotsetles spræce benumen, and ealre his mihte; and hine man & bræd into & Kinges bure, and & Sohtan bæt hit ofergån sceolde; ac hit næs na swa, ac burhwunode swa unspecende and mihteleas for o o bone Dunresdæg, and & his lif alét, and he li bær binnan ealdan mynstre."

Florence (1053) translates this account, with the addition of one or two touches;

"Eodem anno, dum secunda paschalis festivitatis celebraretur feria Wintoniæ, Godwino Comiti, more solito Regi ad mensam assidenti, suprema evenit calamitas, gravi etenim morbo ex improviso percussus, mutus in ipså sede declinavit. Quod filii ejus, Comes Haroldus, Tosti, et Gyrth videntes, illum in Regis cameram portabant, sperantes eum post modicum de infirmitate convalescere; sed ille expers virium, quintâ post hæc feriâ, miserabili cruciatu vitâ decessit, et in veteri monasterio sepultus est."

I am not sure that we do not here, in our own Florence, find the first touches of romance, or rather the first influence of the romantic tales which were doubtless already afloat in his time. He leaves out the mention of Godwine's previous illness, he enlarges on the suddenness of the stroke, and he adds the "miserabilis cruciatus," of which we hear nothing in the Chronicles, and which seems to come from the death of Harthacnut (see vol. i. p. 591).

We are now fairly landed in the region of romance. death of Godwine at the royal table probably suggested the thought of that form of ordeal in which the guilt or innocence of the accused person was tested by his power of swallowing a morsel, blessed or cursed for the purpose. It is possible that the tale of Ælfred the conspirator against Æthelstan was not forgotten. Ælfred, according to the story (Will. Malms. ii. 137), was in the like manner struck before the altar after his false oath before Pope John, and died on the third day. The legend of Godwine appears in shapes in which both these sources can be recognized. ing to William of Malmesbury (ii. 197), Eadward and Godwine were sitting at table discoursing about the King's late brother Ælfred ("orto sermone de Elfredo regis fratre"); Godwine says that he believes that the King still suspects him of having had a hand in his death ("Tu, Rex, ad omnem memoriam germani, rugato me vultu video quod aspicias"); but he prays God that the morsel which he has in his hand may choke him ("non patiatur Deus, ut istam offam transglutiam") if he had ever done anything tending to Ælfred's danger or to the King's damage ("ad ejus periculum, vel tuum incommodum"). Of course the morsel does choke him, and he dies then and there; he is dragged from under the table by his son Harold, who is in attendance on the King ("qui Regi adstabat"), and is buried in the cathedral of Winchester ("in episcopatu Wintonise"). The moral of course is not wanting—"Deum monstrasse quam sancto animo Godwinus servierit;" but it is only fair to William to say that his infinitive mood shows that he is telling the tale only as part of the Norman version of Godwine's history (see above, p. 536).

The Hyde writer (p. 289) tells the story in a shape which is still more distinctly borrowed from the story of Ælfred. changed to London. Godwine sees that the King's mind is still kept back from a thorough reconciliation by the remembrance of the death of his brother ("animadvertens animum Regis Edwardi pro injusta fratris sui interfectione erga se non esse sincerum"). He therefore constantly tries to regain his favour by frequent assertions of his innocence. He and the King are present in a church at the time of mass; Godwine, of his own free will ("nullo cogente sed ipso Rege cum Principibus vehementer admirante"), steps forward to the altar, takes the chalice in his hand, and pledges himself by a solemn oath ("cunctis audientibus inaudito se juramento constrinxit") that he had no share in the death of Ælfred. King and the Earl then go to dinner, and the rest of the story is told in nearly the same way as by William of Malmesbury, only in a rather more impressive style. The morsel sticks in Godwine's throat (" buccellam ori impositam, urgente eum divino judicio, nec glutere potuit, nec revertere, sed in amentiam versus terribiliter coepit exspirare"). Harold, who, as in the other version, is in attendance on the King ("qui servitoris officio Regi adstabat"), carries him out while still breathing ("jam extremum spiritum trahentem, foras asportavit").

In Henry of Huntingdon (M. H. B. 760 B) the chief difference from the version of William of Malmesbury is that the death of Ælfred is not mentioned. The scene is removed to Windsor ("apud Windleshores, ubi plurimum manere solebat"); the conversation at dinner between the King and the Earl turns upon Godwine's supposed treasons against the King himself, a subject quite as strange as the death of Ælfred; Godwine ("gener suus et proditor, recumbens juxta eum") seemingly volunteers the remark that he has been often falsely accused of plotting against the King, but that he trusts that, if there be a true and just God in heaven, he will make the piece of bread choke him, if he ever did so plot. The true and just God, we are told, heard the voice of the traitor, who, as the chronicler charitably adds, "eodem pane strangulatus mortem prægustavit æternam."

But there was something very lame in both these shapes of the story. Why should Eadward and Godwine choose as the subject of their discourse the topics which of all others one would have thought that both of them would have wished to avoid? Why should either Eadward or Godwine, in the familiar intercourse of the dinner-table, fall talking either about the murder of Ælfred or about any other treasonable doings of the Earl? William and Henry give us no clue. The Hyde writer solves the difficulty, but in rather a desperate way. In the next stage of the legend the explanation is much more ingeniously supplied. Some teller of the story lighted on an ancient legend which William of Malmesbury had recorded in its proper place (ii. 139), but which he had not thought of transferring to this. There was an old scandal against King Æthelstan, to the effect that he exposed his brother Eadwine at sea, on a false charge of conspiracy brought by his cup-Seven years after, the cup-bearer, handing wine to the King, slips with one foot, recovers himself with the other, and adds the witty remark, "So brother helps brother." But King Æthelstan is thereby minded how this same man had made him deprive himself of the help of his brother, and he takes care that, however strong he may be on his feet, he shall presently be shorter by the head, which had no brother to help it. This story (of which I have spoken in an article in the Fortnightly Review, May 1, 1866) is worked into the legend of Godwine by Æthelred of Rievaux (X Scriptt. 395), in the French Life of Eadward (3253 et seqq. p. 117), in Roger of Wendover (i. 492), the Winchester Annals (p. 25), Thomas Rudborne's Winchester History (Ang. Sacr. i. 239), Bromton (X Scriptt. 944), and Knighton (X Scriptt. 2333). In all these accounts we read, with no difference of any importance, how, as Eadward and Godwine are at table, the cup-bearer slips and recovers himself, how Godwine says, "So brother helps brother," how Eadward answers, "So might my brother Ælfred have here me, but for the treason of Godwine." The Earl's protestations d innocence, and the fearful test which he offers, have now a certain propriety, and the rest of the story follows much as in William of Malmesbury. The ball however has grown somewhat in is rollings, and some characteristically strong language is put into the mouth of the Saint. "Drag out the dog" ("extrahite canem," " "canem istum") is the King's terse command, as it appears it Æthelred and Bromton. In the French Life this is, by a sight improvement, developed into "this stinking dog" ("treies has ceu chen punois"); while in most of the versions Eadward gos on to order his father-in-law to be buried in the highway, " unworthy of Christian burial ("extrahite canem hunc et proditores et illum in quadrivio sepelite, indignus est ut Christianam habest sepulturam"). The burial in the Old Minster was, we are assured by Roger of Wendover, done wholly without the King's knowledge ("Rege id penitus ignorante"). One or two other smaller points may be noticed. Bromton and Knighton, like Henry of Huntingdon, transfer the story to Windsor, and the Winchester Annals more strangely transfer it to Odiham. Roger of Wendover and Thomas Rudborne make the King bless the morsel, before Godwine takes it; and the latter mentions another version, according to The presence of the which it was blessed by Saint Wulfstan. Prior of Worcester at the royal banquet is not accounted for. The Winchester Annals, with an obvious scriptural allusion, tell us that with the morsel Satan entered into Godwine ("introivit in illum Sathanas"). Lastly, Bromton turns the cup-bearer whose foot slips into no less a person than the Earl of the East-Angles. wonders that the legend of the quarrel between Harold and Tostig was not dragged in here also.

After all this, it is with some relief that one turns to honest Wace (10595), who at least had the manliness to confess that there were things which he did not know;

"Gwine poiz remist issi, Li Reiz en paiz le cunsenti. Jo ne sai cumbien i dura, Maiz jo sai bien k'il s'estrangia D'un morsel ke li Roiz chigna Al' atinie ù il mainga."

Such is the rise and progress of this famous legend. I venture to think that a better instance of the gradual growth of invention is hardly to be found in the whole range of mythology.

NOTE X. p. 362.

THE WAR WITH MACBETH.

SEVERAL points of dispute are opened by Siward's expedition against Macbeth. In the popular story Macbeth is killed, and Malcolm is put in full possession of the Kingdom of Scotland, as the immediate result of the battle fought by Siward. On the other hand, authentic history makes Malcolm wage a much longer struggle, as I have mentioned in the text. The point which is left obscure is what share the English allies of Malcolm took in the war after the defeat of Macbeth by Siward.

On the other hand, a question has been raised by Mr. E. W. Robertson, whether the expedition of Siward had anything at all to do with the restoration of Malcolm. I cannot look on this question as much more than a cavil; still it may be as well to state the objection and the answer to it, as coming first in chronological order, before examining the other points.

1. The objection brought by Mr. Robertson (Scotland under her Early Kings, i. 122, 123) against the commonly received view as to the objects of Siward's expedition seems to rest on no ground except that, as he says, "neither the contemporary Irish annalist, nor the two MSS. of the Chronicle which describe the expedition of Siward, allude to any cause for it, or note any result beyond the immense booty acquired." "They never," he adds, "mention the name of Malcolm or of the Confessor." Elsewhere (ii. 400) Mr. Robertson calls it an "expedition which appears to have been directed against Macbeth on account of the protection he has afforded to the Norman favourites of the Confessor." Now this last explanation is a mere conjecture of Mr. Robertson's own. There is not a scrap of evidence in support of it, while on the other side we have the distinct statement of Florence. Florence tells us directly that one object at least of Siward's expedition was the restoration of Malcolm ("Malcolmum, Regis Cumbrorum filium, ut Rex jusserat, Regem constituit"). He is followed, in nearly the same words, by the Manx Chronicler (1035, Munch, p. 3). Mr. Robertson's conjecture seems to me to be not only unsupported, but utterly improbable. There is nothing to show that Macbeth had given any further offence by receiving the Norman exiles. They had been allowed to go peaceably into Scotland (see above, p. 346), and some of them had actually been recalled to England. That, being in Scotland, they fought on the Scottish side, does not prove that the war was in any way waged against them. To fight on behalf of the side on which they found themselves for the moment was only the natural conduct of Normans anywhere. And, besides all this, the whole story of these Norman exiles rests on the authority of Florence. It is from him alone that we learn that they took any part in the battle, or indeed that there were any Norman exiles in Settled at all. If the authority of Florence is good to prove these points it is all. It the auditority of the expedition and surely equally good to prove the objects of the expedition and it is not merely the authority of Florence; it is Florence confined by Simeon of Durham, our best authority for all Northern matters by Simeon of Durnam, our section (see X Scriptt. 187). That the Chronicle as silent on some points, that the Peterborough capricion altogether, will amaze no one who remembers how capricion altogether, will series are entered or not entered in section and amaze no one who remembers.

Northumbrian affairs are entered or not entered in our national and Worcester Chronics in our national Northumbrian affairs are envolved annals. The Abingdon and Worcester Chronic Person our national annals. The Abingdon and Worcester Chronic Person our national annals. The Abingdon and Worcester Chronic Person our national annals. The Abingdon and Worcester Chronic Person our national annals. The Abingdon and Worcester Chronic Person our national annals. annals. The Abingdon and with the general greatness of Siward's exploit, but the struck of interest for them. The Peterborough Ch. with the general greatness of the Peterborough Chronicler, Malcolm had no interest 101 vice.

the sworn partizan of the house of Godwine, did not trouble him. self to take any notice of an event which neither enhanced the self to take any notice of an event which neither enhanced the self to take any notice of the own about the glory of Harold nor touched the interests of his own abbey. But glory of Harold nor touched with the fact that Simeon held Florence's narrative to be worth copying its authority without addition or alteration at once stamps its authenticity. without addition or assertations of Anglo-Norman writers." I talk Simeon's approval at once some about the "misrepresentations of Anglo-Norman writers," whoever

Mr. Burton (i. 373) seems to have no doubt about the matter.

Mr. Burton (1. 373) source.

2. The nature of Siward's troops is well marked in the language of the different accounts. The here and the fyrd are clearly distinof the different accounts. In the different accounts and the different accounts. The Worcester Chronicle (1054) says, "Her ferde Siward and Southand and Siward and S Eorl mid miclum here on Scotland, æger ge mid sciphere and mid landfyrde." This Florence translates, "Strenuus Dux Northhymbrorum Siwardus, jussu Regis, cum equestri ecorcitu et classe valida Scottiam adiit." Then, in describing the slaughter of the English, Abingdon says, "Eac feel mycel on his [Siwardes] healfe

Danorum ceciderunt." The Worcester Chronicle says, "And of his [Siwardes] huscarla and of bees cynges wurdon beer ofslægene." I take the here, the housecarls, and the equestris exercitus, all to be the same thing, and I take the "Danish and English" of one account to answer to the "Housecarls of the Earl and of the King" in the other. The Housecarls were doubtless an "equestris exercitus" in the sense of which I spoke in vol. i. p. 566. They did not fight on horseback, but they, or many of them, rode to battle (see also vol. i. p. 298), while the levies of the shires, no doubt, for the most part walked. The King's Housecarls, we see, were wholly or mainly Englishmen, chiefly no doubt West-Saxons; those of the Earl would doubtless be Danes in the sense of being inhabitants of the Denalagu, some perhaps in the sense of being actually adventurers from Denmark. The Housecarls now clearly take the place of the old comitatus; the stress of the battle now falls mainly on them, just as of old it fell on the noble youths who fought around Brihtnoth (see vol. i. pp. 91, 298, 490). So, on the Scottish side, we read in the Worcester Chronicle that Siward "feaht wid Scottas . . . and ofsloh eall pæt per betst wæs on pam lande." The special mention of the Normans comes from Florence; "Multis millibus Scottorum, et Nortmannis omnibus, quorum suprà fecimus mentionem, occisis." The Ulster Annals (Johnston, 69; O'Conor, Rer. Hib. Scriptt. iv. 334) speak of this battle as "prœlium inter viros Albaniæ et Saxones." They undertake to give us the numbers of the slain, three thousand on the Scottish side, and fifteen hundred "Saxons."

3. That Siward lost a son in the battle is asserted by the Abingdon Chronicler and by Florence; but they do not give his name. The Worcester writer is more express. Among the slain were "his sunu Osbarn and his sweoster sunu Sihward." The story of Siward asking about his son's wounds is told, and well told, by Henry of Huntingdon (M. H. B. 760 A) and Bromton (X Scriptt. 946). But Henry carries back the story to the year 1052, and both he and Bromton conceive Osbeorn Bulax, as Bromton calls him, to have died in an earlier expedition in which his father had no share. Siward, hearing a satisfactory report of the manner of his son's death, goes in person and avenges him ("Siwardus igitur in Scotiam proficiscens, Regem bello vicit, regnum totum destruxit, destructum sibi subjugavit"). If there is any meaning in this wild exaggeration, the subjection of Scotland to Siward must mean the establishment of Siward's kinsman Malcolm as King. But it is hard to make the story of Osbeorn's death and Siward's inquiries fit in with the fact that Osbeorn died in a battle in which Siward himself was present. According to the analogies of Maldon and Senlac, the Earl, his son, and his nephew would stand near together in the fight, and there would be no need of messengers to announce the manner of Osbeorn's death.

Bromton has also preserved another tradition about the death of Osbeorn, which is palpably mythical as it stands, but which seems, in common with several other hints, to point to a strong feeling of disaffection towards Siward as rife in Northumberland. Siward goes into Scotland, leaving Osbeorn as his representative in his Earldom. After his victory he hears that the Northumbrians have revolted and killed his son. He then, in his wrath, performs an exploit like that of Roland in the Pyrenees ("Siwardus inde iratus in scopulo adhuc patente cum securi percussit"); he gives Scotland to Donald (inaccurately for Malcolm), and returns to Northumberland to take a stern vengeance on his enemies ("patriam rediit et inimicos suos in ore gladii percussit").

4. As to the result of the battle, there can be no doubt. Macbeth was defeated, but not killed. But the false account followed by Shakespere (who also confounds Osbeorn with his cousin the younger Siward) is as old as William of Malmesbury. He speaks (ii. 196) of "Siwardus Northimbrensium [Comes], qui jussu ejus [Edwardi] cum Scotorum Rege Macbetha congressus, vita regnoque spoliavit, ibidemque Malcolmum, filium Regis Cumbrorum, Regem instituit." It is singular that William should have fallen into an error which not only contradicts the earlier authorities, but which has been avoided by many writers much later and more careless than himself. The agreement on this head is complete. escape of Macbeth is implied in the words of the Worcester Chronicle ("Siward . . . feaht wib Scottas and aflymde bone kyng Macbeoben") and of Florence ("illum fugavit"); and it is still plainer in the Abingdon version ("Siward . . . mycel wæl of Scottum gesloh, and hig aflymde, and se cing ætbærst") and in the Biographer ("Rex Scottorum nomine barbarus . . . à Siwardo Duce usque ad internecionem penè suorum devictus et in obscernam fugam est versus." p. 416). The story in Henry of Huntingdon and Bromton, as we have seen, speaks only of a victory over Macbeth, not of his death. Fordun (v. 7) is equally clear. He quotes and rejects William of Malmesbury's account, and tells us that Macbeth "partibus subitò relictis australibus boreales petiit, ubi terrarum angustis anfractibus et silvarum abditis tutiùs sperabat se tueri." He adds that the Scots, unwilling to fight against Malcolm, fled at the first sound of the trumpet, quite a different picture from the hard fought fight spoken of by the English and Irish writers.

- 5. The distinct statement of Florence that Siward made Malcolm King ("Regem constituit") does not seem to me to be at all contradicted by the facts that the war lingered on several years, and that Malcolm was not solemnly crowned at Scone till after the death of the competitor who succeeded Macbeth. The result of the battle doubtless was that Malcolm was acknowledged King of Scots by the English King, by at least his own English subjects in Lothian, and probably by the southern parts of Scotland proper ("partes australes" in Fordun just above). But the war still went on in the North. It is worth notice that Florence is satisfied with the practical expression of Eadward's supremacy—"ut Rex jusserat, Regem constituit." But Roger of Wendover (i. 493), in whose time the homage of Scotland was becoming a matter of debate, is more special and more feudal in his language. He improves the statement of Florence into "Rex regnum Scotize dedit Malcolmo, Cumbrorum Regis filio, de se tenendum."
- 6. The remaining events of the war I have described in the text. Our accounts are very meagre, but there can, I think, be little doubt that Malcolm continued to be powerfully supported by English help under Tostig, the successor of Siward. That such was the case is distinctly affirmed by Eadward's Biographer (416), though, as usual, he wraps his story in such a cloud of words that we cannot make out much as to time, place, or circumstance. Macbeth, the King whose barbarous name he cannot write or remember, was first ("primum") defeated by Siward, then by Tostig. "Secundo, ducatum agente Duce Tostino, quum eum Scotti intentatum haberet, et ob hoc in minori pretio habitum, latrocinio potius quam bello sæpius lacesserent; incertum genus hominum, silvisque potius quam campo, fugæ quoque magis fidens quam audaciæ virili in prælio, tam prudenti astutia quam virtute bellica et hostili expeditione, cum salute suorum prædictus Dux attrivit, ut cum Rege eorum delegerint ei Regique Ædwardo magis servire quam rebellare, id quoque per datos obsides ratum facere." He then formally declines to go further into the matter. The meaning of the passage is by no means clear. Indeed I do not feel certain whether the Biographer has not confounded Macbeth and Malcolm. It is hard to conceive any time when Macbeth can have given hostages; Malcolm may have done so on his first appointment, or it is possible, though we have no other account of it, that Malcolm's raid in 1061 (see p. 459) may have been avenged by a Scottish expedition on the part of Tostig. Biographer's authority on these matters, which he seems purposely to slight, is far from being so great as it is when he is dealing with those affairs of the Court which went on under his own eye. Still his account shows that a Scottish war of some sort or other, whether against Macbeth or against Malcolm, went on under Tostig as well as under Siward.

The sworn brotherhood again between Tostig and Malcolm (see p. 384) can hardly have any other reference than to a joint war against Macbeth. There is also a statement in Fordun (v. 8), which, though utterly confused as it stands, may probably help us to an important fact. Fordun clearly conceived Siward as continuing to wage war in Scotland after the battle of 1054, for he describes him as being summoned back by Eadward to help in the war against Gruffydd, after the destruction of Hereford in 1055 ("Hoc statim Siwardus, postquam à suo Rege per certum audierat nuncium, confestim jussus domi rediit, nequaquam ulteriùs Malcolmo ferre præsidium rediturus"). Now Siward died in 1055, before the war in Herefordshire began; but, if we read Tostig for Siward, a summons to the Welsh war is in every way probable.

Fordun, though he preserves the fact of Macbeth's escape from the battle of 1054, confounds that battle with the battle of Lumfanan in 1058, and places them together in 1056, on December 5th (v. 7). Nevertheless he makes (v. 8) the battle to have happened at the same time as Gruffydd's destruction of Hereford in 1055. But Siward's battle is fixed by the English Chronicles to 1054, and the battle in which Macbeth died is equally fixed by the Irish Chronicles to 1058. So the Ulster Annals; "Macbeath filius Finnliachi, supremus Rex Albaniæ, occisus est à Malcolmo filio Donnchadi in prœlio." (See also Robertson, i. 123; Burton, i. 373.) The successor of Macbeth is called by Fordun (v. 8) "suus [Machabei] consobrinus, nomine Lulach, cognomine Fatuus." Tigernach calls him "Lulacus Rex Albaniæ," and fixes his death, which was "per dolum," to 1058. The Ulster Annals call him "Mac Gil Comgen" (see Robertson, i. 120). Mr. Burton (i. 374) calls him a son of Gruach. The coronation of Malcolm comes from Fordun (v. 9). Cf. O'Conor's note on the Ulster Annals, Rer. Hib. Scriptt. iv. 338.

NOTE Y. p. 370.

THE MISSION OF EALDRED AND THE RETURN OF THE ÆTHELING EADWARD.

THE sources of our information with regard to Bishop Ealdred's mission to the Imperial Court curiously illustrate the occasionally deficient nature of our authorities, and the way in which one writer fills up gaps in another. The mission of Ealdred in 1054 and the return of the Ætheling in 1057 are both of them distinctly recorded in our national Chronicles. They are indeed much more than recorded; each event finds at least one Chronicler to dwell upon it with special interest. But from the Chronicles alone we should never find out that there was any connexion between the two events. The coming of the Ætheling is recorded by the Peterborough writer, and it attracts the special attention of his Worcester brother, who bursts into song on the occasion. there is not a word in either to connect his coming with the German mission of Ealdred. About that mission the Peterborough writer is silent, just as he is silent about the Scottish war of Siward. Abingdon (1054) records Ealdred's journey, but says only, "On pam ylcan geare ferde Ealdred biscop sub ofer see into Sexlande, and weard per mid mycelre arwardnesse underfangen." From this account we might guess, but we could do no more than guess, that Ealdred went in some public character. The Worcester writer is naturally fuller on the doings of his own Bishop; still what chiefly occupies his attention is the "mickle worship" with which Ealdred was received by the Emperor, the long time that he was away, and the arrangements which he made for the of his duties during his absence (see p. 372). He does 10 deed tell us that Ealdred went on the King's errand; but he does not tell us what the King's errand was, any more than he did in recording Ealdred's earlier mission to Rome in 1049. His words are; "Des ilcan geres for Aldred biscop to Colne ofer sæ, bæs kynges ærende, and wear's per underfangen mid mycclan weor'scipe fram pam Casere, and per he wunode wel neh an ger; and him geaf æger peneste, ge se biscop on Colone and se Casere." So William of Malmesbury (Vit. S. Wlst. Ang. Sacr. ii. 249) looks on the objects of the embassy as best summed up in the Herodotean formula eldes οὐ λέγω. Ealdred goes to the Emperor, "quædam negotia, quorum cognitionem caussa non flagitat, compositurus." But he has much to tell us about Ealdred's reception by the Emperor ("quum in Imperatorise Augustse dignationis oculis invenisset gratiam, aliquot ibi dierum continuatione laborum suorum accepit pausam"), and still more about the presents which he received. As the biographer of Wulfstan, he could not fail to tell us about two service-books in which Wulfstan was deeply interested (see p. 462), and which Ealdred now received as a present from the Emperor. In his history he does speak of an embassy to bring about the return of the Ætheling, but he altogether misconceives the circumstances (see p. 371), he makes no mention of Ealdred, and he fancies that the embassy went direct to Hungary ("Rex Edwardus ... misit ad Regem Hunorum." ii. 228). It is from Florence, and from Florence only, that we get a complete and accurate filling up of all our gaps. He tells us, under 1054, "Aldredus Wigorniensis Episcopus . . . magnis cum xeniis Regis fungitur legatione ad Imperatorem, à quo simul et ab Herimanno Coloniensi archipræsule magno susceptus honore, ibidem per integrum annum mansit, et Regis ex parte Imperatori suggessit ut, legatis Ungariam missis, inde fratruelem suum Eadwardum, Regis videlicet Eadmundi Ferrei Lateris filium, reduceret, Angliamque venire faceret." We now know what the King's errand was on which Ealdred was sent, and, knowing that it was to bring back the Ætheling, we might guess for ourselves why the Ætheling was to be brought back. But Florence afterwards expressly tells us this also, under the year 1057; "Decreverat enim Rex illum post se regni hæredem constituere."

That Ealdred had Abbot Ælfwine for his companion in this embassy (see p. 372), I infer from a remarkable entry in Domesday (208) which can have no other meaning. Land in Huntingdonshire is said to have been granted by Eadward "Sancto Benedicto de Ramesy, proper unum servitium quod Abbas Alwinus fecit ei in Saxoniâ." I can conceive no other service in Saxony which Ælfwine could have rendered to the King, save this share in Ealdred's mission to "Sexland." Ælfwine's former mission to Rheims is not to the purpose, as no geography can put Rheims in Saxony. Nor do I understand the remark of Sir Henry Ellis (i. 306), that we have here "an allusion to the Confessor's residence abroad before he came to the throne." What dealings had Eadward with Saxony in those days? The only difficulty is that the local historian of Ramsey, who is very full on the doings of Ælfwine, and who speaks of his going to Rheims, says nothing of his embassy to Köln. But the silence of this writer has equally to be explained on any other view of the "servitium in Saxonia."

One would like to know a little more than we do about the residence of the Æthelings in Hungary, and the position which they held there. We do not know what became of their mother Ealdgyth, whether they were accompanied by any English attendants, or whether they kept up any kind of intercourse with England. Eadmund must have died young; at least this seems to be implied by William of Malmesbury (ii. 180), who says that the children reached Hungary "ubi, dum benignè aliquo tempore habiti sunt, major diem obiit." ("Processu temporis ibidem vitam finivit," says Florence, 1017.) But William's ideas must have been a little confused, as he makes the Æthelings themselves go to Hungary ("Hunorum Regem petierunt"), as if they were capable of personal action, whereas it is plain that they were still mere babes.

William of Malmesbury also makes Eadward marry a sister of the Queen of the Hungarians. That is, I suppose, the meaning of his words, "Minor Agatham Reginæ sororem in matrimonium accepit." I have not found, in such German and Hungarian writers as I have been able to refer to, any mention of Eadward's marriage, or indeed of his sojourn in Hungary at all. But there is no doubt that the wife of Saint Stephen, who was reigning in Hungary when the Æthelings came there, and who died in 1038, was Gisla, called by the Hungarians Keisla, a sister of the Emperor Henry the Second. See Ekkehard, ap. Pertz, vi. 192. Sigebert, Chron. 1010 (ap. Pertz, vi. 354); Annalista Saxo, 1002, 1038 (Pertz, vi. 650, 682). Thwrocz, Chron. Hung. ii. 30 (Scriptt. Rer. Hung. 96). Her sister would therefore be a sister of the sainted Emperor himself, whose Imperial reign lasted from 1014 to 1024. A sister of Henry and Gisla could hardly fail to be many years older than Eadward, and we might have expected to find some record of the marriage, whereas we do not even find any sister of the Emperor Henry available for the purpose. There can be no doubt that Agatha was not a sister, but a more distant kinswoman of the Emperor, most probably a niece. The poem in the Worcester Chronicle (1057).says more vaguely, "He begeat bees Caseres mága to wife . . . seo wæs Agathes gehaten:" and so again in the later entry in 1067, "Hire [Margaret's] modor cynn gee's to Heinrice Casere, be hæfde anwald ofer Rome." Florence (1017) says more distinctly, "Eadwardus Agatham, filiam germani Imperatoris Heinrici in matrimonium accepit." Mr. Thorpe, in his note on the passage in Florence, following Suhm, makes her the daughter of the Emperor's brother Bruno, who was Bishop of Augsburg from 1007 to 1029 (Ann. Aug. ap. Pertz, iii. 124, 125). The local Annals speak of him as "beatæ memoriæ;" but he seems to have been a turbulent Prelate, and a great thorn in the side of his Imperial brother. See Ekkehard, u. s. Arnold de Sancto Emmerammo, ii. 57 (ap. Pertz, iv. 571), Adalbold, Vit. Henr. II. c. 24 (ap. Pertz, iv. 689), Adalbert, Vit. Henr. II. 20 (ap. Pertz, iv. 805, 811). genealogy be correct, later English royalty is connected with the Old-Saxon stock in an unlooked for way.

Orderic has a more amazing version than all. He makes (701 D) the Ætheling marry the daughter of Solomon, and receive the Kingdom of Hungary as her dower. He distinctly calls Eadward King of the Huns; "Hæc [Margarita] nimirum filia fuit Eduardi Regis Hunorum, qui fuit filius Edmundi cognomento Irnesidæ, fratris Eduardi Regis Anglorum, et exsul conjugem accepit cum regno filiam Salomonis Regis Hunorum."

The delay in the arrival of the Ætheling (see pp. 373, 409) was very probably caused by the wars between the Empire and the Hungarian Kings who succeeded Stephen. Before the war with Andrew mentioned in the text, Henry the Third had an earlier Hungarian war, waged against the usurper Ouban on behalf of Peter the predecessor of Andrew, by whom Peter was blinded. See Lambert, 1041—1046. On the relations between Henry, Andrew, and Conrad of Bavaria, see Hermann Contr. 1053 (ap. Pertz, v. 133), whose account, as usual, it is not easy to reconcile with the Hungarian traditions preserved by Thwrocz. But there must be something wrong when Lappenberg (517) says, "Wahrscheinlich verzögerte die zwischen dem Kaiser und dem König Andreas von Ungarn damals ausgebrochene Fehde, sowie der Tod des Letztern, und bald darauf der des Kaisers, die Ausführung dieses Planes." The Emperor died in 1056; but Andrew, who began to reign in 1047, did not die till 1060 or 1061, when he fell in battle against his brother Bela, three or four years after the return and death of Eadward in 1057. See Thwrocz, Rer. Hung. Scriptt. 108-112. Lambert, 1061.

NOTE Z. p. 379.

THE SUPPOSED ENMITY BETWEEN HAROLD AND TOSTIG.

There is absolutely nothing in any trustworthy writer to lead us to believe that there was any sort of quarrel between Harold and his brother Tostig before the Northumbrian revolt in 1065. We have seen (p. 376) that Tostig's appointment to his Earldom had, to say the least, Harold's active concurrence, and we shall find the two brothers acting as zealous fellow-workers in the great Welsh war. Even at the time of the revolt, we shall find Harold doing all that he could to reconcile Tostig with his enemies. But the fact that the result of that revolt made Tostig an enemy of his brother seems to have taken possession of the minds of legendary writers, and a myth has grown up on this subject akin to the myths which have attached themselves to so many other parts of the history of Godwine and his house.

The earliest form of the legend seems to be that which it takes in Æthelred (X Scriptt. 394). The King and Godwine are sitting at dinner—everything seems to happen when the King and Godwine are sitting at dinner—the two boys ("pueri adhuc") Harold and Tostig are playing before them, when suddenly the game becomes rather too rough ("amariùs quam expetebat ludi suavitas"), and the play is changed into a fight. Harold then, the stronger of the two, seizes his brother by the hair, throws him on the ground, and is well nigh throttling him, when Tostig is luckily carried off. The King turns to his father-in-law, and asks him whether he sees nothing more in all this than the sports or quarrels of two naughty boys. The unenlightened mind of the Earl can see nothing more. But the Saint takes the occasion to prophesy, and he foretells the war which would happen between the two brothers, and how the death of the one would be avenged by the death of the other.

This story is at all events well put together, and it makes a very fair piece of hagiology. It is however some objection to it that neither Harold nor Tostig could have been a mere boy at any time after Eadward's accession. It might be too much to think that the author of the French Life saw this difficulty, but at any rate he changes the "pueri adhuc" of Æthelred into "juvenceus pruz e hardiz" (3140). Otherwise he tells the story in exactly the same way, only enlarging with a little more of Homeric precision on the details of the violence done by Harold to his brother. But the story, like other stories, soon grew, and there is another version of it, much fuller and much more impossible, which first appears in Henry of Huntingdon (M. H. B. 761 A), and afterwards in Roger of Wendover (i. 507) and Bromton (948). The tale is now transferred to the year 1064, when Harold and Tostig were the two greatest men in the Kingdom, when Harold was probably the understood successor to the Crown, when he was at any rate in all the glory of his victories over Gruffydd. The two brothers are described as being at enmity, because, though Tostig was the elder brother, Harold was the greater personal favourite of the King ("invidiæ namque et odii fomitem ministraverat, quod, quum Tosti ipse primogenitus esset, arctiùs a rege frater suus diligeretur"). need hardly say how utterly the real position of the two brothers is here reversed. The King is dining at Windsor, where Harold acts as cup-bearer. Tostig, seeing the favour enjoyed by his brother, cannot keep himself back from pulling his hair ("non potuit cohibere manus a cæsarie fratris"). In Henry's account Harold seems to bear the insult quite patiently, but in the version of Roger of Wendover he not unnaturally lifts Tostig up in his arms and throws him violently on the floor ("in pavimentum truculenter projecit").

this the King's Thegns ("milites") rush together from all quarters, and put an end to the strife between the renowned warriors ("bellatores inclitos ab invicem diviserunt"). The King now foretells the destruction of the two brothers, but in this version he of course foretells it as something which is to happen speedily ("Rex perniciem eorum jam appropinquare prædixit, et iram Dei jam non differendam"). It is here that both Henry and Roger, and Bromton also, bring in that general complaint of the wickedness of the sons of Godwine which I have quoted elsewhere (see p. 541). Tostig now hastens to Hereford, where Harold was preparing a great feast for the King; he there kills all his brother's servants, cuts them in 'pieces, mixes their blood and flesh with the wine, ale, and mead which was made ready for the feast, and sends a message to the King that he need not bring any salted meat with him, as he will find plenty of flesh ready at Hereford. On this Eadward orders Tostig into banishment.

The one faint glimmering of truth in all this seems to be that the authors of the legend were clearly aware that in 1064 the Earldom of Herefordshire was in the hands of Harold. R. Higden (Polychronicon, lib. vi. Gale, ii. 281) tells the story in nearly the same words as the earlier form, but he places it in 1056. Knighton (2333) seemingly does the same, though he copies the words of his story from the version which makes the disputants only naughty boys. M. de Bonnechose (ii. 116, 118) seems to believe the whole story, and he makes it a subject of grave political reflexions. Mr. Woodward (History of Wales, p. 214) thinks that the cannibal doings of Tostig arise from some confusion with the doings of Caradoc at Portskewet (see above, p. 480). This is possible, but the details of the story belong to the province of Comparative Mythology. They appear again in the well known Scottish legend of the Douglas Larder.

It has sometimes struck me that a good deal of this talk is due to an exaggerated misunderstanding of one or two passages in the Biographer, where his classical vein has led him into rather wild flights. The war between brother and brother—the war, of course, of Stamfordbridge—reminds him of all the ancient tales of wars and quarrels between brothers. He twice (pp. 414, 424) breaks out into verse upon the subject, and, in both cases, the Theban legend, the war of Eteoklês and Polyneikês, not unnaturally

VOL. II.

presents itself. But he also (v. 834) talks about Cain and Abel, and, by a still more unlucky allusion, about Atreus and Thyestês. Having once got hold of these names, he goes on to tell their whole story. He personifies discord between brothers, and thus apostrophizes the evil genius;

"Priscis nota satis tua sic contagia ludis.
Invidus hic prolis fraternæ fæda Thyestes Prandia dat fratri depasto corpore nati."

Here, it strikes me, is quite raw material enough for a legend-maker. The word "ludis" may have suggested the "pueri ludentes" in Æthelred, and I have very little doubt that the mention of Thyestes (who, by the by, is made to change parts with Atreus) suggested the cannibal preparations of Tostig at Hereford.

In several of these stories we see the pervading mistake of thinking that Tostig was the elder brother. In some of them we also see the notion, which turns up in several other quarters, that Harold was the King's personal favourite and attendant, his "dapifer," "pincerna," "major domûs," or something of the kind. It is possible that Harold in his youth, during the first year or two of Eadward's reign, may have held some function of the kind, which may account for the tradition. (Cf. p. 78, note 3.) But the notion that Tostig was the elder brother (see above, p. 554) has led to far graver misrepresentations. The enmity of Tostig towards Harold, which really arose out of the revolt of Northumberland, gets mixed up with perverted accounts of Harold's election to the Orderic (492 D) seems to have fancied that Tostig was not only the eldest son of Godwine, but that Tostig, and not Harold, succeeded his father in the West-Saxon Earldom, and that by hereditary right ("patris consulatus, quem Tosticus, quia major natu erat, longo tempore sub Eduardo rege jam tenuerat"). On Harold's election as King, Tostig begins to reprove his brother for his usurpation and oppressions ("advertens Heraldi fratris sui prævalere facinus et regnum Angliæ variis gravari oppressionibus ægrè tulit"); Harold accordingly deprives him of his Earldom and banishes him. The strangest thing of all is that William of Malmesbury, who, in the proper place (ii. 200), gives a very fair account of the Northhumbrian revolt, and one highly favourable to Harold, should afterwards (iii. 252) represent Harold as banishing Tostig after his accession. After Eadward's death, he says "perstitit in incepto Haroldus ut fratrem exlegaret." Snorro (Johnstone, 192, 193. Laing, iii. 77, 78) makes Tostig the elder brother, the head Earl of the Kingdom, and the commander of the King's armies. Harold, the youngest brother, is Eadward's personal favourite, he is always about him, and—having seemingly supplanted Hugolin the Frenchman—has the care of all his treasures. Here again the real position of the two brothers is amusingly transposed. On Harold's election as King, Tostig, who had himself aspired to the Crown, is much displeased, and has sharp words with his brother. of course refuses to surrender the Crown, and, fearing the ability and popularity of Tostig, he deprives him of his command of the army and of his precedence over other Earls. Tostig, unwilling to be the subject of his brother, leaves the country of his own free will and goes to Flanders. Saxo (207) is one degree less wild, in so far as he realizes that Harold was the elder brother. version, after Harold's election, his younger brothers generally ("minores Godovini filii majorem perosi")—Gyrth and Leofwine no doubt as well as Tostig—envious of their brother's election and unwilling to submit to his authority, leave the country and seek for help abroad.

It is needless to point out how, in all these versions, the chronology is altered, as well as the whole circumstances of the story, in order to represent Harold as the oppressor of his brother. But it should be remarked that these calumnies are of a wholly different kind from the calumnies which speak of an early quarrel, and that the two in effect exclude one another. In the versions of Orderic, Saxo, and Snorro, the enmity between the brothers does not begin till after Harold's election to the Kingdom.

It may be some refreshment to wind up with the amusing version of Peter Langtoft, who, by the way, seems to have thought that Godwine was still alive in 1065. He at least has no spite against Harold; he even (p. 64 Hearne) tells the story of the murder of Gospatric, the blame of which he ventures to lay on the Lady Eadgyth ("My boke . . . sais be quene Egyn, be blame suld scho bere"); he then goes on;

"Tostus of Cumbirland retted Godwyn per tille.
Tostus of Cumbirland he was chefe Justise,
Ageyn be erle Godwyn he gert sette assise.

Gospatrike's dede on Godwyn wild he venge,
Harald souht Tostus, to leue þat ilk challenge.
He praied him for luf, in pes lat him be stille,
And kisse and be gode frende in luf and in a wille.
Tostus wild not leue, bot held on his manace,
And Harald tened withalle, of lond he did him chace."

NOTE AA. p. 391.

ÆTHELSTAN, BISHOP OF HEREFORD.

PROFESSOR STUBBS places the consecration of Æthelstan in 1012. This seems to be the right year, because in that year we find his first signature ("Æ8elstanus episcopus," Cod. Dipl. vi. 165), as well as the last signature (Cod. Dipl. iii. 357) of his predecessor Athulf—he seems always to use this contracted form. At first sight this date seems inconsistent with a document in Cod. Dipl. iv. 234, one to which I have already referred for another purpose (p. 563), in which "Epelstan Bisceop" is said to have bought lands in Worcestershire of Leofric-perhaps the famous Earl while still a private man in his father's lifetime—the purchase of which was witnessed by the two Archbishops Ælfheah and Wulfstan. Ælfheah, taken captive in September 1011 (see vol. i. p. 385), can neither have consecrated Æthelstan in 1012 nor yet have witnessed a purchase made by him in that year. The transaction spoken of in the document must belong to an earlier But the document itself was not written till long after. Many years after the purchase ("sefter bysan manegum gearum") —at some time between the accession of Cnut and the death of Ealdorman Leofwine—Wulfstan and his son Wulfric tried to disturb Æthelstan in its possession, but a compromise was come to in the Scirgemót of Worcestershire, in which Leofwine, Hakon (see p. 563), and Leofric were present.

The explanation doubtless is that, in a deed drawn up so long after, Æthelstan is spoken of by a title which belonged to him then, but which did not belong to him at the time of the purchase. As for his consecration in 1012, there seems to be no evidence as to the consecrator, but it could not have been Ælfheah.

NOTE BB. p. 416.

THE FAMILY OF LEOFRIC.

I know of no authority for any children of Leofric and Godgifu except Earl Ælfgar. It is hardly needful to refute the notion, entertained even by Sir Henry Ellis (ii. 146), that Hereward was a son of the Mercian Earl. On this score even the false Ingulf is guiltless. The mistake arose solely from a late and blundering genealogical roll, printed in the Chroniques Anglo-Normandes, ii. xii. The same roll gives Leofric a third nameless son, who was a child ("tertium parvulum cujus nomen non habetur") at the coming in of William, and was beheaded for the sake of his inheritance. Leofric died an old man in 1057; a son of his could hardly be "parvulus" in 1066. This family seems to have been picked out (see above, vol. i. p. 457) as the special sport of pedigree-makers.

Mr. C. H. Pearson (i. 367) attributes the mistake about Hereward to Sir Francis Palgrave, who is quite guiltless of it. See his History, iii. 467.

Ælfgar's wife bore the name of Ælfgifu. She appears in Domesday in a form which clearly shows that she survived the Conquest, that she retained her lands, or parts of them, but that she was dead at the time of the Survey. In Leicestershire (231 b) there is a special heading, "Terra Alvevæ Comitissæ," and in Suffolk (ii. 286 b) one of "Terra Matris Morchari Comitis." But the word used is not "tenet" but "tenuit." Cf. also Nottinghamshire, 280 b. I know not on what authority pedigree-makers affirm her to have been a Frenchwoman, sister of William Malet. If so, she must, like the Lady Emma, have changed her name at her marriage. Possibly it was a standing rule that all wives from beyond sea should take the name of Ælfgifu, as if they had come from Elfland.

Of the children of Ælfgar and Ælfgifu, their two famous or infamous sons, Eadwine and Morkere, need no mention here. The existence of a third son, Burchard (see pp. 455, 459), depends on the amount of trust which we may give to a charter preserved in the local history of Rheims, quoted by Sir Henry Ellis (i. 325); "Notum sit Algarum quemdam, Anglorum Comitem, consentiente

Edwardo Anglorum Rege, Sancto Remigio villam de Lapeleiâ dedisse pro animâ filii sui Burchardi, cujus corpus in polyandrio ecclesiæ quiescit." Lapley in Northamptonshire and other property belonged at the time of the Survey, not to "the Church of Rheims," as Sir Henry Ellis says, but to "Saint Remigius of Rheims" (Domesday, 222 b), that is, to the Abbey. The English estate, we are told, grew into a Priory. (I do not know Lapley Priory in Northamptonshire, but there was a Priory of that name in Staffordshire, much more in Ælfgar's own country, whose church survives.) Now the name Burchard (Burhhard?), though borne by several men T. R. E., can hardly be called a common English name. This name, and the apparent devotion of Ælfgar and his son to the Abbey of Rheims, are by no means enough to prove the foreign origin of Ælfgifu, but they certainly fall in with the tradition.

About the personality of Ealdgyth, daughter of Ælfgar, and wife successively of Gruffydd and Harold, there is no doubt. Florence mentions her incidentally under 1066, as the widow of Harold, and the sister of Eadwine and Morkere. She appears also in Domesday (238 b), where it is said of lands in Warwickshire belonging to Coventry Abbey, "Hanc terram tenuit Aldgid uxor Grifin." At the time of the Survey it had passed from her to Osbern of Herefordshire, who had sold it to the Abbot. William of Jumièges also says (vii. 31) that Harold "Grithfridi quoque Regis Wallorum, postquam hostilis eum gladius peremit, pulcram conjugem Aldith, præclari Comitis Algari filiam, sibi uxorem junxit." So Orderic, 492 D; "Ipse [Heraldus] Edgivam sororem corum [Edwini et Morcari] uxorem habebat, quæ priùs Gritfridi fortissimi Regis Guallorum conjunx fuerat." He goes on to say that she had borne two children to Gruffydd, "Blidenum regni successorem "—a confusion with Gruffydd's brother or kinsman Blethgent -and a daughter named Nest. Benoît de Ste. More has a very curious account of Ealdgyth (Chron. Ang. Norm. i. 178);

"Après que Heraut se fu fait Reis, Se combati od les Galeis. N'en truis ne l'achaison ne l'ire; Mais Reis Griffins, qui d'eus ert sire, Remist eu champ. Heraut l'occist, Sa femme Aldit saisi e prist, Qui fille ert del bon conte Algar.

Celi pesa c'unc à sa char
Jut n'adesa ne nuit ne jor,
Kar dame esteit de grant valor.
De grant ire ert sis cors espris
Dunc si estert sis sire occis.
En teu manière et en teu guise R'aveit Heraut femme conquise."

I need not point out the mistakes here, especially the glaring one of putting Harold's Welsh war after his election to the Kingdom. But the supposed attachment of Ealdgyth to Gruffydd rather than to Harold may be a genuine tradition, as it falls in with other indications.

Two questions here arise about Ealdgyth. Was she the "Eddeva pulcra" of Domesday? and, Was she the only daughter of Ælfgar? Sir Henry Ellis (ii. 79) argues at length that she is "Eddeva pulcra," in opposition to Mr. Sharon Turner, who identifies that Eddeva with Eadgyth Swanneshals. There is no very distinct evidence, but I rather incline to the latter belief, which I shall have to speak of again. As for the other question, Orderic (511 B) distinctly calls Ealdgyth the only daughter of Ælfgar. But his account is very confused; he not only leaves out Burchard, but he confounds Ælfgar with his father Leofric, and makes Godgifu Ælfgar's wife His words are, "Devoti Deo dignique relinstead of his mother. ligionis laude parentes elegantem et multa laude dignam ediderunt sobolem, Eduinum, Morcarum, et unam filiam nomine Aldit, quæ primo nupsit Guitfrido Regi Guallorum, post cujus mortem sociata est Heraldo Regi Anglorum." But the genealogy of Leofric's family which I have already spoken of (vol. i. p. 456. See also Ellis, i. 490) gives Ælfgar a daughter Lucy, who, though unknown to Domesday, inherited the lands of the family ("obtinuit Lucia soror eorum terras paternas"), and who was married, first, in the Conqueror's time, to Ivo Taillebois, then, in the time of Henry the First, to Roger Fitzgerald, lastly, in the time of Stephen, to She had a son by each of the last two Ranulf, Earl of Chester. The chronology is as amazing as the whole chronology husbands. of this pedigree. A woman whose father died before 1065 is made to bear a son at some time between 1135 and 1154. There was undoubtedly a Lucy, who did marry in succession Roger Fitzgerald and Earl Randolf (Ord. Vit. 871 B), and who was the mother of the Earl's son William Randolf (an early case of a double name), and who was alive in 1141 (ib. 921 B); but I know of nothing to connect her either with Ivo Taillebois or with the house of Leofric. Lucy, as the name of an Englishwoman in the eleventh century, is as impossible as Rowena or Ulrica, unless indeed the French origin of her mother is again called in. The false Ingulf is, I need not say, great on the subject of Ivo and Lucy, and the legend is still swallowed by novelists and local antiquaries. But it is truly amazing to find Sir Francis Palgrave, who was the first to scotch the Crowland snake, in the same company (iii. 472).

Godgifu herself, the grandmother of so many of our characters, is shown to have survived the Conquest, but to have died before the Survey, by the same evidence which proves the like in the case of her daughter-in-law Ælfgifu. Her lands in Leicestershire (231 b) and Warwickshire (239 b) are entered in exactly the same form as those of the wife of Ælfgar. See also Nottinghamshire (280 b), where she appears in company, among others, with Ælfgifu and with "Goda Comitissa," that is, her own namesake the sister of Eadward, and mother of Ralph of Hereford. But I cannot but think that some of the entries in Staffordshire (248 b, 249) refer to some other Godgifu. In the entries of which I have spoken, including one immediately following (249 b), she is called reverentially "Godeva Comitissa;" here we simply read "Godeva tenuit et libera fuit;" "Hanc tenuit Godeva etiam post adventum Regis W. in Angliam, sed recedere non potuit cum terra." Surely this cannot be the widow, mother, and grandmother of successive Earls of the Mercians.

I may notice that Godgifu, Ælfgifu, and other wives of Earls, are in Domesday, as in Norman writings generally, freely called "Comitissa." But I have not found any English equivalent for that title. "Lady" is reserved for the King's wife; an Earl's wife seems to be simply called the Earl's wife and nothing else.

NOTE CC. p. 417.

HAROLD THE SON OF RALPH.

HAROLD the son of Ralph occurs in Domesday, 129 b, 169, 177, 244. His lands lay in the shires of Gloucester, Worcester, Warwick, and Middlesex, not, oddly enough, where we should have most naturally looked for them, in Herefordshire. In the list of Normans in Duchèsne, p. 1023, he is called Lord of Sudeley. There can however be no doubt that Ewias Harold is called after him. There is nothing to connect that place with Harold the son of Godwine. At the Survey (Domesday, 186) the castle of Ewias was held of the King by Ælfred of Marlborough. It seems to have been granted to him by William Fitz-Osbern, who had restored ("refirmaverat") it. Its later history, and that of the descendants of Harold, I leave to local inquirers, but it is worth asking whether he was the father of the person described in the Gesta Stephani (931 B) as "Robertus, filius Heraldi, vir stemmatis ingenuissimi." As Robert was a fighter against the Welsh, it seems not unlikely.

I assume that Harold the son of Ralph must have been a different person from Harold the Staller, who is mentioned in Domesday for Lincolnshire (337; cf. 340 b and 350 b). Ralph had possessions in that part of England (337), but, if Harold had been Ralph's son, the connexion could hardly fail to have been mentioned there, as it is elsewhere. A mere lad also would hardly have been invested with a Stallership. There are several other Harolds distinct alike from Harold the King, Harold the Staller, and Harold the son of Ralph. Such is "Harold...homo Eluui hiles, qui poterat ire quo volebat," in the Domesday for Gloucestershire (170). Cf. 288 for a Harold at Warwick who kept his property under William. There are other small entries in the same name.

That Harold must have been very young when his father died is shown by the entry attached to his Middlesex property (129 b), which shows that, in 1066, he was under the wardship of the Lady Eadgyth; "Hoc manerium tenuit Heraldus filius Radulfi Comitis, quem custodiebat Regina Eddid cum manerio eâ die quâ Rex Edwardus fuit vivus et mortuus." What follows might seem to imply that the Lady did not prove a very faithful guardian; at any rate young Harold lost the lordship; "Postea Willelmus camerarius tenuit de Reginâ in feudo pro tribus libris per annum de firmâ, et post mortem Reginæ [1074] eodem modo tenuit de Rege."

We may perhaps infer that Harold's mother Gytha was dead. She appears ("Gethe uxor Radulfi Comitis," "Gueth Comitissa," 148) as a landowner in Buckinghamshire in Eadward's time, but she had nothing at the time of the Survey. The names Gytha and Harold probably point to a connexion by affinity, spiritual or otherwise, with the House of Godwine. Or is it conceivable that this Gytha is the same as Gytha, daughter of Osgod Clapa, and, no doubt long before this time, widow of Tofig the Proud (see vol. i. p. 591)? In any case, the names show that Ralph, with all his contempt for English tactics, had so far identified himself with England as to take a wife of English or Danish birth.

NOTE DD. p. 424.

THE QUASI-ROYAL POSITION OF EARL HAROLD.

THE indications referred to in the text are all slight when taken separately; still I cannot help thinking that their cumulative force is considerable.

1. There is a charter of Ealdred in Cod. Dipl. iv. 172, in which, after the signatures, among which are those of the King and Earl Harold, we find the formula, "Cum licentia Eadwardi Regis et Haroldi Ducis." In earlier charters, as those of Bishop Oswald, it is common to find the consent of the King and of the Ealdorman expressed in the body of the deed; but this is a different case, as the charter relates to matters in Worcestershire, which was not in Harold's Earldom. Another charter of 1065 (Cod. Dipl. iv. 162), which Mr. Kemble marks as doubtful, gives Harold the title of "Dei gratia Dux." The King is also "Dei gratia," and the Lady is "Dei pietate;" but no such titles are given to any one else.

I ought to mention that this charter, though not marked as doubtful by Mr. Kemble, has something wrong about it which needs explanation. It is signed by Ealdred as Archbishop, which he became in 1060, and by Walter as Bishop, which he became in 1061; but it is also signed by Earl Leofric, who died in 1057. There is however no need to believe that the charter is spurious. Transcribers often added a description to a simple signature, so that a charter, as we have it, often has its witnesses described, not by the titles which they bore at the time, but by higher titles which they bore afterwards. But, even if both documents are spurious, I still think that they prove something. A forger, unless he lived very near the time, would have no temptation to invent anything in favour of Harold. He must have imitated some genuine formula.

2. Nothing can be stronger than the way in which Florence couples together the King and the Earl in describing the homage of the Welsh Princes in 1064 or 1065; "Rex... cui et Haroldo Comiti fidelitatem illi juraverunt, et ad imperium illorum mari terrâque se fore paratos." This reminds one of Hugh Capet and his son Robert (see vol. i. p. 269), or of any other case of joint sovereignty. This language of so discreet a writer as Florence is different from the Biographer's rhetorical coupling of Eadward and Tostig quoted in p. 618.

- 3. The description of Harold as "Dux Anglorum" in the Bayeux Tapestry is well known. See vol. i. pp. 179, 289. We have indeed elsewhere come across "Algarus quidam, Comes Anglorum" (see p. 629), but the "quidam" makes a great difference.
- 4. Far stronger however than all is the title given to Harold by Florence when describing his election to the Crown. He is then "Subregulus Haroldus, Godwini Ducis filius." The "Subregulus" is surely meant to be something more than the "Dux." In fact "Subregulus," "Undercyning," is a title which is most familiarly given to vassal Princes, as to those who attended Eadgar at Chester (Flor. Wig. 973), and to Gruffydd himself (Chron. Ab. 1056). But I know of no instance of such a title being ever given to any mere subject except Harold, unless a parallel is sought in the strange East-Anglian titles quoted in vol. i. p. 289. But I cannot think that the description of "Half-King" was meant as a serious title.

NOTE EE. p. 430.

HAROLD'S FOREIGN TRAVELS AND PILGRIMAGE.

The pilgrimage of Harold to Rome, and, still more, his investigations into the political state of Gaul, are among the additions to our knowledge which we owe to the Biographer of Eadward. The latter most remarkable piece of information is wholly new; with regard to the pilgrimage, the Biographer only confirms a statement which we might otherwise have set down as doubtful.

The words of the writer of the De Inventione may be taken as implying, though not directly asserting, extensive foreign travels on the part of Harold. When speaking of the relics given by the Earl to his church at Waltham, he calls him (c. 14), "In diversis terrarum partibus non segnis conquisitor"—namely of relics and such like treasures. The romantic biographer of Harold, speaking of the same relics, distinctly asserts (p. 182) that some of them were obtained by the Earl on a pilgrimage to Rome; "Adierat quidem antea, nondum videlicet Anglorum consequutus regnum, limina Christi Apostolorum," &c. This is the sort of point on which even so romantic a writer as Harold's biographer was likely to preserve a bit of trustworthy tradition; still one would hardly have ventured to assert the fact on his sole authority. The Life of Eadward has now put the fact of the pilgrimage beyond doubt, and it has also shown that Harold's journeys in other parts of the world were not wholly owing to a desire of collecting relics. This is a good illustration of the way in which truth sometimes lurks in very suspicious quarters.

The fact of the pilgrimage then is certain; at its date we can only guess. All the Chronicles, oddly enough, are silent about the pilgrimage of Harold, though that of Tostig is carefully recorded. But there are several indications which may lead us to a probable conjecture. If the Biographer of Eadward pays the least regard to chronology, Harold's journey took place after Gyrth's appointment to his Earldom, which we have seen reason to fix in 1057, and before Tostig's pilgrimage, which the Worcester Chronicle fixes to 1061. If we may at all trust Harold's biographer, which, for the nonce, it seems that we may, the journey took place before the consecration at Waltham in 1060. We have thus two years to choose from, 1058 and 1059, and two considerations will, I think, lead us to fix on the former of the two. That was the year in which Ælfgar (see p. 434) was outlawed for the second time, and almost immediately returned to his Earldom by force. violent doings seem to point to a time when the powers of government were relaxed, as they doubtless would be, by the absence of Harold. Again, the grant of the pallium to Stigand, who, it should be remembered, did not go for it in person, seems to point to a time when some unusually strong influence, such as the personal presence of the great Earl, could be brought to bear on the Papal mind. There is then no direct proof, but there is, I think, a strong probability, that this remarkable journey on the part of Harold took place in the year 1058.

The question of the oath I shall examine in the next volume. I will here only quote in full, without professing to understand every word of it, the passage from the Biographer (p. 410) which describes Harold's political studies in Gaul; "At ille superior [Haroldus] mores, consilia, et vires Gallicorum principum, non tam per suos quam per se, scrutatus, astutia et callido animi ingenio et diuturniori cum procrastinatione intentissime notaverat, ut in eis habitaturus esset, si eis opus haberet in alicujus negotii administratione. Adeò quoque consilio suo exhaustos pernoverat, ut nulla ab eis relatione falli posset. Attentiùs ergo considerata Francorum consuetudine, quum ipse quoque apud eos non obscuri esset nominis et famæ, Romam ad confessionem Apostolorum processit." I conceive that the general sense is what I said in the text, but the passage is most obscure, no doubt purposely obscure. To have set forth Harold's negotiations in France in a clear light would not have suited either the position or the plan of the Biographer. Writing under William, to Eadgyth, he never mentions William's name, or even alludes to him in any intelligible way. The words which I have put in Italics are the hardest to understand of all. Do they imply that Harold formed, or contemplated, alliances with any French Princes, say with the Count of Anjou or with the King himself, in case mutual support against William should ever be needed?

NOTE FF. p. 449.

THE QUARREL BETWEEN EARL HAROLD AND BISHOP GISA.

THE original account of the matters in dispute between Harold and Gisa will be found, in Gisa's own words, in the Historiola de Primordiis Episcopatûs Somersetensis, printed in Hunter's Ecclesiastical Documents, p. 15. Gisa's narrative grows into a far more violent account in the local history of Wells, by a Canon of that Church in the fifteeenth century, printed in Anglia Sacra, i. 559. Lastly, we get the story with further improvements in Godwin's Lives of the Bishops and other later works. The whole matter is well discussed, and gone into most thoroughly, by Mr. J. R. Green in the Transactions of the Somersetshire Archæological and Natural History Society, 1863-4, p. 148, a paper which has suggested several points in the present note.

That the King who made the original grant to Duduc was Cnut is plain from the words of Gisa, who speaks of them as Duduc's private property obtained before he became Bishop ("possessiones quas hæreditario jure a rege ante episcopatum promeruerat"). Duduc became Bishop in 1033. It is difficult to understand how the Abbey of Gloucester could have formed part of the grant, or how this statement is to be reconciled with the local history of Gloucester referred to in p. 435. Gisa goes on to say that, when Harold took the other property, Gloucester was granted to Stigand ("præfatum monasterium injustâ ambitione a Rege sibi dari petiit [Stigandus] et impetratum ad horam obtinuit." On Abbeys held by Stigand see Hist. Eliens. ii. 41, Gale 514). Gloucester therefore has no further connexion with the story, which turns wholly on the possessions in Somersetshire. These were the two lordships of Banwell and Congresbury. There were also relics, church-plate, and books. These moveable goods, we may perhaps guess, found their way to Waltham.

The grant of Duduc to the Church of Wells is described in these words; "[possessiones] roboratas cyrographis Regize auctoritatis ac donationis Deo Sanctoque Andreæ tempore Edwardi piissimi Regi obtulit"). Gisa then records what seems to be an oral bequest of the moveable property made by Duduc on his death-bed ("jam imminente die vocationis suæ adhibuit"). Duduc dies and is buried, and the story goes on ;—"Haroldus verò, tunc temporis Dux Occidentalium Saxonum, non solum terras invadere, verum etiam episcopalem sedem omnibus his spoliare non timuit." There is nothing in Gisa's narrative to imply that Harold seized any part of the ancient possessions of the See, but only the new gifts of Gisa then goes on to mention the poor estate in which he found his Church, the small number of the Canons, and their wide departure from the strictness of Lotharingian discipline. help him in his schemes of reform, he begged certain lands of the King and the Lady, namely Wedmore, the scene of the famous peace between Ælfred and Guthrum (see vol. i. p. 48), and the lordships of Mark and Mudgeley in the same neighbourhood. Much about these gifts, and about other possessions and acquisitions of Gisa, will be found in the charters in Cod. Dipl. iv. 163, 195, 196, 197, 198, 199, 257, charters addressed to Harold, and in which the restoration of anything taken from the See is commanded. (See Mr. Green, p. 154.) But there is no mention of either Banwell or Congresbury, except in the manifestly spurious document in iv. 163, on which see especially Mr. Green's note, p. 153. Gisa then goes on to say that he excommunicated one Alsie (Ælfsige?) who detained from the See the lordship of Winesham (see Domesday, 89 b), even after it was adjudged to the See by the Scirgemót ("judicium provincialium"). He then mentions his intention, never carried into effect, of excommunicating Harold himself ("Haroldum etiam Ducem, qui Ecclesiam mihi comissam spoliaverat, nunc secretò nunc palam correctum, pari sententià cogitabam ferire"). Harold, after his election to the Crown, promises to restore the disputed lordships and to grant others as well ("non solum ea quæ tulerat se redditurum verum etiam ampliora spopondit daturum"). With this statement must be compared Harold's writ in favour of Gisa in Cod. Dipl. iv. 305, where all the Bishop's rights and possessions are confirmed to him in the strongest language, but without the mention of any particular places. Gisa then tells us how, after William's accession, he made his complaint to the new King and obtained the restoration of Winesham. He goes on to mention his acquisition of Combe (p. 18) and other places, but he says nothing about Congresbury and Banwell, the lordships originally in dispute. But we learn their disposal from Domesday. Both are entered there as being held by Harold T. R. E. At the time of the Survey, Congresbury (Domesday, 87) was held by the King, except some portions which had been alienated to different persons, Gisa himself, possibly in his personal character, being among them. Banwell (89 b) was held by the Bishop. It is plain then that the whole controversy with Harold, as far as real property was concerned, related to these two lordships. There is nothing about any other property of the See, nothing to imply that the poverty of the Canons of which Gisa so feelingly complains was in any way caused by the Earl's occupation of Banwell and Congresbury. The story is plainly one of disputed right to those two lordships and to the moveable goods of Duduc.

Gisa of course tells his own story in his own way. But he tells it without any special reviling of Harold. Mr. Green goes very minutely into the credibility of his story, but I do not think that he convicts the Bishop of any gross misrepresentation. We must take Gisa's statement as we find it; we must judge as we can of his honesty and of his means of information. There is no direct confirmation and no direct contradiction of his tale. Duduc's deed of gift does not exist; in none of the many charters of Eadward relating to Gisa's affairs is there any mention of any quarrel between him and Harold; in fact there is no mention of the disputed lordships at all.

There is no record of any appeal made by Gisa to the King, nor does he himself distinctly state that he made any. On the other hand, Gisa's story draws some slight confirmation from the fact that Banwell does seem to have been granted to the See by William. Harold's own charter in Cod. Dipl. iv. 305 may be taken in two ways. Its tone, as Mr. Green says, is quite friendly. It may be a mere guaranty of Gisa against Ælfsige or any other possible enemies. But I think it is more likely that Harold, at a time when it was his interest to conciliate everybody, tried to conciliate Gisa by a grant of the disputed lands, that his intention was hindered by his death, and afterwards partially carried out by William. But anyhow Gisa's own story does not imply any fraud or violence on the part of Harold. It is simply a story of a disputed claim to certain lands and goods. The tale takes a very different shape in later writers.

Thus, in the story given by the Canon of Wells (Ang. Sacr. i. 559) we find quite another state of things. First of all, the poor estate of the Church of Wells, and the small number of its Canons, are attributed to the spoliations of Harold, an idea which Gisa's story does not even suggest; "Hic [Giso] invenit tantum decem [later writers seem to have read "quinque"—either of the numbers complained of as being small might startle modern legislators and modern residentiaries] canonicos in Ecclesia Wellensi, tam bouis mobilibus et ornamentis ecclesiasticis quam possessionibus ad ecclesiam suam spectantibus per Haroldum Comitem Cantiæ et Westsexiæ spoliatos et publicæ mendicitati subjectos"). He then records the gifts of Eadward and Eadgyth, as also Harold's accession to the Crown, which is told in true Norman fashion. The first act of the new King is to confiscate all the possessions of Gisa and the Church of Wells ("Is statim omnes possessiones dicti Gisonis et Canonicorum Wellensis Ecclesiæ perpetim confiscavit"). His death and the William then Conquest of England are of course the punishment. restores all that Harold took, "exceptis Congresburye, Banewell et Kilmington et plurimis aliis."

Even in this account we have wandered a good way from Gisa's own tale. There is something amusing in the exception to William's restoration – Congresbury and Banwell, the only places in dispute, and Kilmington and other places of which Gisa tells us nothing. William is made to restore precisely those lands of which the See had always kept undisputed possession. But there are greater things in store. In the sixteenth century it was found out that Gisa's autobiography and Harold's writ were both of them mistaken, and that Harold not only robbed the church of Wells, but drove its Bishop into banishment. Here is the story as told by Bishop Godwin, Catalogue of Bishops, p. 291. Gisa is consecrated at Rome—then

641

"At his returne, he found the estate of his Church very miserable; Harald the Queene's brother that afterwards became for a while king of England, being yet a private man, upon what occasion I know not, had spoyled the Church of all ornaments, chased away the Canons, and invading all the possessions of the same, had converted them to his owne use: so that the Canons remaining which fled not for feare of this tyrant (they were onely five) they (I say) were faine to beg their bread. The Bishop complaining unto the King of this outragious havocke, found cold comfort at his hands: For, whether it were for feare of Harald's power or his wives displeasure, he caused no restitution at all to be made. Onely the Queene was content to give of her owne, Mark and Modesly unto the Church. After the death of King Edward, Gisa was faine to fly the land, till such time as Harald the sacrilegious usurper being vanquished and slaine, William the Conqueror was a meane to restore, not only him to his place and countrey, but his Church also to all that the other had violently taken from it, except some small parcels that (I know not by what meanes) had been conveighed unto the Monastery of Glocester."

(Quid Domini facient, audent qui talia servi?)

Here we have simple romance; a later writer has attempted something like philosophy. The local historian of Somersetshire, Collinson (iii. 378), boldly connects the story of Gisa with the banishment of Godwine and the descent of Harold at Porlock. At the same time, though Harold's conduct is pronounced to be "outrageous," it is made out to be simply taking possession of his own goods. But the worthy antiquary shall set forth his special revelation in his own words;

"On his entry into his diocese, he found the estates of the church in a sad condition; for Harold earl of Wessex, having with his father, Godwin earl of Kent, been banished the kingdom, and deprived of all his estates in this county by King Edward, who bestowed them on the church of Wells, had in a piratical manner made a descent in these parts, raised contributions among his former tenants, spoiled the church of all its ornaments, driven away the canons, invaded their possessions, and converted them to his own Bishop Giso in vain expostulated with the King on this outrageous usage; but received from the Queen, who was Harold's sister, the manors of Mark and Mudgley, as a trifling compensation for the injuries which his bishoprick had sustained. Shortly after [after 1060] Harold was restored to King Edward's favour, and made his captain-General; upon which he in his turn procured the banishment of Giso, and when he came to the crown, resumed most of those estates of which he had been deprived. Bishop Giso continued in banishment till the death of Harold, and the advancement of the Conqueror to the throne, who in the second year of his reign restored all Harold's estates to the church of Wells, except some small parcels which had been conveyed to the monastery of Gloucester; in lieu of which he gave the manor and advowson of Yatton, and the manor of Winsham."

One is inclined to ask with Henry the Second (Gir. Camb. Exp. Hib. i. 40. p. 290 ed. Dimock), "Queere a rustico illo utrum hoc somniaverit?" But these things have their use. Every instance of the growth of a legend affords practice in the art of distinguishing legend from history. And, in this special case, the difference between the popular version and the real contemporary statement may lead us to weigh somewhat carefully all charges of outrageous sacrilege, whether it is Harold, William, or any one else against whom they are brought. The lay lion constantly wants a painter, and I know not that he ever finds one, save when we have the quarrel between Godwine and Robert (see above, p. 547) described by the friendly Biographer.

On this story of Gisa's I may make two further incidental remarks. Combe, one of the lordships added by Gisa to his see, was bought by him of Azor—"a quodam meo parochiano Arsere"—which no doubt should be Atsere—"dicto." Its former possession by Azor is witnessed also by Domesday 89. We have seen (p. 510) that there was at least two bearers of this singular name, a name equally singular whether its owner were an Englishman or a foreigner. Others, or the same, occur in Lincolnshire (337), distinguished as "Azer f. Sualevæ," and "Azer f. Burg.," and in Buckinghamshire (147 b) as "Azor filius Toti." One among these Azors certainly left three sons, who bore the foreign names of Goscelin, William, and Henry (Domesday 53 and 216b). The last of these names, unknown in England, was equally so in Normandy, till William bestowed it on his youngest son. An "Adzurus" signs the Waltham Charter (Cod. Dipl. iv. 159) with the title of "Regis dapifer." But the curious thing is the number of times in which we find the name of Azor connected with the buying and selling of land, both under Eadward and under William. Here Gisa buys Combe of Azor; we have already (p. 546) seen Godwine buy Woodchester of Azor. On the other hand we read in Domesday (35 b) of Azor buying lands in Surrey, "quam unus liber homo tenuit sub Rege E., sed pro quâdam necessitate suâ vendidit Azori T. R. Willelmi." We have already seen two Azors benefactors to Westminster, and in Domesday (34) we find one of them a benefactor to the Abbey of Chertsey; "Ipsa Abbatia tenet Henlei. Azor tenuit donec obiit, et dedit Ecclesiæ pro anima sua, tempore Regis W., ut dicunt monachi, et inde habent brevem Regis." In the words in Italics we see the germs of a possible controversy.

This Azor, or these Azors, though of no direct importance in history, awaken a certain interest through their incidental connexion with greater men, and it would be quite worth the while of local inquirers in the counties where their lands lay to search out any further details about them.

The other point is this. I suggested in the text (p. 450) that the estates of a foreigner dying without heirs would probably go to the King. This, if not an universal, was certainly a local custom. Among the customs of the town of Oxford (Domesday 154b) we read, "Si quis extraneus in Oxeneford manere deligens et domum habens sine parentibus ibi vitam finierit, Rex habebat quidquid reliquerit." "Extraneus" may possibly mean simply a "foreigner" in the sense of a non-burgess, but, if he were a non-Englishman, the case would be stronger still.

NOTE GG. p. 467.

ÆLFWIG ABBOT OF NEW MINSTER.

THERE is certainly something startling in the notion of a brother of Godwine and uncle of Harold, if he wished for ecclesiastical preferment at all, having to wait for it till the year 1063. But the evidence, though piecemeal, looks, at first sight, like it. an Abbot of New Minster died at Senlac, and that his house therefore lay for a while under William's heavy displeasure, are facts which have long been known, and which I shall have to speak of in their proper places. But one of the authorities for the statement, the Manuscript called "Destructio Monasterii de Hida," printed in the Monasticon of 1682, i. 210, and in the New Monasticon, ii. 437, makes this Abbot an uncle of Harold; "Rex Haroldus habuit avunculum nomine Godwynum, Abbatem de Hydå." The writer then goes on to speak of the Abbot joining his nephew's muster at the battle. It would not do to press the word "avunculus" in its classical sense, and to make the Abbot a brother of Gytha. The purely English name Godwine was most unlikely to be borne by a son of Thorgils Sprakaleg. "Avunculus" must be taken in the sense of "patruus," and the difficulty of Godwine having a brother bearing his own name is taken away when, from another local manuscript, referred to, though not fully printed in the Monasticon, ii. 428, we find that the Abbot's real name was I have to thank Mr. Edwards, the not Godwine, but Ælfwig. Editor of the Liber de Hyda, for the following extract from the manuscript Annales de Hyda. The list of Abbots of New Minster, during the time with which I am concerned, stands thus;

"1021. Alnothus.

1035. Alwyus.

1057. Alfnotus.

1063. Alwyus, frater Godwyni Comitis.

1066. Alwyus occiditur, et vacavit hæc ecclesia ii. annis." Cf. Edwards, Liber de Hydâ, p. xxxvii.

Here we plainly have Ælfwig, brother of Earl Godwine, appointed Abbot in 1063. The writer of the "Destructio" probably meant to write something like "avunculum, nomine Alwynum, fratrem Comitis Godwyni," and the two similar endings got jumbled together. There is another case in which the name Godwine has been written instead of another name in Domesday (146), where a Thegn is described as "homo Goduini cilt Abbatis Westmonasteriensis," meaning of course Abbot Eadwine (see p. 509). But here another question arises. The alternation of the names Ælfnoth and Ælfwig in the list of Abbots suggests the conjecture that we have here a case of a man-or rather two menresigning his office and taking it again. We have seen other examples in the case of Archbishop Eadsige (pp. 68, 113) and of Bishop Hermann (pp. 405, 406). If so, Ælfwig was first appointed in 1035, a much more likely time for the first promotion of a brother of Godwine than 1063. But, on the other hand, the fact that only the second entry of the name "Alwyus" has the addition "frater Godwyni Comitis," may be taken as distinguishing the Ælfwig of 1063 from the Ælfwig of 1035. Taken alone it certainly looks that way, but it is hardly conclusive. This point I do not undertake to decide; but I think we have quite evidence enough for the existence of an Ælfwig, Abbot of New Minster, uncle of King Harold and dying by his side.

If the "Annales" did not distinctly call him "frater Godwyni Comitis," I should have been tempted to identify this Abbot Ælfwig, uncle of Harold, with the Ælfric, kinsman of Godwine, who was elected to the see of Canterbury in 1050 (see p. 119). The word "avunculus" is sometimes used rather laxly, and it might perhaps mean what is sometimes called a "Welsh uncle," that is the first cousin of a parent. Moreover the Biographer now and then stumbles in his English names, as when he calls Leofwine, Leofric. But the description of Ælfwig as Godwine's brother seems to exclude this. And if the two Ælfwigs are the same, it is impossible, as, in 1050, Ælfwig would be Abbot of New Minster, when Ælfric was a monk of Christ Church. Still one would like, if one could, to find a career for a man of whom all that we know is that he once came so near to eminence as the Ælfric of 1050.

NOTE HH. p. 482.

THE REVOLT OF NORTHUMBERLAND.

WITH regard to the events which led to the banishment of Tostig, we have to make the same sort of comparison of authorities which we made in describing the banishment and the return of Godwine. Our fullest accounts are found in the Worcester Chronicle, in Florence, and in the Life of Eadward. Some further details are supplied by the Abingdon and Peterborough Chronicles and by William of Malmesbury. As usual, the Chroniclers look on the matter from the point of view of the nation, the Biographer looks on it from the point of view of the Court. Each therefore, as in other cases, fills up gaps in the other. We must also remember that the Biographer lies under the necessity of making out as fair a case as he can for Eadward, Harold, and Tostig all at once. But, writing as he did to Eadgyth, his chief object was to say all that could be said on behalf of Tostig. It is in the Life then that we must look for the fullest account of the doings and feelings of Eadward and Tostig, while the Chroniclers give us the fullest account of the doings of the Northumbrian people. Florence seems to have given special attention to the early part of the story, and he has, as in some other cases, preserved the names of individual actors who are not mentioned elsewhere. William of Malmesbury, as he has often done before, helps us to reports of speeches, either traditionally remembered or which he himself thought were in character. Even in this latter aspect, these speeches are worthy of attention, as they never take those rhetorical and other impossible shapes which are often taken by the harangues in Orderic and elsewhere.

The first point where the different narratives show their peculiar characters in such a shape as to amount to a contradiction, is found with regard to the whereabouts of Tostig at the time of the revolt. The Worcester and Peterborough Chronicles do not say where he was; William of Malmesbury (ii. 200), probably writing with the Peterborough Chronicle before him, fancied that Tostig was at York, or at least somewhere in Northumberland, and he seemingly mistook the force of the word "utlagodon," as he expands it into "solitarium repertum ex regione fugârunt, pro contuitu ducatûs occidendum non arbitrati." But the Abingdon Chronicler, writing within the bounds of Wessex, mentions the name of a place which was more likely to be known to him than to his Mercian brethren; "Tostig wæs þa æt Brytfordan mid þam kinge." The Biographer, still more accurately, quarters them (422) in some of the forests of the neighbourhood, whence they afterwards go to Bretford to hold the Gemót.

With regard to the doings of the rebel Gemôt of York, Florence distinguishes the acts of the two days more accurately than any of the Chroniclers. He alone distinguishes the executions, unjust or otherwise, of Amund and Reavenswart on the Monday, from the mere massacre of Tuesday. The Chroniclers run the events of both days together. In the words of Peterborough and Worcester, the Northumbrians "utlagodon heora eorl Tostig and ofslogon his hiredmenn ["huskarlas" in Abingdon] ealle pa hi mihton to cuman, æger ge Englisce ge Dænisce." Florence, after describing the death of the two officers, goes on, "die sequenti plus quam cc. viros ex curialibus [hiredmenn] illius in boreali parte Humbræ fluminis ["Humbra" must mean the Ouse] peremerunt." Then follows the plundering of the treasury, which is much the same in all accounts. But the Biographer naturally waxes more indignant and rhetorical in his description of the massacre. he tells us (421), took the opportunity to slay their private enemies ("nullus ergo modus fit in occasione; rapitur hic et ille ad necem etiam pro familiari odio cujusque"). That the movement extended beyond Northumberland is not implied either by the Abingdon Chronicler or by Florence, whose story at this point becomes rather meagre, but it comes out in the Worcester and Peterborough Chroniclers, as also in the Biographer, though in two very different shapes. From the two Chroniclers we learn the adhesion of the shires of Nottingham, Derby, and Lincoln to the rebel cause, but it is only the Biographer who asserts a massacre anywhere but at York. "Fit cædes," he says, "multorum in Eboraca, vel Lincolnia civitate, in plateis, in aquis, in silvis, et in viis." Every one who had heen at any time in Tostig's service ("quicumque poterat notari quod de ejus aliquando fuerit curià") was everywhere put to death without mercy. This all may be or may not be, but though we can quite understand that the men of the Danish shires of Mercia might sympathize with their Northumbrian brethren, one can hardly fancy that many of Tostig's Housecarls would be found at Lincoln.

But the most important difference between our several accounts is to be found in the different statements as to the place where the negotiations took place between the King and the rebels. Chroniclers of course give the fullest accounts of the doings of the insurgents, while the Biographer enlarges most fully on the counsels of the King. To judge from him only (422), we should think that all the negotiations took place at Oxford ("Axonevorde oppidum"), while from the Worcester and Peterborough Chroniclers, it would seem that all took place at Northampton. But the Abingdon Chronicler, followed by Florence, distinguishes between two assemblies, one at each place ("and be wel rate baræfter was mycel gemot set Northamtune, and swa set Oxenaforda"). The Biographer sets forth the various messages which were sent by the King, and he naturally thinks chiefly of the place where the matter was finally settled, namely at Oxford. The minds of the two Mercian Chroniclers were no less naturally fixed on Northampton and the ravages which happened in its neighbourhood. Nothing is more likely than that, while messages were passing to and fro, the Northhumbrian host should advance, and take up their head-quarters at Oxford instead of at Northampton. I therefore accept the Abingdon account, and hold that the final Gemôt on the feast of Saint Simon and Saint Jude was held at Oxford.

The repeated messages which passed between the King and the rebels seem implied in the words of the Abingdon Chronicler, who recognizes the gathering at Northampton as well as that at Oxford as a "mycel gemót." The Biographer is still more express; "Rex Eadwardus, vir Deo dignus, putans indomitum vulgus solità sedare sapientià, pia per legatos illis mittit mandamina, ut scilicet quiescerent ab inceptà dementià et jus legemque reciperent de omni quam in eum demonstrare possent injurià" (see pp. 491, 136). Then comes the answer of the rebels, then come further messages from the King ("Quum benignissimus rex item et tertiò missis legationibus eos ab insanà intentione diverso conciliorum conatu amovere tentaret, nec perficeret"); the King then goes from the woods to Bretford ("a silvestribus locis ubi more suo caussà assiduse venationis morabatur, secessit ad Brethevorde regium vicum oppidoque regio Wiltuni proximum"), and there holds the council at which the royal answer to the rebels is finally determined on. The Biographer does not mention Harold personally, but all the Chroniclers and Florence describe him as being at the head of the embassy. The answer of the rebels is given "Haroldo West-Saxonum Duci et aliis quos Rex Tostii rogatu pro pace redintegrandâ ad eos miserat." William of Malmesbury alone makes Harold go with an army "ut propulsaret injuriam." This is probably a confusion with Eadward's later anxiety to send a military force against the rebels. Harold would doubtless take some Housecarls with him for safety's sake; but what he headed was clearly an embassy and not a military expedition.

In the answer sent by the insurgents to the King, I have followed William of Malmesbury, as the sentiments which he puts into their mouths so exactly suit the circumstances of the case. When he begins "Northanhimbri, licet non inferiores numero essent, tamen quieti consulentes," he is to some extent led away by his notion of Harold having come with an army, but the matter of the answer is thoroughly in character; "Factum apud eum excusant; se homines liberè natos, liberè educatos, nullius Ducis ferociam pati pósse, a majoribus didicisse aut libertatem aut mortem." The Biographer evidently colours in the opposite direction; at the same time the conditional threat of war made by the rebels sounds authentic; "Deo itaque Regique suo rebelles, spreta pietatis legatione, remandant Regi, aut eumdem Ducem suum citiùs à se et à toto Anglise Regno amitteret, aut eos in commune hostes hostis ipse haberet." The Worcester and Peterborough Chronicles give the matter of the message in the simplest and most neutral form; but it is from them that we learn that the answer was carried by messengers from the rebel camp who came to the King's Court in company with Harold; "Hi lægdon ærende on hine [Harold] to pam cynge Eadwarde, and eac ærendracan mid him sendon, and bædon þat hi moston habban Morkere heom to Eorle." The description of the Council in which this answer was discussed comes wholly from the Biographer, and, as it is just the sort of point on which he is always well informed, I have simply followed his narrative in my text. The Chroniclers give the result only; "and se cynge pes geube, and sende eft Harold heom to Hamtune." The efforts of Harold to reconcile all parties come out strongly in the Abingdon Chronicle; "Harold Eorl wolde heora seht wyrcan, gif he mihte; ac he na mihte." Florence gives him several companions in this attempt; "Dum Haroldus et alii quamplures Comitem Tostium cum iis pacificare vellent, omnes unanimi consensu contradixerunt." Harold's conduct in finally yielding to the demands of the rebels is pointedly approved by William of Malmesbury; "Hæc Haroldus audiens, qui magis quietem patriæ quam fratris commodum attenderet, revocavit exercitum." Here we again have William's former mistake about Harold's coming with an army. The description of Eadward's state of mind, his anxiety to make war, his complaints and the cause of his final illness, all come from the Biographer only; but William of Malmesbury in another part of his work (iii. 252) gives a remarkable picture nearly to the same effect, which I have quoted in p. 495, note 4.

That the outlawry of Tostig and his accomplices was the act of a formal Gemôt comes out most strongly in the Abingdon Chronicle, where, as in some former cases, the words of the formal decree seem to peep out; "And eall his Eorldom hyne anrædlice forsôc and geutlagode and ealle þa mid hym þe unlage rærdon, forþam þe he rypte God ærost, and ealle þa bestrypte þe he ofer mihte, æt life and æt hande. And hig namon heom þa Morkere to Eorle." The same formal character of the meeting is implied in the renewal of Cnut's Law on which I have enlarged in the text. In the rhetoric of the Biographer all this is lost.

With regard to the actual departure of Tostig from England, Florence alone seems to depart from his usual guide at Abingdon, and to assert an expulsion by force. I have already, in p. 500, quoted the passages which bear upon the matter.

One word more as to the answer of the Northumbrians. M. Emile de Bonnechose (ii. 118), following what edition of William of Malmesbury I know not, for "nullius Ducis ferociam," reads "nullius Duci," and on that reading thus comments; "La dénomination de danois [Ducus], donnée ici à Tosti, fils de Godwin et de Githa, sœur du roi de Danemark, est digne d'attention. Cette citation du moine de Malmesbury, suffirait pour ébranler le système selon lequel Godwin et sa famille auraient été toujours considérés comme les représentants d'un parti national, également hostile aux Danois et aux Normands." It is a strong measure to reverse the whole history of a period simply because M. de Bonnechose has somehow read "Daci" instead of "Ducis," but the real expression of William of Malmesbury is a very remarkable one. The protestation of the Northumbrians, "se nullius Ducis ferociam pati posse," sounds very like a wish for a King of the Northumbrians instead of an Earl.

The expression in the text (p. 497) "between the Thames and the Tweed" must be corrected by the minuter inquiries into the extent of the Earldoms in p. 566 and elsewhere. It is most likely that, after the death of Ælfgar, the Mercian Earldom nowhere reached so far south as the Thames.

RETURN TO the circulation desk of any University of California Library or to the

NORTHERN REGIONAL LIBRARY FACILITY Bldg. 400, Richmond Field Station University of California Richmond, CA 94804-4698

ALL BOOKS MAY BE RECALLED AFTER 7 DAYS

- 2-month loans may be renewed by calling (510) 642-6753
- 1-year loans may be recharged by bringing books to NRLF

Renewals and recharges may be made 4 days prior to due date

DUE AS STAMPED BELOW
MAY 4 1994
RETURNED
MAR 1 7 1994
Santa Cruz Jitney

70(P1251s8)2873-3A,1

